More Commentary. On Fox News Sunday (6/4, Wallace) the Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol said, "Iran was winning. That's what's been happening for the last year. … It was reasonable to make one last effort, perhaps, but at some point serious decisions are going to have to be made." Kristol went on to say that President Bush "needs to deal with this threat on his watch. Either we will have diplomatic success, or we'll have success through pressure and sanctions, or we'll be forced to use military action, or we will acquiesce to Iran getting nuclear weapons."

Jackson Diehl writes in the Washington Post (6/5, A15, 744K), "In the middle of a tirade about the pointlessness of talking with the Bush administration, a senior Iranian official I met in Tehran last month abruptly paused and asked if he could speak off the record. Then he said: 'What we need is an American president who will follow the example of Richard Nixon going to China.' There in a nutshell is what this Iranian government, and most Iranians I've spoken to, fervently desire from the United States: not the tactical talks offered last week by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice but strategic recognition of Iran as a great civilization and a regional power that must be treated, like China, as a 'stakeholder' in global affairs." Diehl asks, "The question then becomes: Could such a step be in the American interest? … It's hard to find experts on Iran in Washington who believe that it would."

Olmert Says He's Ready To Meet With Abbas. The New York Times (6/5, Myre, 1.19M) notes Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert "said today that he was prepared to meet" Abbas "to seek a resumption of negotiations based on an international peace plan. Mr. Olmert's announcement came at a joint news conference that followed his meeting with" Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, who "has sought to mediate between the Israelis and Palestinians." The Times reports, "It is far from clear whether such talks will lead to breakthroughs after years of violence. Mr. Olmert and other Israeli leaders have said progress is extremely unlikely with the militant Islamic group Hamas leading the Palestinian government. Still, Mr. Olmert said he was ready to hold talks with Mr. Abbas and has repeatedly called for renewed negotiations." The AP (6/5, Barzak) adds that, "in a rare dose of good news, …Israel's premier talked to" Mubarak "about resuming peace talks with the Palestinians." Mubarak "opposes unilateral Israeli steps, and" Secretary Rice "said the Bush administration prefers negotiations. She told CNN on Sunday that the 'final status is really something that has to be mutually acceptable' to Israel and the Palestinians." Knight Ridder (6/5, Nissenbaum) also reports the story.

Hamas Ignores Abbas' Demand To Back State-Recognition Plan. The AP (6/5, Barzak) reports the Palestinian "standoff intensified Sunday after Hamas rejected an ultimatum from President Mahmoud Abbas to endorse a plan implicitly recognizing Israel, and a pregnant woman was killed during a clash between the rivals' forces in Gaza. Abbas will order a referendum on a plan drawn up by top Palestinian prisoners in an Israeli jail calling for a Palestinian state" in Gaza, the West Bank and East Jerusalem. A separate AP (6/5) piece reports Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh "on Sunday said a plan by" Abbas "to hold a referendum on a plan that implicitly recognizes Israel is illegal. The statement was the strongest sign yet that Hamas will not give in to Abbas' ultimatum to accept the concept of a two-state solution or go to national referendum on the issue." The Los Angeles Times (6/5, King, 958K), among other sources, also reports the story.

Nuclear Agreement Spurs Indian-Americans To Intensify Lobbying. The New York Times (6/5, McIntyre, 1.19M) reports that Indian-Americans "have mounted an intensive drive to support President Bush's plan to aid India's civilian nuclear program, spending heavily on lobbying, campaign contributions and public relations to persuade Congress to approve the deal." According to the Times, Indian-Americans "are not new to lobbying in Washington. But the proposed nuclear pact has energized them like nothing before. In recent months, Indian-Americans, as well as the Indian government in some cases, have invested heavily in proven political tools that have helped previous immigrant groups break into American politics. … Much of the lobbying has focused on lawmakers from the New York metropolitan region, home to the highest concentration of Indian-Americans in the country." One group is holding a fund-raiser for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, "whose support is viewed by Indian-American leaders as crucial to winning broader Democratic backing for the plan." Clinton, though co-chairwoman of the Senate's India Caucus, "has not taken a position on the deal."

NPT Seen As Failing To Stop Nations From Acquiring Nuclear Weapons. The Christian Science Monitor (6/5, Grier, 61K) reports, "The world may be teetering on the edge of a worrisome new phase in the sixty-year-old age of atomic weapons. … Meanwhile, efforts to strengthen the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty have stagnated. Last year's NPT review conference fell apart amid international bickering. Will nukes now become must-haves for more nations? Asked for their worst-case scenario, experts say there could be 10 new members of the nuclear club by 2015." Iran's nuclear program "may have further undermined confidence" in the NPT.

Rumsfeld Arrives In Vietnam Amidst Lowered Expectations. AFP (6/5, Mannion) reports Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld "arrived in Vietnam for a three day visit to encourage stronger military ties at a time when the United States is repositioning its forces in Asia." Rumsfeld "played down expectations of dramatic new developments in the relationship, however. … Rumsfeld, who has visited Vietnam twice before, said he did not know what the next step in the relationship might be and refused to say where he thought it was heading." AFP notes Rumsfeld "will meet Prime Minister Phan Van Khai and Defence Minister Pham Van Tra on Monday, returning their previous Washington visits, officials said."

US, Eight Other Countries To Discuss Joint Strike Fighter Cooperation. The Wall Street Journal (6/5, Karp, 2.11M) reports the U.S. and eight other countries "will gather this week to negotiate a final road map for" the F-35 Joint Strike Fighter, "the Pentagon's biggest weapons program, a $276 billion…project that has struggled to live up to its billing as a model of global cooperation." The Williamsburg, Virginia talks "are crucial to producing an agreement by the end of the year, in which each country is expected to declare how many airplanes it will buy. The agreement also will determine how the fleet will be maintained and upgraded over the expected 40-year lifespan of the plane." The Journal notes, "The talks have big implications for lead contractor Lockheed Martin Corp., which oversees the JSF's development and will play a lucrative, long-term role in maintaining the planes." However, Lockheed "won't be at the table with government officials."

Ex-President Garcia Appears Victorious In Peru Runoff. The Washington Post (6/5, A10, Reel, 744K) reports, "Preliminary results indicated that former president Alan Garcia defeated nationalist candidate Ollanta Humala in Sunday's presidential election, earning a second chance to run a country that he led into economic devastation in the 1980s. ... With 77 percent of the votes counted, Garcia led Humala 55 percent to 45 percent. Garcia cast the election as a referendum to determine where Peru would position itself on South America's political map: with moderate, left-leaning leaders such as Chile's Michelle Bachelet or with populists like Venezuela's Hugo Chavez. Describing himself as a responsible leftist, Garcia, 57, warned that his opponent could steer Peru toward an authoritarian brand of confrontational, anti-American nationalism." Political analyst Fernando Rospigliosi is quoted as saying, "I think this election had more to do with the rejection of Humala than with any attraction for Garcia. ... The theme of Chavez was very important, and Garcia used it very well against Humala."

The Financial Times (6/5, Weitzman) quotes Garcia as saying, "The people have voted for us, in spite of queues, in spite of economic problems. ... We will not govern with passions and impulses as we did in the past." And in a swipe at Chavez, Garcia is later quoted as saying, "He thought he could dominate us, but we have ensured the independence of Peru." The New York Times (6/5, Forero, 1.19M) notes, "Voters had seen the race as an unappealing choice between a former president whose first administration had been an unmitigated disaster and a former army officer who once led a military rebellion," but "saw Mr. Garcia as the lesser of two evils." USA Today (6/5, 2.31M), Los Angeles Times (6/5, McDonnell, 958K) and AP (6/5, Hayes), among other sources, also report on the Peruvian elections.

Leftist Leader In Mexico Seeks Distance From Chavez. The Washington Times (6/5, Stier, 90K) reports, "Aides to Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador say that if elected next month, the leftist presidential candidate will govern more like Theodore Roosevelt -- whose economic policies featured trust-busting and progressive taxation -- than like Venezuelan firebrand Hugo Chavez." The claim "illustrates the extent that TV ads comparing Mr. Lopez Obrador to Mr. Chavez have hurt his campaign and compelled him to try to distance himself from the Venezuelan president."

New Chilean President Besieged By High School Students' Demands. The New York Times (6/5, Rohter, 1.19M) reports, "Less than three months after she took office" Chilean President Michelle Bachelet "is facing her first domestic crisis. To the surprise of many here, the challenge comes not from the right but from a group expected to be sympathetic to her center-left coalition: high school students." The Times goes on to report, "Striking students, who have occupied a Santiago high school for two weeks, are demanding smaller classes, the elimination of college entrance exam fees and federal financing to reduce the inequality between rich and poor schools. Some 700,000 students across the country have joined the movement."

Nigerian Militants Free Foreign Oil Rig Workers. The AP (6/5, Nsoyoh) reports, "Nigerian militants on Sunday released eight foreign oil rig workers, who looked tired but unharmed after two days in captivity." Police "involved in negotiating the release of the six Britons, one American and one Canadian would not say whether a ransom was paid." The AP adds, "Two of the Britons were released before dawn, followed by the six remaining hostages later in the day. The eight met with a local governor and were handed over to a representative of Nigerian oil firm Peak Petroleum in Yenagoa, the capital of Bayelsa state. The eight, whose names have not been released, looked tired but cheerful and said they were treated well by their kidnappers."

Development Projects Used To Modernize China's Restive West. The Washington Post (6/5, A1, Goodman, 744K), in a front-page article, reports, "In the six years since China's central government began its well-financed campaign to spread the benefits of economic growth beyond coastal provinces, the effort has exacerbated the extreme inequality that characterizes the national economy." The Develop the West program "was conceived in part to stem separatist inclinations in Xinjiang and other western provinces, where ethnic minority communities resent the continued influx of Han -- a migration actively encouraged by the central government. Though sporadic and sometimes violent protests have persisted in Xinjiang since the advent of the program, observers say they are happening less frequently -- a fact that Uighur groups attribute more to an aggressive crackdown by Chinese authorities than to the success of the campaign in spreading development." The Post adds, "Studies have shown that the investment has contributed to economic growth in the west, but the pace has fallen behind development in the east."

Japan At Forefront Of Campaign To Expand Whaling. The Washington Post (6/5, A14, 744K) editorializes that whaling is "increasing. Japan, Norway and Iceland never stopped hunting whales. … The reemergence of whaling could get a considerable boost this month at, of all places, the meeting of the International Whaling Commission." Japan "has aggressively sought pro-whaling allies, and it now has close to a majority of votes."

Saudi Textbooks Said To Promote Intolerance. USA Today (6/5, 2.31M) says in an editorial that in Saudi Arabia, "the Ministry of Education publishes textbooks for mandatory 'Islamic studies.' Parts read as if they could have been written by bin Laden, who is from Saudi Arabia, as were 15 of the 19 hijackers." For "more than a year, the Saudi government has said that the textbooks have been rewritten to emphasize tolerance over violence toward non-believers. But the non-profit Freedom House has found otherwise. The books are not publicly available, but Freedom House obtained and translated copies. Despite some minor changes, passages still contain disturbing intolerance. An eighth-grade text, for example, teaches that 'the Jews are apes ... while the swine are the Christians.' A 12th-grader learns the value of jihad (holy war) in language that shows jihad as a violent struggle against Jews, Christians and Muslims who don't follow the conservative Wahhabi version of Islam that Saudi Arabia officially adheres to." The Saudi government "needs to get serious and transparent about cleaning up the kingdom's instruction. And the Bush administration must start paying more than its present cursory attention."

Saudi Ambassador Says Change Taking Time. In a USA Today op-ed (6/5), Prince Turki al-Faisal, Saudi Arabia's ambassador to the US, says, "Saudi Arabia is a nation undergoing dramatic self-examination. Every aspect of Saudi Arabia's society and culture is being openly debated. We have recognized that a comprehensive, modern and open educational system — with new and revised textbooks — is fundamental to the growth and prosperity of our country. A thoughtful revision of this system is necessary, and indeed well underway. Updating a national educational system is a major undertaking. Hundreds of books must be revised, and several hundred thousand public school teachers need additional training. The process remains ongoing. In the meantime, I have agreed to meet with the directors of Freedom House to address their concerns. But as Americans have seen through the civil rights movement of the 1960s, changes in attitudes cannot be instantly achieved. Change takes time. The decision to delete the unacceptable wording used in textbooks is a thing of the past. Our efforts are now concentrated on producing the new texts and the new educational aids that go along with these texts."

Mugabe Blamed For Zimbabwe's Fall. U.S. News and World Report (6/12, Cue) reports that Zimbabwe, "once seen as a star of post-colonial Africa, is in an economic death spiral." US News adds, "The nation's economic collapse has been accompanied by social decline. The World Health Organization puts life expectancy for Zimbabwean women at 34, the lowest in the world." US News blames Zimbabwe's fall on President Robert Mugabe, "whose increasingly repressive misrule is dooming millions here to a life of misery."

Trial starts today in suit linked to Bulger; Family of slain man seeks $50m from US

By Shelley Murphy, Globe Staff

After a long legal and emotional battle, the first of 17 federal suits brought against the government by alleged victims of fugitive crime boss James ``Whitey" Bulger goes to trial today.

The family of Quincy resident John McIntyre, who was 32 when he was brutally slain in 1984, is seeking $50 million in the wrongful death suit. Longtime FBI informant Stephen ``The Rifleman" Flemmi has admitted to his murder and has implicated Bulger .

The first witness the McIntyres plan to call to the stand in US District Court in Boston today is Flemmi, who will be testifying publicly for the first time since he began cooperating with the government three years ago.

In a strange twist, the McIntyres must prove what federal prosecutors have asserted as fact in court filings and criminal proceedings held in the same courthouse: that McIntyre was killed because former FBI agent John J. Connolly Jr. leaked word that McIntyre was cooperating against Bulger.

``They fought so hard for us not to get our day in court, for the truth not to come out," said McIntyre's brother, Christopher. He said it is a victory for him and his mother, Emily, just to have a trial on their suit, no matter what the outcome is.

Ten of the 17 cases that have been brought against the government by alleged Bulger victims or their relatives were dismissed on grounds that they were filed too late. The rest are pending.

Flemmi, who struck a deal with the government that spared him the death penalty, is serving a life sentence after admitting to teaming up with Bulger to kill McIntyre, as well as nine other people. He testified in a deposition last year that Connolly had warned Bulger that McIntyre was cooperating with authorities against him.

McIntyre vanished Nov. 30, 1984, six weeks after telling the FBI and US Customs agents that Bulger and Flemmi were involved in an unsuccessful plot to ship guns to the Irish Republican Army aboard the Valhalla, a Gloucester-based fishing trawler.

In January 2000, his remains were recovered, along with those of two other victims, from an unmarked grave across from Florian Hall in Dorchester.

Former Bulger associate Kevin J. Weeks, who led investigators to the grave after cutting a deal with the government, gave chilling details of McIntyre's slaying while testifying at Connolly's 2004 federal racketeering trial. McIntyre had been lured to a South Boston home, according to Weeks, chained to a chair, grilled for hours, then shot in the head. Weeks is also scheduled to testify in the McIntyre trial.

The suit was filed under the Federal Tort Claims Act, which does not allow for a jury trial. The case will be decided by US District Judge Reginald C. Lindsay. A jury trial will be held later in the McIntyres' wrongful death allegations against Connolly and four other retired FBI agents.

The McIntyres filed the suit five years ago, but Justice Department lawyers persuaded Lindsay to dismiss it in 2003, arguing that the family had waited too long to file when ``any reasonable person" should have known that FBI negligence or misconduct led to McIntyre's death. Now faced with a trial after an appeals court reinstated the suit two years ago, the Justice Department contends in court documents that ``there is no admissible evidence" that Connolly leaked McIntyre's name to Bulger or Flemmi.

US Representative William D. Delahunt, Democrat of Quincy, called the government's legal tactics in all the civil lawsuits arising from the Bulger scandal ``offensive to victims of crime and their families." Delahunt -- who participated several years ago in congressional hearings that scrutinized the FBI's handling of informants, including Bulger and Flemmi -- said: ``My position is these [civil] cases should have been resolved without litigation. . . . There's no moral justice here."

Delahunt also said he found it astounding that the Justice Department is now arguing in the civil cases that claims of FBI misconduct by Flemmi and Weeks are not reliable while federal prosecutors, who also work for the Justice Department, relied on Weeks's testimony to send three people, including Connolly, to prison. Flemmi is also scheduled to testify in two upcoming criminal trials: one in Florida in which Connolly is accused of murder in helping Bulger and Flemmi to orchestrate a gangland slaying there in 1982 and another trial in Boston, in which former New England Mafia boss Francis Salemme is accused of lying about a gangland slaying.

``It presents the face of the criminal justice system as some sort of `Alice in Wonderland' mess, where up is down and down is up," Delahunt said.

Charles Miller, a spokesman for the Justice Department in Washington, declined to comment on the McIntyre case.

During a 1998 interview, Connolly denied informing Bulger that McIntyre was cooperating, telling the Globe: ``I never even heard his name before he was killed. I have no recollection of ever being told that McIntyre was a source for anyone."

Cambridge lawyer E. Peter Mullane, who represents Connolly in the civil case, accused Flemmi of lying. ``It's just another one of those outlandish assertions by Flemmi trying to curry favor with the government by telling them what he thinks they want to hear."

Connolly has never been charged in connection with McIntyre's slaying. A federal jury convicted him of racketeering and of warning Bulger to flee in advance of Bulger's 1995 racketeering indictment. Connolly was cleared of charges that he leaked information that led to three other slayings. He is serving a 10-year sentence in the federal case and is tentatively scheduled to stand trial in Miami in August on the state murder charges.

Bulger remains a fugitive on the FBI's 10 Most Wanted list. He is accused of 19 murders, including McIntyre's .

Deal With Wen Ho Lee Begets Warning of Yet More Claims

BY JOSH GERSTEIN - Staff Reporter of the Sun

A decision by five major news organizations to pay $750,000 to a nuclear scientist named in news stories as the target of an espionage investigation is prompting warnings that the unusual payment could embolden others aggrieved by government leaks and lead to more litigation involving the press.

The New York Times, Los Angeles Times, the Washington Post, ABC, and the Associated Press announced Friday that they agreed to the settlement in order to end litigation brought by the former scientist at the Los Alamos National Laboratory, Wen Ho Lee.

"The implications of this are just staggering," a former executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, Jane Kirtley, said in an interview yesterday. "I think this is blood money that has been paid here."

As part of the settlement, the federal government also agreed to pay $895,000 to Lee to cover his legal costs in pursuing the case.

Ms. Kirtley said the payment from the news outlets was troubling because none of the news organizations or journalists were named as defendants in Lee's lawsuit, which accused the federal officials of violating a 1974 law, the Privacy Act. The reporters were held in contempt in the case after they refused to identify their confidential sources for stories about Lee.

"The justice of this escapes me," Ms. Kirtley said of the payment. "It's the most creative way I've seen so far to do an end run around constitutional protections and get money anyway through this collateral attack." She said the deal could encourage litigation and demands for payment in connection with mundane reports on hospital statements about those injured in crimes and accidents.

"Will it be abused by others? It will," she said.

One of the immediate beneficiaries of the settlement with Lee may be another scientist, Steven Hatfill. Mr. Hatfill filed suit against the government after he was named by federal officials as a "person of interest" in an investigation into the mailing of anthrax powder in 2001 to news organizations and to the Senate. Neither Mr. Hatfill nor anyone else has been charged with a crime in connection with the anthrax mailings.

The payment to Lee suggests that Mr. Hatfill could look to news organizations to pay some or all of the damages he contends he incurred by being publicly linked with the anthrax probe.

An attorney for Mr. Hatfill, Mark Grannis, declined to comment for this article. However, it is clear Mr. Hatfill's lawyers have been closely watching developments in Lee's case.

Last year, when journalists unsuccessfully petitioned an appeals court in Washington to set aside an order compelling their testimony, Mr. Hatfill's legal team filed a friend-of-the-court brief supporting Lee.

One press lawyer involved in last week's settlement said he's not certain that Mr. Hatfill will benefit from the deal. "There are different facts in that case," said the attorney, who asked not to be named.

The need to unmask sources for use in Mr. Hatfill's case may be less because some of the statements he is complaining about were on the record or attributed to specific government agencies. The attorney general at the time, John Ashcroft, referred in televised interviews to Mr. Hatfill's status as a "person of interest" in the anthrax case.

Another contrast with Lee's case is that Mr. Hatfill is suing a series of news organizations for libel. A case against Vanity Fair and Reader's Digest is pending before a federal judge in White Plains, while a suit against the New York Times and one of its columnists, Nicholas Kristof, is before a federal court in Alexandria, Va.

The settlement with Lee came as the Supreme Court was considering petitions from the news organizations asking the court to take up the dispute.

One of the reporters subpoenaed by Lee, Robert Drogin of the Los Angeles Times, said the settlement was driven by fears of an adverse ruling from the justices. "We thought there was a great risk for the press if we took it before the Supreme Court," Mr. Drogin told his newspaper. Some news organizations may also have decided they would rather take the fight to Congress, which is considering a federal shield law that would give reporters added protection.

The settlement will likely head off any involvement by the Supreme Court in the case, but the deal does not wipe from the books the appeals court decision last year upholding contempt findings against the reporters.

A lawyer involved in the settlement said the impetus came in large part from the government lawyers. "There ended up being a lot of movement on the government side," the attorney said.

In a joint statement, the news organizations said they were "reluctant" to join in the settlement but concluded "this was the best course to protect our sources and to protect our journalists."

From a strictly economic, shortterm perspective, the settlement was a good deal for the news organizations. Each journalist faced contempt fines which were to start at $500 a day and could escalate. The legal costs were also significant. CNN said the legal fees it paid for a reporter who once worked for the network, Pierre Thomas, exceeded $1 million.

The settlement also showed differences in strategy. The New York Times, which has a policy of not settling libel cases in America, agreed to pay Lee. CNN, which is quick to settle all kinds of thorny litigation, refused.

"We parted ways because we had a philosophical disagreement over whether it was appropriate to pay money to Wen Ho Lee or anyone else to get out from under a subpoena," CNN said in a statement.

In the end, Mr. Thomas's new employer, ABC, footed his portion of the bill.

Lee was arrested in 1999 and spent nine months in solitary confinement before prosecutors agreed to drop the most serious charges against him. He denied any espionage and pleaded guilty to a single felony count of improperly copying restricted data. The federal judge in the case apologized to Lee and President Clinton said he suspected the case was mishandled from the outset.

"Our aim was never to target or punish journalists," an attorney for Lee, Betsy Miller, said. "It was to vindicate the injuries suffered by Dr. Lee resulting from unlawful leaks by government officials who disregarded their obligations under the Privacy Act in favor of pursuing their own political agendas."

Invoking Secrets Privilege Becomes a More Popular Legal Tactic by U.S.

By SCOTT SHANE

WASHINGTON, June 3 — Facing a wave of litigation challenging its eavesdropping at home and its handling of terror suspects abroad, the Bush administration is increasingly turning to a legal tactic that swiftly torpedoes most lawsuits: the state secrets privilege.

In recent weeks alone, officials have used the privilege to win the dismissal of a lawsuit filed by a German man who was abducted and held in Afghanistan for five months and to ask the courts to throw out three legal challenges to the National Security Agency's domestic surveillance program.

But civil liberties groups and some scholars say the privilege claim, in which the government says any discussion of a lawsuit's accusations would endanger national security, has short-circuited judicial scrutiny and public debate of some central controversies of the post-9/11 era.

The privilege has been asserted by the Justice Department more frequently under President Bush than under any of his predecessors — in 19 cases, the same number as during the entire eight-year presidency of Ronald Reagan, the previous record holder, according to a count by William G. Weaver, a political scientist at the University of Texas at El Paso.

While the privilege, defined by a 1953 Supreme Court ruling, was once used to shield sensitive documents or witnesses from disclosure, it is now often used to try to snuff out lawsuits at their inception, Mr. Weaver and other legal specialists say.

"This is a very powerful weapon for the executive branch," said Mr. Weaver, who has a law degree and is a co-author of one of the few scholarly articles examining the privilege. "Once it's asserted, in almost every instance it stops the case cold."

Robert M. Chesney, a law professor at Wake Forest University who is studying the recent use of the privilege, said the administration's legal strategy "raises profound legal and policy questions that will be the subject of intense debate for the foreseeable future."

Some members of Congress also have doubts about the way the privilege has been used. A bill approved by the House Government Reform Committee would limit its use in blocking whistle-blowers' lawsuits.

"If the very people you're suing are the ones who get to use the state secrets privilege, it's a stacked deck," said Representative Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut, who proposed the measure and has campaigned against excessive government secrecy.

Yet courts have almost always deferred to the secrecy claims; Mr. Weaver said he believed that the last unsuccessful assertion of the privilege was in 1993. Steven Aftergood, an expert on government secrecy at the Federation of American Scientists, said, "It's a sign of how potent the national security mantra has become."

Under Mr. Bush, the secrets privilege has been used to block a lawsuit by a translator at the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Sibel Edmonds, who was fired after accusing colleagues of security breaches; to stop a discrimination lawsuit filed by Jeffrey Sterling, a Farsi-speaking, African-American officer at the Central Intelligence Agency; and to derail a patent claim involving a coupler for fiber-optic cable, evidently to guard technical details of government eavesdropping.

Such cases can make for oddities. Mark S. Zaid, who has represented Ms. Edmonds, Mr. Sterling and other clients in privilege cases, said he had seen his legal briefs classified by the government and had been barred from contacting a client because his phone line was not secure.

"In most state secrets cases, the plaintiffs' lawyers don't know what the alleged secrets are," Mr. Zaid said.

More recently the privilege has been wielded against lawsuits challenging broader policies, including the three lawsuits attacking the National Security Agency's eavesdropping program — one against AT&T by the Electronic Frontier Foundation in San Francisco and two against the federal government by the American Civil Liberties Union in Michigan and the Center for Constitutional Rights in New York.

In a filing in the New York case, John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, wrote that allowing the case to proceed would "cause exceptionally grave damage to the national security of the United States" because it "would enable adversaries of the United States to avoid detection." Mr. Negroponte said he was providing more detail in classified filings.

Those cases are still pending. Two lawsuits challenging the government's practice of rendition, in which terror suspects are seized and delivered to detention centers overseas, were dismissed after the government raised the secrets privilege.

One plaintiff, Maher Arar, a Syrian-born Canadian, was detained while changing planes in New York and was taken to Syria, where he has said he was held in a tiny cell and beaten with electrical cables. The other, Khaled el-Masri, a German of Kuwaiti origin, was seized in Macedonia and taken to Afghanistan, where he has said he was beaten and injected with drugs before being released in Albania.

The United States never made public any evidence linking either man to terrorism, and both cases are widely viewed as mistakes. Mr. Arar's lawsuit was dismissed in February on separate but similar grounds from the secrets privilege, a decision he is appealing. A federal judge in Virginia dismissed Mr. Masri's lawsuit on May 18, accepting the government's secrets claim.

One frustration of the plaintiffs in such cases is that so much information about the ostensible state secrets is already public. Mr. Arar's case has been examined in months of public hearings by a Canadian government commission, and Mr. Masri's story has been confirmed by American and German officials and blamed on a mix-up of similar names. The N.S.A. program has been described and defended in numerous public statements by Mr. Bush and other top officials and in a 42-page Justice Department legal analysis.

In the A.C.L.U. lawsuit charging that the security agency's eavesdropping is illegal, Ann Beeson, the group's associate legal director, acknowledged that some facts might need to remain secret. "But you don't need those facts to hear this case," she said. "All the facts needed to try this case are already public."

Brian Roehrkasse, a Justice Department spokesman, said he could not discuss any specific case. But he said the state secrets privilege "is well-established in federal law and has been asserted many times in our nation's history to protect our nation's secrets."

Other defenders of the administration's increasing use of the privilege say it merely reflects proliferating lawsuits.

In all of the N.S.A. cases, for instance, "it's the same secret they're trying to protect," said H. Bryan Cunningham, a Denver lawyer who served as a legal adviser to the National Security Council under Mr. Bush. Mr. Cunningham said that under well-established precedent, judges must defer to the executive branch in deciding what secrets must be protected.

But critics of the use of the privilege point out that officials sometimes exaggerate the sensitivities at risk. In fact, documents from the 1953 case that defined the modern privilege, United States v. Reynolds, have been declassified in recent years and suggest that Air Force officials misled the court.

An accident report on a B-29 bomber crash in 1948 was withheld because the Air Force said it included technical details about sensitive intelligence equipment and missions, but it turned out to contain no such information, said Wilson M. Brown III, a lawyer in Philadelphia who represented survivors of those who died in the crash in recent litigation.

"The facts the Supreme Court was relying on in Reynolds were false," Mr. Brown said in an interview. "It shows that if the government is not truthful, plaintiffs will lose and there's very little chance to straighten it out."

Judges seek fair trial for Hicks

Richard Kerbaj

A GROUP of the nation's eminent legal minds, including four former Supreme and Federal Court judges, have warned John Howard that terrorism would destroy civilised society if Australia continued to back the detention and military trial of David Hicks.

Former Federal Court judge Ron Merkel and former NSW Liberal attorney-general and Supreme Court judge John Dowd are among the 76 signatories on an open letter to the Prime Minister arguing that Hicks -- who remains in indefinite US detention in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba -- is being held illegally and deserves a fair trial.

``Whether or not David Hicks is in fact guilty or innocent is not the issue. The illegality lies in the process of indefinite detention and unfair trial by military commission," the lawyers say.

They argue that the federal Government is complicit with the US in breaking international law and ``undermining international legal order'', and urge Mr Howard to act or lose the war against terrorism.

``The menace of terrorism is real. However, to meet the danger the world needs not only a military solution, but renewed and sustained commitment to the rule of law and to fundamental principles of human dignity and respect for human rights,'' says the letter, which is also signed by former Supreme Court judges George Hampel and Tony Pagone. ``This is the shared heritage of a civilised world. Unless we are vigilant, terrorism may achieve the destruction of these values. We should not give it such a victory.''

The lawyers describe the military commission, set up by US President George W. Bush in the wake of the 2001 September 11 attacks without the approval of Congress, as an ``affront to international legal standards''.

They claim that the commission denies the right to ``an independent and impartial trial'' and does not ``exclude evidence obtained by coercion, including the use of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment''.

The move by the judicial elders follows a similar revolt by more than 400 European and British parliamentarians earlier this year, which backed a submission to the US Supreme Court in relation to another Guantanamo inmate, Salim Ahmed Hamdan, arguing that the military commission trials contravened international humanitarian and human rights laws.

The letter, written through the Australian branch of the International Commission of Jurists and published by The Weekend Australian today, says Australia must follow the British in condemning the military commission, ``a process which expressly has no application to any American citizen''.

``The imprisonment at Guantanamo Bay and the unfair trial of David Hicks by military commission are an affront to international legal standards, indeed all civilised standards,'' it says.

The US naval base at Guantanamo Bay, where Hicks has been detained at Camp X-Ray for more than four years after he was captured with Taliban insurgents in Afghanistan in 2001, was set up as a detention centre in the wake the attacks on the US on September 11.

Mr Dowd, ICJ president, said the letter followed a decision by the lawyers to take a stand against the ``inherent unfairness of the planned trial''.

Court orders U.S. government to weigh nuclear power terror attack

By DAVID KRAVETS

Associated Press Writer

SAN FRANCISCO_A federal appeals court has blocked a plan to store more radioactive waste at a nuclear power plant, ruling that federal regulators must consider the likelihood of a terrorist attack more seriously.

A three-judge panel of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, in the first ruling of its kind, on Friday unanimously disagreed with the Nuclear Regulatory Commission's 2003 finding that an attack was "remote and speculative" and therefore unnecessary to consider.

The case involves the storage of spent fuel at the Diablo Canyon power plant in San Luis Obispo County. A group calling itself San Luis Obispo Mothers For Peace challenged the NRC's decision.

"The whole purpose of this lawsuit, before they build a facility, they would have to protect it, they would have to look at ways they could protect it from a potential attack," said the nonprofit group's attorney, Diane Curran.

New storage facilities are needed because the current waste repository at the Pacific Gas & Electric Co. site is filling up. Spokesman Jeff Lewis said the company has enough space to store spent fuel until 2010.

NRC spokesman David McIntyre said the agency was reviewing the ruling.

The court's decision comes as the Bush administration and some members of Congress are promoting nuclear power as a way to curb reliance on foreign oil. Last week, Bush said nuclear power was overregulated and needed a jump-start from Washington.

The federal government has been developing a dump to store the nation's radioactive waste at Yucca Mountain in Nevada, but the project is years behind schedule and mired in legal disputes.

US seeks to share tobacco findings

William Birnbauer

US GOVERNMENT prosecutors have called on the findings of a second Australian court in their drawn-out battle with the world's biggest tobacco companies.

The US Department of Justice previously has used the findings of the Victorian Supreme Court in the case of lung cancer victim Rolah McCabe to pursue sensitive tobacco company documents.

Now US prosecutors have introduced the findings of Sydney judge, Justice Jim Curtis, in their multibillion-dollar racketeering case against tobacco companies.

Justice Curtis last week found that British American Tobacco Australia Services had adopted a document retention policy in 1985 "for the purpose of a fraud".

The case, in the NSW Dust Diseases Tribunal, is being watched closely by insurers and asbestos companies that believe tobacco companies should contribute to lung cancer payouts.

It follows the death in 2001 of Sydney motor mechanic Alan Mowbray. His wife was awarded $200,000 after she sued Brambles Australia for negligence, claiming her husband's cancer was caused by the asbestos fibres in the brake pads he worked on. Brambles and its insurer, Allianz, figured Mr Mowbray's cancer also was caused by 54 years of smoking and that British American Tobacco should pay some compensation.

Brambles applied for the company's documents to see what it knew about the health risks of smoking.

It got some documents, but the company claimed privilege over many more.

Brambles argued privilege should be waived because the document retention policy put sensitive documents out of reach of litigants.

Last week, Justice Curtis ordered British American Tobacco to hand over documents after finding it had been dishonest about its document retention policy.

In a separate development, a US judge last week ruled that Associate Attorney-General Robert McCallum, nominated as the next US ambassador to Australia, must answer questions over last year's unexpected reduction of the sum the Department of Justice is seeking from tobacco companies from $174 billion to $13.3 billion.

The change sparked allegations of political interference, which Mr McCallum has denied.

Lawsuits change focus of former farmer

Jim Stafford

The Daily Oklahoman

Jun. 3--When Roger Ediger traded in his life as an Oklahoma wheat farmer to hang his shingle as an Enid attorney four years ago, he envisioned himself with a general law practice.

Two significant settlements reached with banks over alleged violations of federal rules governing agriculture loans have altered his career perspective.

Ediger and two law partners announced this week that the Farmers Exchange Bank of Cherokee has agreed to pay $2.127 million to settle a lawsuit filed on behalf of Ronald Jenlink of Jet and Greg Boruff of Reynolds, Ill.

The lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court for the Western District of Oklahoma alleged that the bank improperly charged excessive interest rates and fees on federally guaranteed Farm Service Agency loans.

In a statement issued by the bank through the Enid law firm of Hadwiger and Jungman, Farmers Exchange Bank denied violating any law and said it settled the lawsuit to avoid disclosing its clients' private financial information in open court.

"We do not believe the bank has done anything wrong," said Loren Rieger, president and chief executive officer of the bank. "But if we had proceeded we would have been forced to disclose substantial amounts of our customers private financial information.

"To avoid that -- and to avoid an expensive and lengthy legal fight -- we have entered into this settlement agreement to allow the bank to continue its operations without undue interruption."

The lawsuit against Farmers Exchange Bank is similar to one that Ediger brought on behalf of the federal government in 2002 against Gold Banc Corp., which resulted in a $16 million settlement.

While clerking at the Enid law firm for which he now works, Ediger concluded that the Gold Banc was violating the federal False\l "l" Claims\l "l" Act\l "l" that dates back to Civil War days and filed the lawsuit.

Ediger said the lawsuits were actually filed on behalf of the federal government. The rules he alleged were broken had to do with requirements that banks charge customers participating in the guaranteed loan program an interest rate no greater than what its average customers receive.

"I would assume that the attention from these two lawsuits has heightened banks' awareness of their need to abide by the law," Ediger said.

Meanwhile, the two cases have changed the focus of his practice.

"I went to law school intending to come back to Enid and practice with the law firm of Mitchell & DeClerk and have just a general type of law practice," Ediger said Thursday. "But these cases have changed that somewhat. I work in this area a significant portion of my time.

"But I also do bankruptcy work and commercial law and a lot of agriculture-related stuff, too."

Ediger, 51, farmed for more than two decades before he decided that he couldn't sustain his family raising wheat and cattle because of rising debt.

So, he was accepted into the University of Oklahoma law school in 1999 and graduated in 2002.

Ediger and his wife, Catherine, still live on the same land on that he farmed, but the farming operation is leased to someone else.

"I'm primarily a lawyer, but my heart is always going to be in agriculture because I farmed for 25 years, and it's hard to remove that from your heart," he said.

Court Rules Chevron's Suit Against U.S. Can Proceed

Chevron may proceed with a lawsuit against the federal government over its handling of the 1997 sale of its stake in the Elk Hills oil and gas field in California, according to a ruling by U.S. Court of Federal Claims in Washington. Chevron filed the lawsuit after failing to agree on the exact split of its joint holdings in the Elk Hills facility with the U.S. Department of Energy.

TERRORISM NEWS:

US Officials Predict Domestic Terrorist Attack By Year's End. US intelligence Officials told CBS News privately that they expect a terrorist attack in the US, possibly before the end of the year. The CBS Evening News (6/5, lead story, 2:55, Stewart) reported, "US officials believe the Canadian arrest and three recent domestic incidents in the United States are evidence the US homeland will be hit again soon, and privately, they say, they'd be surprised if it didn't come by the end of the year. The first of the domestic incidents, all of which drew little attention at the time, began here with the holdup of a string of Torrance, California, gas stations last summer. Muslim converts who bonded together in prison planned to use the robberies to finance attacks on 20 Army recruiting stations. … Then this February in Toledo, police busted another cell. This one consisted of three men training to attack US forces overseas." And "then just two months ago, a pair of Atlanta men, one a Georgia Tech engineering student, were arrested not long after communicating by e-mail with two of the suspects arrested in Canada over the weekend. The Atlanta men are charged with videotaping domestic targets, including the US Capitol and World Bank. Analysts now conclude similarities between all the cases were dramatic. All were self financed, all were self-motivated, and in each case, the men were seeking out others to join their cell."

Townsend Says US Is Vulnerable At All Points Of Entry. Frances Townsend, Assistant to the President for Homeland Security and Counterterrorism was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (6/5) how vulnerable Americans are because of the potential of terrorists crossing in from the north. Townsend responded, "We're vulnerable at all of our ports of entry. For that reason, particularly on the northern border, the President since 2001 has tripled the number of Border Patrol agents, he's -- we've invested over $120 million in advanced technology along the northern border. We're working with the Canadian government on a Western Hemisphere travel card that is biometrically enabled so we can facilitate legitimate travel but be sure that we understand and know who's coming in and exiting our country."

Canadian Terror Suspects' International Ties Draw Scrutiny. The CBS Evening News (6/5, story 2, 2:20, Bowers) reported, "The arrests over the weekend in Canada are now part of a larger international investigation involving possible terror cells in at least seven countries. Authorities are now looking for connections between those arrested in Canada and suspected terrorists already in custody in the US, Bangladesh, Bosnia, Great Britain, Sweden and Denmark." The developments "are certain to feed fears about security along the United States northern border which at 4,000 miles is the world's longest and some fear already an overlooked path for terrorists to enter the US." CNN's The Situation Room (6/5, Blitzer) reported that the "alleged conspiracy" among young Muslims in Toronto "is also causing lots of concern in this country, and there are indications [of] some cross-border connections."

Canadian Suspects Made Contact With Georgians Who Cased DC Landmarks. CNN's The Situation Room (6/5, Meserve) reported, "US counterterrorism officials says two of the Canadian suspects had e-mail communications with two U.S. citizens arrested this spring on terrorism charges. … Officials say some of the Canadians also had contact with British terrorism suspects arrested last fall and with Islamic militants in Bangladesh, Bosnia, Denmark and Sweden."

The Washington Times (6/6, Seper) reports Canadian and US intelligence officials "are investigating links between Canadian terror suspects accused of plotting to bomb government buildings and Islamic militants in the United States and other countries. Investigators are looking at links between two Atlanta men arrested in March after they videotaped" Washington DC landmarks and two of the Canadians "identified as part of a terrorist ring. The Canadians were arrested last year trying to smuggle weapons into Canada." According to the Times, US officials have established that the two "had been in contact via computer with some of the 17 terror suspects arrested Saturday in Canada." FBI spokesman Richard Kolko "acknowledged over the weekend that some of the Canadian suspects had been in 'contact' with the two Georgia men but said there was 'no current outstanding threat to any targets on U.S. soil emanating from this case.'"

US Border Patrol Stations On "High Alert." The AP (6/5, Crary) reports the US "tightened…checks of traffic from Canada on Monday as debate over the long and hard-to-police border intensified. … Calls for tougher security measures were countered by pleas from business and civic leaders on both sides to keep border crossings as quick and simple as possible." U.S. Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar "said patrol stations along the 4,000-mile border — especially those adjoining Ontario — are on high alert because of the arrests, although investigators say the suspects' alleged plot apparently involved only targets in Canada." U.S. Customs and Border Protection official Kristi Clemens "said some traffic headed into the United States would under go tougher procedures at the 89 ports of entry along the border."

Knight Ridder (6/6, Montgomery) reports "some lawmakers are calling for a harder look at the northern border" and adds that "even before" 9/11 "the northern border had a reputation as a potential open door for extremists who'd settled in Canada to take advantage of its liberal immigration policies. One Canadian officer was quoted as describing the country as 'Club Med for terrorists.'"

Suspects Used Internet To Establish International Network. NBC Nightly News (6/5, story 2, 1:50, Williams) reported, "US officials say the Internet was both the inspiration and the downfall for the group arrested in Canada. Like the terrorists behind the 2004 Madrid train bombing, the Canadians are thought to be part of an emerging trend with no direct connections to bin Laden and al Qaeda." John Miller, FBI: "These groups aren't being supported by a central hub that's taking care of their funding, their equipment; their bombing expertise. They're putting themselves together in the field and doing it with whatever resources they can generate on their own." NBC went on to report, "The net around the Canadian cell began to tighten last October with the arrest in London of a man suspected of operating a terrorist Internet site, one that investigators say the Canadian group was using, too. The FBI says two Atlanta area students arrested two months ago were also using it and took the bus to Toronto a year ago to meet some of the Canadians."

Six Of The Seventeen Suspects Considered Ringleaders. The Washington Post (6/6, A12, Struck) reports, "Six men arrested in a broad police sweep last weekend have been charged with hatching the alleged plot to set off a powerful bomb somewhere in Ontario, according to charges made public Monday. A total of 17 people were arrested -- 12 adults and five juveniles -- and all have been charged under Canada's post-Sept. 11, 2001, terrorism laws. But details made public Monday suggest that some members of the group may have had more limited knowledge of the alleged plot than others." The Post also reports that "several" suspects "came under scrutiny as a result of political conversations on the Internet that were monitored by authorities."

ABC World News Tonight (6/5, story 3, 2:45, Ross) reported, "Canadian police say more arrests are likely as they seek to unravel what they describe as a home grown terror cell that got its inspiration from Osama bin Laden and was intent on striking as soon as it could, until police moved in this weekend. The plot was designed to inflict mass casualties with truck bombs made of fertilizer, according to police here." In "this case, all of those arrested are Canadian citizens, most of whom live in tree-lined suburbs just outside Toronto, including the alleged ring leader, a 43-year-old school bus driver with four children named Qayyum Abdul Jamal. Authorities say he was active at this storefront mosque, where he helped to radicalize, and recruit others, in their teens and early 20s."

NBC Nightly News (6/5, lead story, 2:45, Tibbles) reported Canadian Police "became aware the group was allegedly trying to purchase three tons of ammonium nitrate, the same chemical used in the Oklahoma City bombing, only three times as much. So they stepped in. Friday, when the bags were delivered, the chemical had been replaced with harmless powder. Some 400 heavily-armed police swept in."

Attention Drawn To Gaps In Canadian Immigration And Intelligence Practices. The Washington Times (6/6, Sheikh) reports, "Canadian security and immigration practices came under scrutiny yesterday after the weekend arrests of 17 persons suspected of plotting to blow up southern Ontario landmarks. About 90 percent of immigration applicants from Pakistan and Afghanistan in the past five years have not been sufficiently screened for security concerns, Jack Hooper, deputy director of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), told a Senate committee last month. Security analysts, meanwhile, warned that past cuts in staffing and funding for the nation's security services have left them short of manpower to search for terrorist cells."

Arrests Said To Have "Shattered" Canadians' Self Image. The Los Angeles Times (6/6, Williams) reports that the "thwarted suspected terrorist plot has shattered the image that many Canadians have of themselves as more secure, more generous and more likable than their U.S. neighbors." Prime Minister Stephen Harper is quoted as saying, "Their alleged target was Canada, Canadian institutions, the Canadian economy, the Canadian people. … We are a target because of who we are and how we live, our society, our diversity and our values -- values such as freedom, democracy and the rule of law."

Padilla's Attorney Challenges Government's Evidence. The AP (6/5, Anderson) reports Andrew Patel, an attorney for alleged al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla "is asking a judge to throw out key evidence, saying the warrant for his arrest was based on statements from one source who claims he was tortured and another who was heavily medicated. … The evidence being challenged includes a cell phone allegedly provided to Padilla by another al-Qaida operative, an address book containing names of his alleged al-Qaida recruiter and sponsor, and more than $10,000 in cash."

Jury Begins Deliberations In Trial Of Maryland Muslim Schoolteacher. The Washington Times/AP (6/6, Barakat) reports closing arguments were heard yesterday in the trial of Ali Asad Chandia, third-grade teacher at a Muslim school in Maryland "who is charged with providing material support to Lashkar-e-Taiba, a group that supports

Muslim control of…Kashmir. … The U.S. government declared Lashkar a terrorist group in December 2001." The AP notes Chandia's prosecutors "have said Lashkar served as a potential gateway for Americans and others who wanted to join the Taliban in neighboring Afghanistan in its fight against U.S. troops in late 2001."

Senate Intelligence Committee Considers Privacy Act Terrorism Exemption. UPI (6/5, Waterman) reports, "A little-noticed proposal from the Senate intelligence committee would exempt federal agencies from important provisions of the Privacy Act in the name of the war on terrorism. The committee's annual authorization bill, which was sent to the Senate last month after a unanimous vote, would initiate a three-year pilot program, during which U.S. intelligence agencies would be able to access personal information about Americans held by other federal departments or agencies if it is thought to be relevant to counterterrorism or counterproliferation."

LATimes, NYTimes Blast Administration's Reading Of Geneva Conventions. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (6/6) notes its article yesterday which reported that "the Defense Department, over the objection of the State Department, has decided to omit from a new Army Field Manual on interrogation a prohibition against 'humiliating and degrading treatment' contained in Common Article 3 of the Geneva Convention. … Pentagon officials — supported by Vice President Dick Cheney's office — apparently have come to believe that including the prohibition in the manual would cramp the style of interrogators and create an 'unintentional sanctuary' for Al Qaeda fighters." According to the Times, "Omitting Article 3 from the interrogation manual not only would be handing the enemies of the United States a propaganda victory, but by giving interrogators an inch of discretion, it would be encouraging some of them to take a mile. Such slippage isn't just a matter of speculation. It's what happened at Abu Ghraib."

The New York Times (6/6), in an editorial, notes the Los Angeles Times article and concludes, "It defies belief that this administration is still clinging to its benighted policies on prisoners after the horrors of Abu Ghraib, the killings at American camps in Afghanistan and the world's fresh outrage over what appears to have been the massacre of Iraqi men, women and children in the village of Haditha."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Townsend Says Cuts In Homeland Security Funds Were "Inevitable." Frances Townsend, Assistant to the President for Homeland Security and Counterterrorism was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (6/5) about criticism of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff from politicians in New York State, Washington, D.C. and Michigan over cuts in funding. Townsend said, "There should be no doubt that New York is the number one in terms of its risk. And for that reason, since the inception of the grant program New York has received more than $500 million in grant money. This year, the request to Congress in the budget for grant money was reduced by Congress by over $360 million. So there were -- it was inevitable that there were going to be some cuts. … And we're just going to have to work through this, both with New York, with Washington, D.C., with Michigan, and with our allies up on the Hill."

Protestors Heckle Negroponte At Boarding School Commencement. The AP (6/6, Gram) reports National Intelligence Director John Negroponte spoke to graduates of St. Johnsbury Academy in Vermont, "where his son John was one of the graduates." The AP adds, "About 75 peace activists stood outside in the drizzle holding signs and giving speeches, alleging that Negroponte was a key player in abusive U.S. foreign policies from Central America in the 1980s to Iraq today. … Police arrested four protesters, two who were removed from the hall while heckling during Negroponte's speech and two who ventured onto what police said was the academy's private property."

Pentagon 9/11 Memorial Groundbreaking Set For June 15. The Washington Post (6/6, A4, Dwyer) reports James J. Laychak, president of the Pentagon Memorial Fund, "announced yesterday that a groundbreaking ceremony will occur June 15, a huge milestone in the nearly five-year fundraising effort for the 9/11 monument. About 150 family members and other guests, including Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, are expected to attend the invitation-only ceremony, which will be held at the memorial site on the west lawn of the Pentagon."

Pataki, Bloomberg Said To Have Misallocated Ground Zero Recovery Funds. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (6/6) Debra Burlingame, a director of the World Trade Center Memorial Foundation, writes, "The public has heard plenty about the 'empty pit of Ground Zero,' but most do not know that the $2.8 billion allocated to Lower Manhattan in cash grants has virtually all been spent. It is difficult to trace where all the money went while being routed through the Department of Housing and Urban Development and six different city and state entities." According to Burlingame, Gov. George Pataki "signed off on $25 million worth of recovery funds for American Express, which expressly announced it hadn't intended to leave Lower Manhattan. … Goldman Sachs, which made $4.55 billion dollars in net profits in 2004, received a $2 billion 'assistance' package consisting of triple-tax-free Liberty Bonds, tax credits and cash the following year." Mayor Michael Bloomberg "has declined to fully explain his allocation of $650 million dollars worth of Liberty Bonds to construct the Bank of America tower in midtown, an allocation that competes with downtown redevelopment; or why he awarded $114 million in Liberty Bonds to the Ratner office tower -- in Brooklyn."

Government's Method Of Paying For Katrina Cleanup Said To Increase Costs. NBC Nightly News (6/5, story 7, 2:45, Williams) reported, "Could it be the way the government pays for all that cleanup work" in the hurricane zone in the Gulf Coast "that is leading to so much waste?" NBC (Myers) added, "The collection, hauling and smashing of debris still is a daily ritual. Cost to taxpayers? Already, $2.5 billion, but government investigators and those closest to the cleanup now say hundreds of millions of taxpayer dollars may have been wasted." Troy Hebert's "debris removal company helped clean up after past hurricanes. He complains that this time, the Army Corps of Engineers gave debris removal contracts to four major corporations who did little actual cleanup themselves and instead farmed out much of the job to layers of local subcontractors: The result?" Hebert: "They were able to make huge, huge sums of profits off of actually other people doing work to clean up our communities. And that's not the way it should be." Rep. Tom Davis: "Contractors were being paid two, three times what they should have been paid to get the job done, and the job took in some cases two and three times as long as it would have."

Landrieu Said To Be On Mission To Explain Katrina Devastation. The Hill (6/6, Allen) reports Sen. Mary Landrieu says she's "still in a fight to explain" the Hurricane Katrina's devastation. "'It's important for people to understand what really happened, who is responsible, why it happened, so that we can actually fix it,' she said. For Landrieu, villains are easy to identify: President Bush and top White House officials, the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) and House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.)." She says FEMA "should not be the vehicle for federal assistance because it is 'dysfunctional.'

New Orleans Public Housing Residents Returning To Storm-Damaged Apartments. The New York Times (6/6, Saulny) reports displaced New Orleans public housing residents have returned "from Atlanta, Baton Rouge, Houston and elsewhere" to urge "the city to reopen their storm-damaged apartments. … "Outside the largest complex, the St. Bernard Housing Development in the Seventh Ward, tenant groups have organized evacuees into a tent city called Survivors Village." Though "city and federal housing officials who have opened fewer than 1,000 of more than 8,000 public housing units," tenants "promised on Sunday to gut and rebuild their own units, and they said they planned to be back permanently -- with or without the city's permission -- as soon as their work was done."

Foley Calls For FEMA's Removal From DHS. Rep. Mark Foley, in an op-ed in The Hill (6/6) writes that with predictions of "another volatile year" for hurricanes, "structural problems remain that plague" FEMA, including its placement within "the top-heavy government bureaucracy of the Department of Homeland Security." Foley says, "By placing FEMA in the labyrinth of government agencies housed in DHS, we have put FEMA's priorities in direct competition for attention with our efforts to protect our cities from al Qaeda and to protect our borders." Foley adds that he introduced legislation last year to "sever FEMA from the DHS bureaucracy" and "make it the nimble, quick-response team that it wants to be."

Amendment Would Prevent Use Of FEMA Funds To Buy Luxury Items. In its "Under The Dome" column, The Hill (6/6, Dufour) reports Rep. Virginia Foxx has introduced an amendment to the homeland-security appropriations bill to combat the use of government-issued debit cards to buy "Louis Vuitton purses and other luxury goods." Foxx's "Louis Vuitton Amendment" reads, "None of the funds made available to the Federal Emergency Management Agency in this act may be used to purchase a Louis Vuitton handbag." A Foxx spokeswoman said "the language is designed to 'highlight the abuse that occurred with the debit cards last year so that it doesn't happen again.'"

Red Cross Says Reforms In Place Following Katrina. USA Today (6/6, Nichols) reports that following "complaints…of supply shortages, poorly run shelters, inadequate phone and computer systems and a lack of outreach to rural areas" in the response to Hurricane Katrina, the national Red Cross' interim President and CEO, Jack McGuire, says the charity "now has far-reaching reforms in place." He "says the Red Cross will have more resources, a streamlined process to get aid to victims, a vastly expanded communications network and a new effort to reach out to…communities." McGuire says the charity will have to "earn" back its pre-Katrina image, which it will do "by showing what happens in the next hurricane season."

GAO Criticizes US Tidal Wave Preparedness. The Washington Post (6/6, A4, Daly) reports the GAO issued a report yesterday warning that while "technology is able to detect the formation of a tsunami fairly quickly," the US "lacks a robust warning system and detailed knowledge on the impact a0 tidal wave could have on coastal areas." Meanwhile, "false alarms may have lulled West Coast residents into an inaccurate sense of security." The GAO "urges that the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration develop 'loss estimation' software for tsunamis similar to those available for hurricanes or floods so officials can predict how severe a potential storm would be."

The Washington Times (6/6, Hudson) reports that while "the National Weather Service issues timely warnings," alert systems on the West Coast "cannot transmit to some coastal areas, the report said. … The GAO recommends updated maps and more community participation in the National Weather Service's TsunamiReady program. Participation is low 'because of community perceptions of a low tsunami threat and perceived high cost versus benefit.'"

WAR NEWS:

Marines Expected To Face Charges Over Killing Of Iraqi In Hamdania. As the US military continues its investigation into the alleged murder of 24 Iraqi civilians at Haditha, investigations into other killings of Iraqis by US soldiers or Marines are also proceeding. In one instance, eight Marines face charges in the death of an Iraqi man in Hamdania. The suspected Marines initially reported the Iraqi was slain while planting a roadside bomb; subsequent witnesses have called this report into question.

ABC World News Tonight (6/5, story 4, 2:06, Karl) notes the "report is signed by Sgt. Lawrence Hutchins. Marine officials do not dispute the authenticity of the report, but investigators now believe the story it tells is a lie. Officials say creditable eyewitnesses told investigators the Marines simply dragged the unarmed man out of his house, shot him, and planted an AK-47 and a shovel on his body. At least seven Marines and a Navy corpsman on the scene at the time have been arrested and locked up in the brig at Camp Pendleton, California, awaiting charges. Officials say this investigation is moving more quickly than the Haditha investigation, because in this case, several of the Marines have confessed. Officials tell me they expect charges in this case, including murder charges, in the next week or two."

The CBS Evening News (6/5, story 5, 1:30, Mitchell) reported, "Several Marines under investigation for the murder of an Iraqi civilian last April have made statements admitting they set out that night to kill an Iraqi. They were looking for a man they believed was an insurgent responsible for attacks on Marines. When they couldn't find him, they went to another house, pulled an unarmed Iraqi into the street and shot him." Pentagon officials "say he was shot by a patrol of seven Marines and one Navy corpsman who then planted a rifle and a shovel next to his body in an effort to make it look like he was an insurgent caught burying a roadside bomb." Officials "who know what's in several of their statements say this is a case not just of murder, but premeditated murder."

US Commanders To Get Preliminary Report On Haditha Killings. The CBS Evening News (6/5, story 5, 1:30, Mitchell) reported, "A member of Congress who visited Iraq said today US commanders there will soon get a preliminary report from investigators on the alleged massacre of Iraqi civilians last November in Haditha."

Kline Says Top General Will Review Report On Haditha Killings. Rep. John Kline, who has just returned from Iraq, said Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the second-ranking U.S. general in Iraq, will soon review a preliminary criminal report into the alleged massacre by of Iraqi citizens in Haditha by US Marines. The AP (6/5, Frommer) reported that Kline said "it was unclear when the report would be released."

Knight Ridder (6/5, Lasseter) reported that "counterinsurgency is among the most complex forms of warfare, and sometimes the wrong people are killed. While outrage gathers over the reported killings of 24 civilians by U.S. Marines in the western Iraqi town of Haditha, US military units…quietly go about the daily task of patrolling a very complicated battlefield."

Haditha Said Not To Be Generating Outrage Among Iraqis. NBC Nightly News (6/5, story 6, 2:05, Engel) reported that on al-Iraqiya, "Not mentioned in the broadcast -- Haditha -- where US Marines allegedly murdered 24 civilians last November. It was first reported here in detail last week and only then because the incident was denounced by the prime minister. Now it's barely on the news. Today at state-sponsored Al-Iraqiya TV, we asked the news director why." Karim Hamadi, Al-Iraqiya TV (via translator): "If we played it up or sensationalized it, more Iraqis would want to attack US troops and more Iraqis would die." Engel: "We went to a Baghdad pizzeria to gauge reaction to Haditha. Most said it's just another massacre, does it matter who carried it out?"

Photographs From Iraq Said To Undermine Military's Image. The Washington Post (6/6) carries the musings of reporter Philip Kennicott on the significance of photographs in exposing "the flaws of the military's carefully constructed image of discipline." He asserts, "Photographs made Abu Ghraib a symbol of shame throughout the world. And photographs and video images are again undermining the military's cherished reputation for calm under fire and heroic self-restraint." Photographs and investigations coexist uneasily, because the former are "immediate," while the latter are "methodical and often slow." Kennicott concludes, "And the only image that fades, as the war grinds on, is the one with which we prepared for battle: the fantasy, so beloved of Americans, of a clean, surgical, decent war."

Former Marine Says Entire Corps Should Not Be Condemned Because Of Haditha. David Danelo, a former Marine officer and Iraq war veteran, writes in the Los Angeles Times (6/6), "Several Marines have already been convicted in the court of public opinion in the Haditha case. As military investigators evaluate these allegations, those on the sidelines should avoid castigation of an entire system because of the errors of a few." Danelo adds that "as we condemn the handful who have backslid in their pursuit of the Spartan Way, we should not forget to esteem the thousands who…have kept their honor clean amid Iraq's insanity."

Gunmen Kidnap 50 In Daylight Baghdad Raid. In a daylight raid on bus stations in central Baghdad, gunmen wearing police uniforms kidnapped at least 50 people Monday. ABC World News Tonight (6/5, story 5, :20, Gibson) reported, "In Iraq, today, an audacious kidnapping in central Baghdad. Gunmen in police uniforms seized at least 50 people from bus stations in broad daylight. The hostages were herded into more than a dozen vehicles and driven away. No motive is known. The Interior Ministry denied that police were involved."

The CBS Evening News (6/5, story 6, 2;10, Palmer) reported, "Witnesses say ten vehicles like those used by the Interior Ministry police pulled up midmorning. Men in police uniforms rounded up about 50 people at gunpoint. 'They bounded them and blindfolded them,' says this witness. 'And then they covered them with blankets and drove off.' The Interior Ministry dominated by Shi'a groups denies its men were involved, but it's long been accused by Sunnis of running death squads. Today's abductions follow a weekend of sectarian bloodletting." Christians, Shiites, Sunnis, "no one is safe. New statistics from US intelligence measure just how much the violence has surged. Attacks of all kinds are up 64% in the five months from January to May."

NBC Nightly News (6/5, story 6, 2:05, Engel) reported, "The lead story tonight on Iraqi TV -- yet another mass kidnapping. Relatives protested after gunmen dressed as police took more than 50 people hostage at Baghdad's central bus station."

The AP (6/6) reports, "Lt. Col. Falah al-Mohamedawi, an Interior Ministry spokesman, said the gunmen arrived at midmorning in the Salihiya business district, where several transportation companies are based and where buses pick up passengers bound mostly for Jordan, Syria and Lebanon. Witnesses said the attackers blocked roads leading into the area before grabbing people seemingly at random. The gunmen beat the captives before putting bags over their heads and herding them into more than a dozen vehicles."

A front page story in the Washington Post (6/6, A1, Hernandez, Aldin) reports that the fate of the hostages "was unknown Monday night, but. But the scale and audacity of the operation were unusual even by the capital's lawless standards."

The Los Angeles Times (6/6, Stack, Rasheed) reports, "In Baghdad, leaving home to work, shop or visit family has become an increasingly dangerous proposition. Violence rears up without warning; residents navigate a citywide obstacle course of roadside bombs, shootouts and security checkpoints. … Monday's mass kidnapping took place in a bustling, shabby commercial district in downtown Baghdad. The site is relatively fortified: It stands just a stone's throw from the Justice Ministry, amid a network of Iraqi police checkpoints."

Man Gets Life Sentence For Role In Hassan Kidnapping. The New York Times (6/6, Tavernise) reports that a man who "apparently played a minor role in the kidnapping of Margaret Hassan, a British-Iraqi aid worker whose disappearance and death showed that no one was immune from insurgent viciousness," was sentenced to life in prison Monday. Judge Saab Khorshid of the Central Criminal Court "sentenced Mustafa Muhammad Salman al-Jibouri, a man associated with a Sunni mosque in central Baghdad, to life in prison, a British Embassy official said. The charge, according to an Iraqi lawyer who watched the trial, was aiding and abetting: Mr. Jibouri held Ms. Hassan's purse after she was abducted, though he said he did not know whose it was at first."

Pentagon Says Iraqis Believe That Violence Will Diminish. The Washington Post (6/6, A12, Pincus) reports that according to the Pentagon's quarterly report to Congress, "Iraqis have confidence the new Baghdad government will improve the situation" of frequent sectarian attacks. Anthony Cordesman criticized the study as "a fundamentally false picture of the political situation in Iraq, and of the difficulties ahead." He stated that the American people and Congress need an "honest portrayal." Cordesman disputed the Pentagon view that 90% of suicide bombings in Iraq are carried out by Al Qaeda.

NATO Official Claims Afghanistan Is More Stable Than Iraq. Freelance writer Tulin Daloglu writes in the Washington Times (6/6), "The pictures of the anti-US riots last week in Kabul show the immense contradictions of Afghanistan. Monday's riot, triggered by a traffic accident involving an American military truck, was the worst since the fall of the Taliban. The next day, however, was absolutely calm, illustrating how impossible it is to predict anything that will happen in Afghanistan. Hikmet Cetin, NATO's senior civilian representative, says the riots did not accurately express either the level of anti-American sentiment or the people's attitude toward foreign influences." Cetin "says he is sure that NATO will defeat the Taliban. … He acknowledges that putting together the institutions of government and statehood, along with educating the people, will take a long time. But he refused to compare Afghanistan and Iraq. 'There is no deep ethnic and religious division in Afghanistan like there is in Iraq,' he said."

Afghanistan Has World's Second-Highest Rate Of Newborn Deaths. The Washington Post (6/6, A10, Constable) reports that according to international studies, Afghanistan is "one of the most dangerous places in the world to be born or to deliver a child. In a recent report, the US charity Save the Children found that Afghanistan has the world's second-highest rate of newborn deaths, 60 per 1,000 births, just below Liberia." The Post adds, "Although Afghanistan has had a stable, Western-backed government since late 2001 and foreign donors have since spent tens of millions of dollars to improve health care, conditions still conspire to sabotage the chances of healthy and normal births."

Senate Panel Would Expand Mission Of Imagery Intel Agency. The Washington Post (6/6, A13, Pincus) reports, "The Senate Select Committee on Intelligence wants to expand the mission of the nation's imagery intelligence agency so that it can provide U.S. forces on the ground with laptop computers that display still pictures and video of what may lie over the next hill." The panel wants to give the director of the national intelligence authority to direct the National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency (NGA) "to 'analyze, disseminate and incorporate' into its national system 'likenesses, videos, or presentations produced by ground-based platforms including handheld or clandestine photography taken by or on behalf of human intelligence collection organizations.' The new visual materials would be available along with traditional mapping data for retrieval by mission planners and troops in the field."

DOJ:

Former DOJ Spokesman Blasts Gonzales Over BALCO. The Legal Times (6/5, McLure) reports, "It's not often you see one of former Attorney General John Ashcroft's aides publicly criticize the current Justice Department. But that's exactly what former Ashcroft spokesman Mark Corallo did last week when he submitted an affidavit bashing the DOJ for issuing subpoenas to two San Francisco Chronicle reporters who wrote articles about the BALCO steroid investigation based on leaked grand jury testimony." The Times continues, "In supporting the reporters' motion to quash, Corallo accused Justice's leadership of violating long-standing departmental policies that discourage subpoenaing reporters except in certain circumstances 'where immediate action is required to avoid the loss of life or the compromise of a security interest.' … 'I just saw an egregious abuse of power,' says Corallo. 'There seems to be this attitude at [the DOJ] that just because the law says we can, we will.'" The Times adds, "Corallo, who now runs his own public relations company, has some clients who likely didn't mind him taking a swat at his old employer. He's been retained by Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, the securities class action firm indicted by the Justice Department last month. He's also served as spokesman for Karl Rove, the presidential aide under scrutiny by DOJ Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald in the investigation into the leak of CIA agent Valerie Plame's identity. That case, of course, may hinge on the degree to which reporters are compelled to cooperate with prosecutors and defense lawyers. … Corallo, however, says his client list didn't affect his decision to jump into the BALCO matter. 'None of my clients had any idea that I was doing this,' he says. Regardless, his move will likely burn bridges with some fellow Republicans at the DOJ."

Assistant USA Tapped As Pentagon IG Nominee. The AP (6/5) reports, "Assistant U.S. Attorney David Laufman is President Bush's pick to be the Pentagon's chief overseer of internal investigations." The AP continues, "The White House on Monday sent the Senate Laufman's nomination for inspector general at the Defense Department. … If confirmed, Laufman would replace Joseph E. Schmitz, who resigned last September to become chief operating officer for the Prince Group, a division of Blackwater USA, which provides security services to troops in Iraq and around the globe." The AP adds, "The inspector general is the principal adviser to the secretary of defense for matters relating to the prevention of fraud, waste and abuse in the Defense Department. …. Laufman, who received a bachelor's degree from the University of Pennsylvania and a law degree from Georgetown University, is assistant U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia. … Before that, he was chief of staff for the office of the deputy attorney general at the Justice Department. Earlier in his career, he was investigative counsel for the House Ethics Committee."

DOJ's Privacy Advocate's Powers Are Limited. The Legal Times (6/6, Mclure) reports, "From spying on domestic-based international phone calls without a court warrant to reportedly obtaining the phone records of tens of millions of customers of AT&T, BellSouth and Verizon, the federal government appears to have made safeguarding Americans' privacy a low priority. … So it may come as a surprise to learn that the Justice Department -- the agency responsible for defending such programs -- has a top official charged with making sure the agency doesn't violate Americans' rights while pursuing terrorists. Jane Horvath became the department's first full-time chief privacy and civil liberties officer in February. … But her powers are limited and, in the view of a number of privacy advocacy groups, negligible. Unlike privacy officers in Europe and Canada, she has no power to subpoena federal law enforcement officials with knowledge of alleged privacy or civil liberties violations. Nor can she report independently to Congress. … 'I tend to think it is window dressing,' says David Sobel, general counsel of the Electronic Privacy Information Center. 'The creation of a position like this within DOJ is a matter of [the department] paying lip service to the very real privacy problems that arise from their activities.' … And, in fact, Horvath herself says she has no intention of taking a confrontational approach or acting independently of Justice's leadership in defending privacy rights at an agency that has vigorously defended the National Security Agency's domestic spying and whose own investigators are increasingly circumventing federal courts to collect personal information on American citizens."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Bawag Settles Refco Charges With US For $675 Million. The AP (6/6) reports, "Austria's Bawag PSK bank will pay at least $675 million to avoid prosecution and to settle bankruptcy claims after admitting its role in the collapse of commodities brokerage Refco Inc., U.S. authorities announced Monday." The AP continues, "The bank, together with the Austrian Trade Unions Association, which owns Bawag, will forfeit $337.5 million to the United States to be distributed to victims of the fraud at Refco, according to prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission. … In return, U.S. authorities have agreed not to prosecute Bawag, U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said." The AP adds, "The government will distribute half of the $337.5 million in forfeited funds to the Refco bankruptcy estate and half to other victims of the Refco fraud, he said. … In a statement, the bank said it will initially pay $158 million, with $150 million being divided equally between the Refco creditors and the U.S. Department of Justice and another $8 million being paid to a class-action settlement fund. … The bank said the Justice Department will distribute its money to the Refco estates and the securities claimants, among others. … As much as a year later, the bank will pay the remainder, to be split equally between the Justice Department and Refco creditors, the bank said."

USA Today (6/6, Farrell) reports, "The settlement was part of a non-prosecution agreement between federal prosecutors and the Bank fur Arbeit und Wirtschaft (Bawag), headquartered in Vienna. In a statement, Michael Garcia, the U.S. Attorney in Manhattan, said the bank merited the non-prosecution agreement because new management, installed in January after the scandal, was cooperating fully with the criminal investigation. … Although no mention was made of the bank's previous management, prosecutors and regulators from the Securities and Exchange Commission are continuing their investigation." USA adds, "The deal lifts a cloud of uncertainty from the bank, while resolving most of the financial claims that have been lodged against it for its role in propping up Refco, now in Chapter 11. 'We're pleased to have resolved all these matters,' said Andrew Levander of the Dechert law firm, which represents Bawag. 'We believe this generally resolves all potential claims against Bawag.'"

Enron Prosecutors Have Possible Future Targets, But Might Be Winding Down. The Wall Street Journal (6/6, Emshwiller) reports, "The giant federal investigation of Enron Corp. has produced criminal charges against 32 people, and it is continuing. But will it ever spit out charges against anyone else?" The Journal continues, "That question hangs over the four-year-old probe in the wake of its greatest victory: the convictions last month of former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay and former President Jeffrey Skilling on conspiracy and fraud charges. The four-month trial of those two men was viewed as a culmination of the federal criminal probe that began in the wake Enron's collapse into bankruptcy in December 2001." The Journal adds, "Theoretically, the federal Enron Task Force still has lots of potential targets for criminal charges. Some even came up by name during the Lay/Skilling trial. Court filings in that case said about 100 individuals have been identified as co-conspirators of the two men. Of those criminally charged, 16 have pleaded guilty, eight have been convicted at trial, two have been acquitted and the rest are awaiting trial. … Among the senior executives whose names have come up during the criminal proceedings is Jeff McMahon, who served various senior Enron positions; David Duncan, one of the company's outside auditors and the only man in the Enron saga to have pleaded guilty to a crime and then reversed himself; and Greg Whalley, who took over as Enron's president when Mr. Skilling unexpectedly quit in August 2001. … Some observers believe that with its biggest case now completed, the Task Force is unlikely to file new cases. Instead, it probably will wind down its efforts and focus on cleaning up the already filed charges. 'Enron Beach is closed, and not just for the summer,' says Jacob Frenkel, a former federal prosecutor now in private practice in Rockville, Md. … However, others say the government could feel obligated to bring additional cases even after nabbing the two top figures at the company. As a prosecutor, 'you want to make sure that the people most culpable are held to account,' says Jonathan Halpern, a former federal prosecutor now in private practice in New York. … Another possibility is that any future cases will be handled as civil matters by the Securities and Exchange Commission, which could seek large monetary penalties from individuals."

Central Figure In Milberg, Weiss Case Lost His Midas Touch. The New York Times (6/6, Creswell, Glater) reports, "When it came to investing, Howard J. Vogel seemed to possess a perverse kind of Midas touch. … In early October 1997, he bought 50 shares of Oxford Health Plans. Three weeks later, the stock nose-dived, and Mr. Vogel lost about $3,000 of his investment. Still, Mr. Vogel reaped $1.1 million." The Times continues, "How was that possible? … Mr. Vogel was a plaintiff in a shareholder lawsuit filed by the New York securities litigation powerhouse Milberg Weiss Bershad Hynes & Lerach against Oxford Health. In 2003, the company, along with other parties that were sued, paid $300 million to settle. … Most of the investors received pennies on the dollar for their losses. But Mr. Vogel, then a real estate mortgage broker in Englewood, N.J., was not just a hapless investor who bought the wrong stock at the wrong time." The Times adds, "Mr. Vogel now says, according to a plea agreement with federal prosecutors, that he and members of his family were actually linchpins in a long-running arrangement that helped Milberg Weiss snare the lucrative lead counsel position in the Oxford Health and many other securities lawsuits, reaping hundreds of millions of dollars in legal fees. … Mr. Vogel, who has since moved to Florida, is a central figure in the government's case against Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, as the law firm is now called. Last month, a federal grand jury in Los Angeles indicted the firm and two of its name partners on several criminal charges, including racketeering conspiracy and money laundering. The firm is accused of making $11.3 million in illegal secret payments to Mr. Vogel and two others who served as plaintiffs in more than 150 lawsuits. … The firm contends it has done nothing improper and has vowed to fight the charges against it. But Milberg Weiss is struggling to keep its lawyers and clients from walking away. Several lawyers have left the firm and a number of institutional investors, including the New York state employee pension fund, have removed it as counsel in high-profile lawsuits."

Prudential To Fight Arbitrators' Ruling. The Wall Street Journal (6/6, Craig) reports, "An arbitrator once accused of being in Wall Street's pocket was part of a panel that unexpectedly returned a $14.5 million penalty against a major Wall Street firm." The Journal continues, "In late May, a New York Stock Exchange arbitration panel unanimously ordered Prudential Securities Inc. to pay $11.8 million plus back interest to Charanjit and Harpreet Sahni, a Roslyn Heights, N.Y., couple who alleged that Prudential mismanaged some of their money. From 2000 to 2004, the couple's Prudential account dwindled to less than $1 million from $23 million. Wachovia Corp. acquired a 62% stake in Prudential Securities in July 2003 from Prudential Financial Inc., which retained a 38% stake." The Journal adds, "A Prudential spokesman said of the ruling: 'We don't believe this decision conforms with the law, and we are considering taking steps to have the decision vacated.' … The case is significant not only for its size -- it is the third-largest award ever handed down by an NYSE panel -- but also because the couple's lawyer worked to have one of the three arbitrators who heard the case, a former Merrill Lynch & Co. employee named Robin Henry, removed from the panel."

WSJournal Says Judge Can Set Limits On DOJ In Corporate Fraud Cases. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/6) says federal Judge Lewis A. Kaplan is expected to rule on whether the Justice Department overstepped its bounds in pursuing the KPMG tax-fraud case. If Kaplan "rules against the government, it may lead to an overdue rethinking of how far prosecutors can go in demanding cooperation from companies under investigation." Kaplan "can lay down an important and necessary marker for corporate fraud cases going forward. Whether he imposes any sanction on the government, and of what sort, will show if Justice can get away with acting unjustly."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby's Attorneys Look To Documents For Defense. The Legal Times (6/5, Kelley) reports, "I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby Jr. never meant to lie to the FBI or to a federal grand jury. Instead, his lawyers blame 'confusion' or a 'faulty memory' for his failure to disclose conversations he had with reporters about CIA operative Valerie Plame. … In other words, he simply forgot." The Times continues, "Given the hectic nature of his job as Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff, Libby's lawyers say, it's understandable that their client might have failed to remember 'snippets of conversation' he felt were unimportant. … And even if he did talk to reporters about Plame, the defense argues, he had no motive to lie about it later because he didn't know her status was classified and therefore was unaware he had done anything wrong. … Then again, they contend, it might just be that the reporters who claim they talked to Libby about Plame are themselves confused." The Times adds, "Little by little, Libby's lawyers have revealed aspects of their defense in court filings and at pretrial hearings. They've indicated what players likely will be called as witnesses, and they've made requests for thousands of documents — actions that shed light on likely trial strategies. … 'It looks like the defense is going in a few directions, one of which is that Valerie Plame was so unimportant that even if Libby was mistaken, he didn't intend to lie,' says Peter Henning, a former lawyer with the Justice Department's Criminal Division and now a law professor at Wayne State University in Michigan. 'It looks like they may also raise some challenges as to what was actually said in these fairly short conversations with reporters.' … Libby is accused of lying to a grand jury and to FBI agents investigating claims that someone in the White House leaked Plame's identity to the media in the summer of 2003 to retaliate against her husband, Joseph Wilson, an outspoken critic of the Iraq war. When questioned about his knowledge of the leak, Libby allegedly lied about how and when he learned of Plame's CIA status, and with whom he discussed the classified information."

WSJournal Says Case Against Libby Is Weak. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/6) says that Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald's use of a Journal editorial as part of his perjury and obstruction case against former Vice Presidential aide Scooter Libby, "suggests that his case is a lot weaker than his media spin. Mr. Libby wasn't a source for our editorial, which quoted from the October 2002 National Intelligence Estimate concerning the Africa-uranium issue. But Mr. Fitzgerald alleges in a court filing that Mr. Libby played a role in us getting the information, which in turn shows that 'notwithstanding other pressing government business, [Libby] was heavily focused on shaping media coverage of the controversy concerning Iraqi efforts to obtain uranium from Niger.'" The Journal adds, "The more of Mr. Fitzgerald's case that becomes public, the more it looks like he has made the terrible mistake for a prosecutor of taking Joe Wilson's side in what was essentially a political fight."

US Charges Seven With Drug, Money Laundering Scheme. The AP (6/6, Gentile) reports, "Seven people, including two affiliated with Limelight Films Inc., a film and TV distribution company, have been charged as part of a two-year investigation into allegations of drug trafficking, money laundering and arms dealing." The AP continues, "Bruno D'Esclavelles, 45, chief executive of Limelight, and Alexander de Basseville, 35, who is affiliated with Limelight's parent, the Swiss firm ADB Swiss S.A., were arrested in Alexandria, Va., and charged with conspiracy to distribute the drug Ecstasy." The AP adds, "Federal officials say de Basseville met several times over two years with undercover agents posing as international drug traffickers. … De Basseville offered to launder drug money, supply weapons and broker drug deals for the agents, according to a press release from the U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia and a separate release from the Drug Enforcement Administration. … Authorities say that on two occasions, de Basseville and D'Esclavelles took cash, which they were told came from drug sales, and laundered it through Limelight Films. … In February, de Basseville and D'Esclavelles allegedly arranged for an associate, Thomas Frischknecht of the Netherlands, to sell 10,000 Ecstasy pills to undercover agents. The pills were shipped to the agent in Virginia, authorities said."

On its Web site, ABC News (6/6) reports, "A man engaged to Charlie Chaplin's granddaughter was arrested in a drug sting targeting a group that trafficked the drug ecstasy from Europe to Los Angeles and used a Hollywood movie studio to launder money, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. DEA officials say Alexandre De Basseville, who is engaged to Chaplin's granddaughter Kiera Chaplin, and Bruno D'Esclaelles, the CEO of Limelight Films, met on several occasions with undercover federal agents during the past two years and attempted to set up deals to bring 500,000 ecstasy pills into the United States." ABC News also quotes Karen Tandy's statement from the DEA press release.

Businesses Wary Of Governmental Data-Sharing Efforts. Information Week (6/6, Greenemeier) reports, "A Justice Department proposal that ISPs retain records for two years is just the latest in a growing list of data collection initiatives by federal agencies. … To protect the public from terrorism and other hazards, the U.S. government mines its vast databases for signs of trouble. Increasingly, the feds are requesting--even demanding--that businesses share their data, too. But such cooperation isn't cheap or easy, and several industries are pushing back to protect their customers' privacy." IW continues, "Not long after forcing Internet companies to submit search terms, search result URLs, and other information as part of its enforcement of the Child Online Protection Act, the Justice Department is going a step further. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is now asking the likes of Google, AOL, and Verizon to keep subscriber information and other customer data for at least two years, just in case the government needs it for criminal investigations. Currently, Internet companies are under no obligation to save that data at all. … People want the government to have the data needed to fight crime and terrorism; it's the potential misuse of personally identifiable data--names, addresses, Social Security numbers, Web search histories--that is deeply worrisome." IW adds, "The feds have been mostly successful in getting businesses to cooperate. Following the 9/11 terrorist attacks, the government looked to transportation companies, especially airlines, to hand over information that can be used to match passengers and transportation workers with names on terrorist watch lists. However, while they initially complied with Homeland Security projects such as the Computer Assisted Passenger Pre-Screening System and Secure Flight, some airlines have said they're uneasy with the government's ability to safeguard their data from loss or misuse. … Privacy advocates worry about the volume of data being collected (millions of records and many terabytes of data), the length of time it's stored, and the level of detail. … Yet even as one data-sharing arrangement comes under scrutiny, another arises. The U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention has requested that international airlines store passenger emergency contact information for six months in the event of a bird flu outbreak."

House Democrats To Determine Fate Of Jefferson's Ways And Means Seat. The Hill (6/6, Hearn) reports that with "emotions still raw over House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) recent request that Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) relinquish his seat on the Ways and Means Committee while he faces a government bribery investigation, House Democrats are convening a meeting this evening of their Steering and Policy Committee. The committee is charged with determining panel memberships, among other matters." It was "unclear at press time whether the steering committee, which is stocked with Pelosi loyalists, would discuss Jefferson's situation or vote to take him off the tax-writing panel."

Roll Call (6/6, Kornacki) reports the timing of the meeting announcement -- "it was only a few session days ago that Jefferson ignored a demand from House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) that he leave Ways and Means immediately — promptly ignited speculation that Pelosi is planning to ask the Steering and Policy Committee to recommend to the full Democratic Caucus that Jefferson be stripped of his assignment on the exclusive panel." A senior Democratic aide, however, "said that Pelosi is expected to broach the Jefferson subject but said that she is likely to tread carefully, perhaps only sampling opinion instead of calling for specific actions."

House Leaders Willing To Let Courts Decide Fate Of Jefferson Documents. CQ (5/5, Ferrechio) reports, "Once-irate House leaders now are inclined to sit back and let judges determine whether the executive branch overstepped its bounds with the first-ever search of a lawmaker's Capitol Hill office." The "uproar over the 18-hour search and removal of documents from the Rayburn House Office Building has subsided to such a large degree that House General Counsel Geraldine Gennet turned down an offer from the Justice Department to meet about it this week." Instead, Gennet "told investigators that the House position is to let a court decide the fate of the seized items, said Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse. There will be a meeting sometime next week, Roehrkasse said."

Safavian Denies Lying About Golfing Trip With Abramoff. The New York Times (6/6, Shenon) reports former White House budget official David Safavian "acknowledged Monday that he had provided 'a lot of insight and advice,' including government information not available to the public, to the lobbyist Jack Abramoff in 2002." But Safavian "testified that he had not violated ethics rules in accepting the lobbyist's invitation for a golfing trip to Scotland that summer." Safavian "insisted in testimony in federal court here that he had not lied to government investigators when he was asked about the golf trip, although he acknowledged giving them inaccurate information about some contacts with Mr. Abramoff, a former lobbying partner."

Government Executive (6/6, Mandel) reports, "David Safavian, former head of the Office of Management and Budget's procurement policy division, took the stand in his own defense for the second time Monday, describing how he provided assistance to his friend and former colleague Jack Abramoff in ways that approached, but did not cross, lines of propriety." GE continues, "Safavian faces charges that he lied about his dealings with Abramoff to obtain clearance from the General Services Administration ethics office to go on a golfing trip to Scotland while serving as the chief of staff at that agency, and that he subsequently obstructed two investigations into his participation in the trip. … As the final witness in his own defense, Safavian testified that he had advised Abramoff on efforts to take over two GSA-controlled properties, as was clear from a large number of e-mail messages presented as evidence by Justice Department lawyers earlier in the case. But on Friday, Safavian had testified that while he had not expected some of that assistance to actually help, he had moved his friend's queries forward so Abramoff could get answers from the appropriate GSA decision-makers. … Safavian said he had arranged a meeting and provided information about a large GSA property in White Oak, Md., that Abramoff hoped to lease for a religious school he and his wife founded, despite it being clear that the effort to lease the property would not ultimately succeed. He said he had tried to explain that the religious nature of the school and potentially hazardous condition of the buildings ruled out leasing the property to Abramoff's Eshkol Academy."

Indicted Senator Begins Testimony At Tennessee Waltz Trial. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (6/6, Buser) reports, "Former state senator Roscoe Dixon took the stand Monday in his bribery trial, hoping to undo five days of testimony and secret recordings that prosecutors say illustrate a politician on the take. Dixon, who resumes the stand today, testified for about 45 minutes near the end of the day, telling jurors of his family background, of working and attending college, of 16 years of service in the Army and Tennessee National Guard and his life as a legislator from 1982 to 1994. 'Lobbyists play a very powerful role,' said Dixon, who addressed jurors in a personable manner and sometimes added gentle humor to his answers. … 'Everybody wants to get your ear.'" WMC-TV Memphis (6/5) and WPTY-TV Memphis (6/5) also reported on Dixon's testimony.

Jury Hears Tape Of Dixon Complaining About Senate Pay. The AP (6/6, Baird) reports Dixon "complained that his job as a lawmaker paid too little, according to a recording played for a federal jury Monday. 'I need to get in the big league, man,' Roscoe Dixon said on a recording played at his bribery and extortion trial. L.C. McNeil, an FBI agent testifying under his code name, said the recording was made in August 2004 when he was talking with Dixon about the senator's desire to leave the Legislature." The AP adds that Dixon "complained that no matter how much per diem pay he drew above base salary, he could not make more than $30,000 a year as a Senator. 'Everybody got some semi-hustle,' he said of the state Legislature." WTVF-TV Nashville (6/5) reports McNeil also "told the jury he talked to Barry Myers about paying bribes to Dixon. Myers has been described as a 'bag man' by federal investigators."

Former Chicago Water Official Testifies About Political Hires. The Chicago Tribune (6/6, Mihalopoulos, Bush, 643K) reports, "From the time Mayor Richard Daley took office, dozens of city department managers gathered before elections at the plumbers' union hall or other sites to get campaign marching orders from top mayoral aides, a former Daley loyalist testified Monday in the City Hall corruption trial. Donald Tomczak, a longtime Water Department official and veteran political operative, said he then would summon his top deputies to his office in the Jardine Filtration Plant to tell them which candidates would get help from hundreds of blue-collar city water workers." The Tribune adds that "Tomczak described a Daley campaign organization in which high-ranking city officials doubled as political coordinators," and "promotions for water workers were based more on precinct-by-precinct election results than actual job performance." The Chicago Sun-Times (6/6, Korecki, Novak, Warmbir) notes, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Patrick Collins asked if two soldiers in Tomczak's political army deserved the city positions they were given. 'Were they the best men for the jobs?' Collins asked. 'No,' Tomczak said plainly. 'They were active in my political group and did a good job.'"

Federal Monitor Finds Numerous Incidents Of Improper Behavior By UMDNJ Dean. The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/6, Graham, 423K) reports, "The allegations that have been swirling around Warren Wallace for weeks finally came to light yesterday, and the details were not pretty. A federal monitor investigating the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey, where Wallace was a senior dean until he was fired last week, accused him of manipulating the petty-cash system and steering a lucrative no-bid catering and cafeteria contract to a friend. The monitor's report also said Wallace, a Gloucester County freeholder and chairman of the Delaware River and Bay Authority, had devoted 'significant' amounts of university time and resources to his political jobs. … The monitor said Wallace's actions were, 'at a minimum, unethical.'" The Inquirer notes, "The monitor received a tip May 17 that Wallace's secretary was shredding documents, and the FBI quickly raided his office." The Camden Courier-Post (6/6, Greenblatt) adds, "The report said members of the school's Admissions Committee said Wallace forced them to interview a relative who had not yet taken the Medical College Aptitude Test or completed application essays. Committee members told investigators that Wallace's actions damaged the school's reputation, but he defended his behavior in a letter to the panel's chairman, the report said. Wallace's efforts on his daughter's behalf ultimately caused UMDNJ officials to fire him, university spokeswoman Anna Farneski said on Monday."

Investigators Collect DNA Evidence For Case Against Jeffs. CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (6/5, Roberts) reported, "Fugitive polygamist and cult leader Warren Jeffs…remains on the FBI's most wanted list tonight, a $100,000 bounty on his head. Jeffs is wanted for alleged sex crimes involving minors. Tonight his whereabouts are still unknown, but authorities are busy strengthening their case against him." CNN (Kaye) added, "During this raid of the FLDS compound in Colorado City, Arizona, investigators weren't expecting to find…Jeffs but evidence against him – evidence that could prove Jeffs forced young girls to marry men sometimes twice their age and give them children. … If Jeffs performed the marriages and DNA evidence proves girls were under age when they conceived, Jeffs will have even bigger problems than he has simply living in illegal polygamist lifestyle."

Family Of Mob-Hit Victim Blames Government For Death. The AP (6/6) reports, "John McIntyre thought he was going to a house party on Nov. 30, 1984. … Instead, he was chained to a chair, interrogated, strangled, then shot in the head." The AP continues, "McIntyre's family is suing the federal government for $50 million, alleging that McIntyre was killed by fugitive crime boss James 'Whitey' Bulger after former FBI Agent John Connolly tipped him that McIntyre was cooperating with authorities in an investigation of Bulger." The AP adds, "As the McIntyre family's wrongful death lawsuit went to trial Monday, attorney Steven Gordon gave chilling details of McIntyre's killing. … Gordon said McIntyre was lured to a house by Bulger and Stephen 'The Rifleman'

Flemmi, leaders of the notorious Winter Hill Gang. … After he arrived carrying a case of beer, McIntyre was handcuffed and chained to a chair, then interrogated by Bulger, who asked him if he was talking to authorities about Bulger's failed plan to ship guns to the Irish Republican Army on a Gloucester fishing boat. … 'It did not take much time for John McIntyre to say he was,' Gordon said. … Flemmi, Bulger's former right hand man, who pleaded guilty to participating in McIntyre's death, is expected to be a key witness for the McIntyre family. … Flemmi, who is serving a life sentence in 10 killings as part of a plea deal that spared him the death penalty, testified in a deposition last year that Connolly told Bulger that McIntyre had begun talking to federal authorities about Bulger's criminal activities. … Flemmi testified only briefly Monday before the trial recessed for the day. He is scheduled to resume his testimony Tuesday."

Couple Accused Of Selling Children Await Extradition. The AP (6/6) reports, "A fugitive couple accused of trying to sell their children in Mexico spent the weekend in San Diego jails will be extradited to Arizona." The AP continues, "The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children reportedly tipped off federal investigators about the couple. The tip led Mexican authorities to arrest 20-year-old Jessica Karin Heird and 37-year-old Edward Henry Leader in Tijuana on Friday. … Mexican authorities reportedly found the couple's 3-year-old son, but their 18-month-old daughter was still missing. The San Diego Union-Tribune reported that the boy and girl were sold, though there was no word on who paid for the children or what the price was."

KGTV, San Diego (6/6) reports, "Heird -- who is six months pregnant -- and Leader had been living south of the border for several years and allegedly decided to make money by selling two of their youngest children, Deputy U.S. Marshal Omar Castillo said Monday. … Investigators believe the suspects took cash for their 18-month-old daughter and 3-year-old son. Authorities have since recovered the youngsters, who evidently were not physically harmed during their ordeals, Castillo said."

"Mafia Cops" Sentenced To Life In Prison. The Long Island Newsday (6/6, Destefano) reports, "The 'Mafia Cops' took eight lives and yesterday, they learned theirs would be lost to prison." Newsday continues, "Saying their crimes were the worst he ever saw, a Brooklyn federal judge hit two ex-Police Department detectives with life terms in prison and million-dollar fines for their roles as mob hit men. … 'It is hard to visualize a more heinous offense,' said Judge Jack B. Weinstein as he announced in a packed courtroom the heavy sentences for Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa for their roles in eight gangland murders during a bloody period that stretched from the mid-1980s into the early 1990s. … 'These are probably the most heinous crimes ever tried in this courthouse,' Weinstein said. … 'These two men stand before you unrepentant and remorseless and perhaps by a higher power unforgivable,' said lead prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Henoch. 'Police are supposed to protect people; we don't have death squads here -- at least we aren't supposed to.' … But in another twist in a case that has been filled with complex legal issues, Weinstein delayed imposition of the sentences until hearings are held later this month on critical post-trial motions for either acquittal or new trials. Both defendants will remain jailed but have asked Weinstein to overturn the April guilty verdicts, in part because the statute of limitations on the federal racketeering charges had expired. … Weinstein is also going to hold a hearing on Eppolito's and Caracappa's claims that their high-profile lawyers, Bruce Cutler and Edward Hayes, respectively, gave them ineffective representation. The lawyers have denied that claim. But no matter how Weinstein decides those issues, the case will be litigated for years."

The New York Times (6/6, Feuer) reports, "There was little reaction from either man in Federal District Court in Brooklyn and both returned to jail, where Mr. Caracappa's face has grown skeletal and Mr. Eppolito has grown a white goatee and gotten somewhat slimmer. … By law, the friends and family of a victim can address the court at sentencing, and before the penalty was read, there were brutally emotional — and achingly personal — accounts from the survivors. … One of them was Michal Weinstein, daughter of the jeweler, Israel Greenwald, who on Feb. 10, 1986, disappeared after giving young Michal a hug as she waited for a bus. She was 10 years old then, and as she spoke from the stand, addressing both defendants by name, it was with a caged fury that only now, after 20 years, had found release. … 'You took away our daddy,' she said, 'and by doing that you took away our childhood. You took away our mother. You stole our innocence. You filled our nights with nightmares and our days with torture.'"

The AP (6/6, McShane) reports, "Both defendants have been jailed since their April 6 convictions on racketeering charges that included murder, kidnapping, drug dealing and obstruction of justice. … Eppolito, 57, whose father was a member of the Gambino crime family, and Caracappa, 64, were respected detectives who worked for Luchese underboss Anthony 'Gaspipe' Casso between 1986 and 1990. The eight murders were committed while they were simultaneously on the payrolls of the New York Police Department and Casso." The AP notes, "The sentencing delay was anticlimactic compared to the courtroom theatrics that preceded it. Barry Gibbs, who spent almost 20 years in jail after a wrongful conviction in a case where Eppolito was lead investigator, stood up in the middle of Eppolito's speech to attack the ex-detective before federal marshals led him out of the courtroom. … 'Remember what you did to me? To me? You framed me!' he screamed as the crowd burst into cheers."

The Los Angeles Times (6/6, Barry) reports, "Hayes and Cutler delivered memorable opening and closing statements but called few witnesses. Cutler's entire defense lasted 13 minutes. Eppolito has replaced him with a new lawyer, Joseph Bondy, who said Cutler should have identified other potential perpetrators and allowed Eppolito to take the stand. Caracappa's new lawyer, Daniel Nobel, filed a similar complaint Monday morning." The Times continues, "Attorneys for the pair argued that the verdict should be thrown out because, except for one charge, the crimes did not fall within the statute of limitations for racketeering."

Scalia Rebukes Alito In Speedy Trial Case Ruling. The Legal Times (6/6, Mauro) reports, "Just four months after joining the Supreme Court, Samuel Alito Jr. on Monday joined the club of jurists who have been targets of Justice Antonin Scalia's wrath." The Times continues, "Alito wrote Zedner v. United States for a unanimous Court on Monday, siding with a criminal defendant in a dispute over interpretation of the Speedy Trial Act. But Scalia, while joining the decision, wrote a concurrence criticizing Alito for citing the legislative history of the statute, which Scalia believes is irrelevant. … 'Because the use of legislative history is illegitimate and ill advised in the interpretation of any statute -- and especially a statute that is clear on its face -- I do not join this portion of the Court's opinion,' Scalia wrote." The Times adds, "The side spat is a small but significant sign of Alito's independence from Scalia, whom many presumed would be a consistent conservative ally and friend. … In the drafting process, Alito could easily have mollified Scalia by deleting the paragraph that invoked legislative history. In interpreting acts of Congress, Scalia has vocally criticized reliance on legislative history -- congressional floor statements, committee reports, and the like -- in his 20 years on the Court, preferring instead to go strictly by the words of the statute. But the fact that Alito left the paragraph in, and Scalia felt moved to object to it, revealed at least some daylight between the two. … Alito's use of legislative history places him closer to the camp of moderate-liberal Justice Stephen Breyer, who last year warned in his book 'Active Liberty' of 'the danger that lurks where judges rely too heavily on text.'" The Times notes, 'Monday's ruling favored Jacob Zedner, indicted in 1996 on seven charges of bank fraud. Both he and the prosecution sought delays in the trial, raising red flags because of requirements of the Speedy Trial Act that a trial begin 70 days after a defendant is charged. Responding to a request from the judge, Zedner signed a form waiving his rights 'for all time' under the law. … After four years of procedural delays, Zedner moved to dismiss the indictment, claiming the prosecution had violated the Speedy Trial Act. The motion was denied, the trial proceeded, and he was found guilty. The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled against Zedner, finding that because he had contributed to the delay in the trial, he could not object to it."

High Court To Consider Retroactivity Of "Blakely." The AP (6/6) reports, "The Supreme Court said Monday it will decide whether inmates can reopen challenges to prison sentences based on a Court ruling two years ago that limited judicial discretion in sentencing." The AP continues, "Justices will hear arguments this fall from Lonnie Burton, who is serving nearly 47 years in prison in Washington state for rape, robbery and burglary. … Burton's lawyers told justices that the judge increased Burton's sentence by about 21 years, declaring that he deserved a harsher sentence than the sentencing scheme provided for there." The AP adds, "The case two years ago was also from Washington state. Justices on a 5-4 vote overturned the sentence of a Washington state man for kidnapping his estranged wife. A judge, acting alone, had determined that Ralph Blakely acted with 'deliberate cruelty' and deserved a longer prison term. … Justices did not say then how the decision would affect old cases. Justice Antonin Scalia authored that opinion, for an odd right-left lineup of justices."

Texas Man Slated For Execution For 1992 Murder. The AP (6/6, Graczyk) reports, "A man who killed his girlfriend with an ax while he was high on crack cocaine is to be executed by lethal injection Tuesday, the 11th person to be put to death in Texas this year." The AP continues, "Timothy Titsworth, 34, is the first of three scheduled to die this month in the nation's most active capital punishment state. The U.S. Supreme Court refused to review Titsworth's case in January." The AP adds, "Evidence showed Titsworth, who dropped out of school before he reached high school and worked as a roofer, was high on crack cocaine at the time of the July 23, 1992, attack. … 'I didn't think that I had a problem and didn't accept the help and treatment provided to me,' Titsworth, who had walked out of at least two drug treatment programs, wrote on an anti-death penalty Web site. 'With my fear, ignorance and denial of the truth that so many others have seen, I ended up here: on Texas death row.' … Before the killing, Titsworth had avoided a five-year prison term for auto theft by attending a boot camp for two months, an option available to him as a first-time felony offender. He was released on probation. … Three months later, he was arrested and charged with capital murder for the slaying of his girlfriend, who died at the mobile home they shared in Amarillo, in north Texas. Christine Sossaman, 26, had been hit about 16 times with a dull two-bladed ax as she slept."

Duke To Reinstate Lacrosse Team. ABC World News Tonight (6/5, story 11, :15, Gibson) reported, "The Duke University lacrosse team is being reinstated. Duke's president said today the team will be allowed to play next season under strict rules and on probation. The team's season was cancelled in April after an exotic dancer claimed she was raped by three team members."

Two Women Charged With Insurance Fraud In California Hit-And-Run Cases. The Los Angeles Times (6/6, Dimassa) reports, "Two women in their 70s were arraigned today on nine counts of fraud in connection with multimillion-dollar life insurance policies they took out on two homeless men who were later killed in hit-and-run accidents." The Times continues, "The women, Olga Rutterschmidt and Helen Golay, pleaded not guilty to the charges, which include mail fraud and aiding and abetting a crime in connection with life insurance statements. … Authorities have said that the women are suspects in the 2005 death of Kenneth McDavid and the 1999 death of Paul Vados. The women allegedly took out 19 life insurance policies on the men and eventually cashed in more than $2.2 million in claims after the transients died in hit-and-run pedestrian accidents in Los Angeles. … No charges have been filed in the men's deaths. … U.S. Magistrate Judge Paul L. Abrams ordered a July 25 trial date for Rutterschmidt and Golay, who remain in federal custody."

Police Lineups Called Flawed, But Improvements Seen Unlikely. In an op-ed in the New York Times (6/6), David Feige, a former public defender in the Bronx, writes, "The police lineup — in which the anxious eyewitness casts an accusing gaze on a string of sullen men (or women) on the other side of one-way glass — is as much a staple of actual law enforcement as it is of 'C.S.I.' and 'Law & Order.' It is also highly flawed. Yet because of a poorly designed study of lineups in Illinois, much-needed improvements to the process may not be forthcoming." Feige continues, "For some time now, scientists, criminologists and defense lawyers have advocated ending the tradition of having the witness view potential suspects all at once and going instead to a sequential method, in which the witness views suspects (or photographs of them) one at a time. Better still is the 'double-blind' sequential test, in which the law-enforcement official administering the lineup does not know who is the suspect and who are 'fillers.' … A pilot project in Minneapolis and a generation of peer-reviewed laboratory experiments have concluded that the sequential method has a smaller error rate than old-fashioned simultaneous lineups. New Jersey now uses sequential lineups, and legislatures or commissions in California, North Carolina, Virginia and Wisconsin have endorsed them. … In April, however, Illinois officials released a study showing the new method was less reliable than the traditional one, based on results in three police districts. According to the study, witnesses using the sequential method picked out an innocent person — someone brought in as a filler — 9 percent of the time, compared with a 3 percent rate for simultaneous lineups (both figures are oddly below the typical error rate in such studies of 20 percent or more)." Feige adds, "Prosecutors often tell us defense lawyers that they, too, want the fairest possible trials. But when it comes to identifications, it seems they want precisely what the current flawed lineups give them: suspect identifications."

More Colleges Offering Training In Digital Forensics. USA Today (6/6, Swartz) reports, "One of the hottest new courses on U.S. college campuses is a direct result of cybercrime" -- digital forensics. Already "about 100 colleges and universities offer undergraduate and graduate courses in digital forensics, with a few offering majors." While, "five years ago, there were only a handful." The field is "considered a crucial weapon in law enforcement's escalating war against computer-related crimes." The FBI, National Security Agency and the CIA, local law-enforcement officials and companies are all said to be "clamoring for experts in finding and preserving digital evidence."

Children Abducted By Parents Life Uncertain Lives. In a lengthy front-page article, the Washington Post (6/6, Montes) reports on children abducted by a parent, focusing on Carl Dodd and his 13-year search for the daughter whose mother he has accused of abducting from Washington, DC. The Post reports that "the teenager who greeted him at the police department in April was distant, doubtful. She asked him pointed questions: Why had her mother been arrested? Why were so many reporters around? Sunglasses partially hid her eyes, and when Dodd asked her to take them off so he could really see her, she refused. She made it clear she intended to stay with her grandmother in Wilmington, Del. … The reunion may have ended Dodd's determined search for his daughter, Marilyn Byrd, who disappeared with her mother from Southeast Washington when she was 4. But it was just the beginning of the long road back to a relationship with his only child, now a young woman of 17." The Post adds, "For people who spent their childhoods hiding out with a distraught parent, taking on new identities, the hardest part comes when the child is recovered and so-called normal life resumes. That is when they finally can afford to get angry about being used as a pawn in a nasty battle between the two people they loved the most. … Few understand Marilyn Byrd's conflicting emotions better than three people who spoke recently about their lingering bitterness over childhoods on the lam: … · Rebekah Ford, 28, a Wisconsin resident, still shudders as she recalls the most shocking moment of her childhood. It was the day the FBI came to her elementary school and showed her a flattened milk carton with her picture on it. Until then, she did not know that she was a missing child and that her name was not Heather Ann Brown. … Sam Potash of Philadelphia, who just turned 19, can finally speak publicly about the 8 1/2 months he spent on the run with his father when he was 10. He got used to pretending his name was Ben Davis and repeating the lie that his mother -- who was desperately searching for him -- was dead. … One of Liss Hart-Haviv's most vivid memories is trying to comfort her sobbing mother in a phone booth outside a California women's shelter after they had fled from her father. She was 10 and felt so old and alone. She even had a different name. … Three years ago, Hart-Haviv started Take Root, the first national organization for adults who went through such experiences as children. The cases continue to grow: More than 200,000 children are taken each year by a parent or other family member, according to the Justice Department."

CIVIL LAW:

High Court Rules Against Reporters Seeking To Keep Sources Secret. The Christian Science Monitor (6/6, Richey) reports, "Four journalists have lost their bid to reverse a judge's order to either disclose their confidential sources or face $500 per day in fines." The US Supreme Court yesterday "declined to take up the reporters' cases to examine whether a generally recognized 'reporters' privilege' against revealing sources should extend to a civil lawsuit brought by former nuclear-weapons-lab scientist Wen Ho Lee." The action "marks the second time in a year that the justices have let stand a judicial order seeking to force members of the media to renege on professional pledges of confidentiality made to government officials to obtain information for their news reporting."

The Wall Street Journal/AP (6/6) reports, "Late last week, Mr. Lee, who had sued the government for violating his rights under the Privacy Act, settled the lawsuit. He will receive $1.6 million from the government and five news organizations." Journalists "had been in civil contempt of court for refusing to disclose who leaked them information about an espionage investigation of Mr. Lee. The four reporters are H. Josef Hebert of the Associated Press, James Risen of the New York Times, Bob Drogin of the Los Angeles Times and Pierre Thomas, formerly of CNN and now working for ABC News." The Washington Post (6/6, A3, Lane) notes the reporters "no longer face contempt-of-court penalties for not naming their confidential sources, and their attorneys had been expected to file papers with the court asking it to dismiss the matter as moot."

LATimes Urges "Shield Law." The Los Angeles Times (6/6) editorializes, "Five news organizations -- including the Los Angeles Times -- agreed last week to pay a total of $750,000 to Wen Ho Lee, a former nuclear scientist who was arrested in 1999 and jailed for nine months as part of an espionage investigation at the Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico. The payments, part of a negotiated settlement of Lee's lawsuit accusing the US government of leaking information to the media from his personnel files, mean that reporters for The Times and the other news organizations won't be punished for declining to identify confidential sources." But "that slippery slope can be avoided if Congress follows the example of two-thirds of the states (including California) and enacts a 'shield law' providing limited but real protection to journalists' confidential sources."

SCOTUS Limits Firm's Use Of Civil RICO Suits. The AP (6/6, Locy) reports, "The Supreme Court on Monday limited the use of civil anti-racketeering laws by companies seeking damages for allegedly illegal acts by their competitors." The AP continues, "In two separate cases, the high court tackled the growing controversy over the increased use of civil provisions of a federal law that was designed to root out organized crime from legitimate businesses. The AP adds, "By an 8-1 vote, justices reversed an appeals court decision that had allowed Ideal Steel Supply Corp., a New York steel mill product supplier, to sue its chief competitor, National Steel Supply Inc., owned by Joseph and Vincent Anza. … Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, writing for the majority in the steel company case, said the victim of racketeering must suffer 'direct' injury from illegal acts. … Ideal Steel Supply alleged that National Steel Supply defrauded New York state tax authorities by offering lower prices minus taxes to customers who paid in cash. … But Kennedy said the direct victim of the fraud was not Ideal Steel Supply but New York state."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ To Monitor Elections In California, Alabama. The AP (6/6) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice said Monday that it will monitor Tuesday's primary election in seven California counties to make sure officials adequately serve voters who don't speak English." The AP continues, "Alameda, Orange, San Benito, San Diego, San Mateo, Santa Clara and Ventura counties all are required to provide election information, ballots and voting assistance information in one or more minority languages under the 1965 federal Voting Rights Act." The AP adds, "In San Diego County, for instance, officials settled a federal lawsuit in 2004 by agreeing to provide voting materials in Spanish, Tagalog and Vietnamese, along with poll workers who can translate in those languages. … Alameda County is using paper ballots in Tuesday's primary because its 4,000 Diebold Election Systems touchscreen machines failed to meet federal and state standards. That is expected to cause delays in reporting the election outcome because the county does not have enough optical scanners to count the ballots at all polling places. … In each of the seven counties, observers directed by lawyers from the department's Civil Rights Division will watch and record voting activities at polling places. The department also will monitor elections in Alabama, New Jersey, New Mexico and South Dakota, all of which have primary elections on Tuesday."

The AP (6/6) reports, "The federal government will monitor polling place activities during primary elections in Hale County, Ala., on Tuesday to ensure compliance with the Voting Rights Act, the Justice Department announced Monday." The AP continues, "Hale County is one of 18 counties in Alabama, California, New Jersey, New Mexico and South Dakota to be monitored during Tuesday's voting. … Federal observers will watch and record activities during voting hours at polling locations to ensure that the rights of voters to participate in the election is not denied on the basis of their race. The department sends hundreds of observers each year to monitor elections across the country."

Bush Calls For Constitutional Amendment To Ban Gay Marriage. President Bush yesterday called for a constitutional amendment to ban same sex marriage. Bush's remarks were reported by all three networks last night, and are receiving ample attention on local TV stations and today's major newspapers. With the amendment being given little chance of passing – chances are "slim to none," said CNN's The Situation Room (6/5, Blitzer), while USA Today (6/6, Stone) estimates there's "virtually no chance" the Senate will approve it – the President's speech is being portrayed as an effort to rally his social conservative base with an eye on the November elections. The Los Angeles Times (6/6, Reynolds, Gerstenzang) reports White House Press Secretary Tony Snow "acknowledged there was a 'political dimension' to Bush's speech, because the measure was before the Senate, but said in response to a question, 'I don't think it's posturing.'" The Times adds, "As for making same-sex marriage a priority at a time when issues such as the war in Iraq have hurt Bush's poll numbers, Snow said the president could 'deal with more than one issue at a time.'" Bush "spoke at the Eisenhower Executive Office Building, next door to the White House. Some of those invited had been told the session would take place in the White House Rose Garden, a location that would have elevated the status of the meeting, but without explanation the venue was shifted."

The AP (6/5, Kellman) reports "all Senate Democrats, except Ben Nelson of Nebraska, oppose the amendment," and "together with moderate Republicans, the Democrats are expected to block" it. ABC World News Tonight (6/5, lead story, 2:45, Tapper) reported, "The President's critics say Mr. Bush spent the day putting important issues, such as the war in Iraq, on the back burner. The President met with religious leaders today in order to put a Federal constitutional ban on same sex marriage on the front burner." It's an "issue that the President used during his re-election campaign to rally his Christian conservative base. Many have been angry about the President's relative silence on the subject since then." But passage of the amendment is "highly unlikely." According to "a new ABC News poll, 58% of Americans say same-sex marriage should be illegal. But only 42% favor amending the Constitution. 51% say it should be up to the individual states."

On ABC World News Tonight (6/5, story 2, 1:20, Stephanopoulos) reported, "The politics are all about intensity. And according to our poll, the number of Americans who are strongly opposed to gay marriage is more than two the size of the number who are strongly for it. And that group of voters who want to block gay marriage is three-times as likely to vote on the issue. So, even though you're not going to see the President spending a lot of public time on this after today, the Republicans are going to zero in on those motivated voters, with targeted radio ads, with mailings especially in rural areas of Pennsylvania, Ohio and Missouri, where the incumbent's in tight races."

NBC Nightly News (6/5, story 4, 2:25, Gregory) reported, "Just a year ago, he said he really wasn't going to be pushing this issue because the support wasn't there. But what's changed? Only the fact that the President and his party now feel they need this issue." Today's remarks were "similar to those the President made during his last election year push on this issue two years ago." Then, "there weren't enough votes and the amendment died. Today, the votes still aren't there, but there is now plenty of pressure on this President to rally his conservative base and convince so-called values voters to get out and vote this fall." With his "second term hobbled by the war in Iraq, gay marriage is just one issue important to conservatives the President is highlighting."

The CBS Evening News (6/5, story 8, 0:20, Mitchell) reported, "The amendment has become a rallying point for Republicans this election year, and the Senate opens debate on it tomorrow but backers there do not have the two-thirds majority they need for passage."

Fox News' Special Report (6/5, Hume) reported that "while this thing may not succeed legislatively, there are some who think it might make some sense politically." CNN's The Situation Room (6/5, Blitzer) said "many Republicans are keen on making a statement in this congressional election year, including President Bush. With his conservative base shakier than ever, Mr. Bush declared…that he's proud to stand with supporters of a gay marriage ban." CNN's The Situation Room (6/5, Bash) later reported that Republicans have a "short-term political goal here, and that is the fact that conservatives say across the board, that they are very upset about the way their Republican leaders here in Washington, especially those up for reelection in 2006 are governing and they simply think that they have not paid attention to their issues enough."

Local TV coverage of Bush's remarks was extensive, with at least 500 local television newscasts across the country running. Local reports also suggested the President intends to use the issue to solidify support for the GOP among conservative voters before November's midterms. A less pervasive, but still prominent, theme of many of the segments was the President's silence on the issue since winning reelection -- a reelection several stations attributed, at least partially, to his opposition to gay marriage at the time. Many stations featured Sen. Joseph's Biden complaint, taken from NBC's Meet the Press on Sunday, that "the world's going to Hades in a handbasket" while the Senate debates gay marriage and other hot-button social issues. Typical of the coverage was WBBM TV Chicago (6/5, 6 PM), which reported that though the White House "says the President, who has been largely silent on the issue since his re-election, is talking about it now because of the impending senate vote" some "critics call the timing suspect."

WAGA TV Atlanta (6/5, 10 PM) reported that the President "said marriage between a man and a woman is one of the most fundamental and important human institutions and…should not be redefined by so-called 'activist' judges, who he says are overturning the state laws that ban gay marriage against the will of the majority of voters." WAGA noted that "last month, a state court judge here in Georgia struck down the state's constitution ban on gay marriage on a technicality."

KABC TV Los Angeles (6/5, 11 AM) reported "is hoping to use the topic to win political points in November."

WFLA TV Tampa-St. Petersburg (6/5, 11:30) asked, "Why this issue, Why now? … Opposition to gay marriage helped power the president to reelection in 2004 his critics now see a political diversion."

WJBK TV Detroit (6/5, 12 PM) reported, "Gay right activists are gearing up to blanket Capitol Hill. They're urge urging senators to vote against the banning of gay marriage." A gay activist was shown saying, "We're talking…discrimination being put in the constitution. That couldn't be more out of line with where with where the American people are right now."

Knight Ridder (6/5, Douglas) reports "critics on both sides of the debate accused the president of playing politics with the socially sensitive issue by seeking to rouse social conservatives to support Republicans in this congressional election year even if the cause has no realistic hope of enactment," and Bloomberg (6/6, Keil) says Bush made his pitch for the amendment "facing record low job-approval ratings…as he and his Republican Party seek to rally supporters ahead of the November congressional elections."

The Washington Post (6/6, Abramowitz, Babington) reports, "Aides have portrayed the president as a somewhat reluctant warrior in a battle forced on him by judges who have struck down laws against same-sex marriage in Maryland, New York and other states." The White House itself "has been unusually divided on the issue, with Vice President Cheney making it clear that he disagrees with the president and first lady Laura Bush saying the issue should not be made a political tool." Los Angeles Times (6/6, Reynolds, Gerstenzang) also mentions Cheney's stance in the last paragraphs of its story.

The New York Times (6/6, Rutenberg) reports "Republican Party officials in several states have released statements attacking Democrats who are not expected to vote for the amendment," and a "conservative group, the Family Research Council, is planning to ask lawmakers to take 'a marriage protection pledge' and then tell voters who signs it and who does not."

Some analysts see risks for the GOP as the debate shifts to this issue. CQ (6/6, Perine) reports some conservatives "are dismayed that Senate Republican leaders have backed away from their vow to move all of President Bush's appellate court nominations through the Senate. And many oppose provisions in the Senate's immigration overhaul measure (S 2611) that would set millions of illegal immigrants on a path to citizenship." Larry Sabato, a University of Virginia political scientist, "says this week's truncated debate on gay marriage could cause conservatives to ask themselves 'why bother to vote for Republicans when they can't produce on our issues?'"

Moreover, the Christian Science Monitor (6/6, Feldmann) says "the GOP's efforts at creating a 'big tent' image will be put to the test. Some of the most vulnerable members of Congress -- many of them moderate Republicans from the Northeast -- could be hurt by the debate, as it highlights a point of view less resonant in that part of the country than in others."

Republicans Hope Vote Will Help DeWine, Santorum. The Wall Street Journal (6/6, Lueck, Mullins) reports Republicans "hope the bill can help some embattled candidates at the polls. One is Ohio Republican Sen. Mike

DeWine. A gay-marriage ban on the 2004 ballot in the Buckeye State is widely credited with drawing evangelicals to the polls and helping Mr. Bush narrowly carry that state. But Mr. De-Wine opposed that measure, citing objections to language that he said would invite lawsuits. That is one reason he appears to have trouble rallying social conservatives. This year, Mr. DeWine is a sponsor of the Senate amendment, which doesn't include the language he objected to previously." In Pennsylvania, "where Republican Sen. Rick Santorum is in a close contest to keep his seat, Republicans have highlighted his support of the gay-marriage amendment to help separate him from Democrat Bob Casey Jr."

The Washington Times (6/6, Dinan, Fagan) notes the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) "used the Senate's marriage-amendment debate to criticize the Democratic challenger to Sen. Rick Santorum, a Pennsylvania Republican facing a tough re-election battle." They chided Casey "for not speaking at a Saturday meeting in Pittsburgh of the Stonewall Democrats, a homosexual rights group that supports him. Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean did speak to the group." From the other side, "the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee sent out an e-mail to supporters yesterday from Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, blasting Republicans. 'It's election season and down-in-the-polls Republicans are turning to their same old playbook -- fear and division,' wrote Mr. Reid, Nevada Democrat. 'We need a president and a Congress that doesn't play divisive politics.'"

Kennedy Says Gay Marriage Amendment Is Bigotry. Fox News' Special Report (6/5, Hume) reported, "Senator Ted Kennedy says the constitutional amendment banning gay marriage is bigotry pure and simple." Kennedy "says the amendment should be called quote, the right wining election strategy amendment, and accused the administration of using fear tactics."

More Commentary. Columnist E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (6/6), "This month's offensive by President Bush and his allies in Congress against gay marriage and flag burning proves one thing: The Republican Party thinks its base of social conservatives is a nest of dummies who have no memories and respond like bulls whenever red flags are waved in their faces. The people who should be angry this week are not liberals or gays or lesbians, but the president's most loyal supporters. … When Bush was at his position of maximum strength after the 2004 election, did he use his political energy on behalf of a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage? Not at all."

Eugene Robinson writes in the Washington Post (6/6, A15), "What uncharted realm lies beyond brazen cynicism? A wasteland of utter shamelessness, perhaps? A vast Sahara of desperation, where principle goes to die? Someday George W. Bush and the Republican right will be able to tell us all about this barren terra incognita, assuming they ever find their way home. The Decider's decision to whip up a phony crisis over same-sex marriage -- Values under attack! Run for your lives! -- is such a transparent ploy that even conservatives are scratching their heads, wondering if this is the best Karl Rove could come up with." Bush "might as well open his next presidential address by giving himself a new title: The Distracter."

Supreme Court To Hear Affirmative Action Cases. ABC World News Tonight (6/5, story 10, :20, Gibson) reported, "The Supreme Court said today it will decide a major affirmative action issue -- whether public schools can use race as a factor in deciding which students attend which public schools. It will consider cases from Seattle to Louisville. But the case pertains to many more cities and the court will hear arguments in the fall."

The CBS Evening News (6/5, story 7, 0:20, Mitchell) reported, "This is the first time the two Bush appointees," Chief Justice John Roberts and Associate Justice Samuel Alito "will rule on a racial issue." NBC Nightly News (6/5, story 3, 0:35, Williams) said that during their "years as Justice Department lawyers, both Chief Justice John Roberts and Associate Justice Samuel Alito strongly opposed racial quotas."

USA Today (6/6, Biskupic) says the Seattle and Louisville cases "test whether the Constitution's guarantee of equality allows schools to use race as a factor in admissions. In both disputes, lower courts backed the school plans, and parents of white students appealed."

The New York Times (6/6, Greenhouse) reports the court's action came three years "after the court upheld a racially conscious admissions plan at the University of Michigan Law School. Writing for the majority in that 5-to-4 decision, Grutter v. Bollinger, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor suggested that, at least in higher education, affirmative action might be necessary for another 25 years." The new cases "do not ask the court to revisit that decision, and the justices are unlikely to do so. But the implications are far-reaching nonetheless. T he eventual decision, roughly a year from now, could not only set the court's path in this area but could also shape the climate in which government policies with respect to race will be debated."

The AP (6/6, Holland) reports, "The court's announcement that it will take up the cases this fall provides the first sign of an aggressiveness by the court under new Chief Justice John Roberts. The court rejected a similar case in December when moderate O'Connor was still on the bench. The outcome will most likely turn on her successor, Alito. … Both Roberts, 51, and Alito, 56, worked as Justice Department lawyers during the Reagan administration to limit affirmative action."

The Legal Times (6/6, Mauro) reports, "The cases granted review on Monday, Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1 and Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education, will be argued together this fall, possibly injecting the affirmative action debate into the election season. In both cases, white parents challenged programs that used race as a factor in school placements in ways that they say disadvantaged white students." The Times adds, "In Seattle, where students have broad choice as to which high school they will attend, race is a 'tiebreaker' factor in deciding which students will be assigned to a high school that is oversubscribed and racially imbalanced. The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, in an en banc ruling citing Grutter, upheld the program last October. … The other case involves schools in Louisville and the surrounding area, a district that was under a federal court desegregation decree from 1975 to 2000. After the order was lifted, a new plan was adopted that allowed for a wider range of student choices but required all schools to seek a black student enrollment of between 15 percent and 50 percent of the student body. In June 2004, Judge John Heyburn II of the Western District of Kentucky upheld the program in general, though he disapproved of some of the racial categorizing involved."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/6, Richey), Washington Post (6/6, A3, Lane), Los Angeles Times (6/6, Savage), Wall Street Journal (6/6, Bravin, Ben Winograd) and Washington Times (6/6, Price), among other sources, run similar stories on the case.

Verizon Hit With Record Penalty In Bias Suit.

The Washington Post (6/6, D1, Joyce) reports, "Verizon Communications Inc. will pay almost $49 million to 12,326 current and former female employees as part of a landmark class-action lawsuit alleging pregnancy discrimination." The Post continues, "The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission reached a settlement in 2002 against Verizon predecessors Nynex Corp. and Bell Atlantic Corp. But the total amount of the settlement was not made public until yesterday, when the EEOC completed its projections of how much would be paid in future benefits. … The final figure makes the case the largest pregnancy discrimination settlement in EEOC history. It covers women in 13 states and the District." The Post adds, "Nynex and Bell Atlantic were accused of violating federal law by denying women pension and other benefit accruals when they spent time on pregnancy or maternity leave. … The total compensation paid thus far is more than $25.3 million. The EEOC told a U.S. District Court in New York yesterday that it projected that an additional $23.6 million would be paid in future benefits. The announcement came after years of calculating which women were denied benefits when on leave. … The suit alleged that the predecessor companies violated the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Pregnancy Discrimination Act of 1978 and the Equal Pay Act of 1963 by denying women service credits for leaves of absence taken between July 1965 and April 1979. The companies also denied pension credits for child-care leaves of absence until December 1983."

ANTITRUST:

Adobe, Microsoft Square Off In PDF Dispute.

The San Jose Mercury News (6/6, Boudreau) reports, "Adobe Systems and Microsoft have seemed to co-exist in a mutually beneficial ecosystem for years. … But their cause for common ground, a little piece of software millions have used but may have hardly noticed -- the Adobe PDF -- is now the reason the gloves are coming off." The News continues, "At the core of the tension is Microsoft's move to create technology to compete with Adobe's PDF franchise, and difficult negotiations around incorporating Adobe's mostly open standard PDF software into the next generation of Office programs. … While Microsoft makes software such as Word and Excel that lets people create documents, Adobe can turn those documents you might print out on paper into digital, ready-to-be-e-mailed files through its Portable Document Format (.pdf)." The News adds, "Last week, behind-the-scenes friction between the two became public when Microsoft said it expected Adobe to file a lawsuit against the Redmond, Wash. company, possibly in the European Union, which recently has become more receptive to Microsoft antitrust concerns than U.S. regulators. … The dispute underscored the Silicon Valley axiom: Companies that cooperate often can end up trying to devour each other's business. … Adobe makes money from its business-document processing software Adobe Acrobat, which is part of its Intelligent Document division and accounted for 36 percent of its revenue, or $708 million, in 2005. A person must own a copy of Adobe Acrobat to make a PDF, but only needs to download a free version of Acrobat Reader to view a PDF that has been sent to them."

In a column for the Washington Post (6/6, D5), Rob Pegoraro writes, "If you want to know why so many computer programs are so bad these days, take a look at the Adobe-Microsoft mess. … These two powerful software developers have gotten into an argument over whether Microsoft can include a new feature in its upcoming Office 2007 productivity suite -- the ability to save your work as a Portable Document Format (PDF) file. … In the process, they're showing how old-fashioned greed and the more modern ailment of lawsuit phobia can turn a promising program sour." Pegoraro continues, "Judged strictly on its merits, there's nothing to argue about that feature. It would end the worry that your Word, Excel or PowerPoint document might look weird or be unreadable on someone else's computer. PDF files preserve their appearance -- from fonts to footnotes to photos -- wherever they're read, so long as a recipient has a PDF-reader program. These programs, almost all free, are available for nearly every kind of computer, down to "smart phones" and handheld organizers. … Competing productivity suites, such as Corel's WordPerfect Office and the free and open-source OpenOffice.org, have offered this option for years. So does Apple's Mac OS X, which offers PDF output as a systemwide feature. When Microsoft announced in October that it would follow suit in its next release of Office, it seemed like a refreshing acknowledgment of reality in Redmond, Wash. … You'd think that would have delighted Adobe as well. The San Jose, Calif., firm has worked for years to establish the PDF as a standard way to share data, having written versions of its free Adobe Reader for all the major desktop and handheld operating systems. And while the company charges $299 for its Adobe Acrobat PDF-creation toolkit, it's encouraged other developers to release their own. … For some reason, however, Adobe saw things differently when Microsoft wanted to join the PDF party. As Microsoft explained, in February, Adobe asked it to sell this feature as a separate add-on for Office 2007."

Brookfield And Partner To Buy Trizec For $4.8 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (6/6, Forsyth) reports, "In a $4.8 billion deal confirming that the real-estate market for office space remains hot despite rising interest rates, Brookfield Properties Corp. and a private-equity partner agreed to buy Trizec Properties Inc." The Journal continues, "The purchase, announced yesterday, of the Chicago-based office real-estate investment trust is one of the biggest deals yet in a continuing frenzy of mergers and acquisitions in the public real-estate world. Brookfield, based in Toronto and New York, is pairing with the Blackstone Group, a private-equity firm that has been involved in a number of high-profile acquisitions over the past few months, including a $2.8 billion buyout of CarrAmerica Realty Corp. in March." The Journal adds, "The Trizec acquisition gives Brookfield -- already one of the largest players in office real estate in North America -- an even bigger profile in the hot markets of Washington and Manhattan, and provides an entry into Los Angeles, another market that has caught fire in the past few quarters. … Included in the deal is the acquisition of Trizec Canada Inc., a mutual fund traded on the Toronto Stock Exchange that has a 38% interest in Trizec Properties. Brookfield will acquire the shares of Trizec Properties and Trizec Canada for a combined cash transaction of $4.8 billion and the assumption of about $4.1 billion in debt -- $29.01 a share for all Trizec Properties common stock not owned by Trizec Canada, and $30.97 a share for the Trizec Canada stock."

China Conglomerate Makes Bid For Canadian Oil. The Wall Street Journal (6/6, Oster, Santini, Sender) reports, "Citic Group, a state-owned conglomerate in China, is in talks to buy a closely held Canadian oil company whose main asset is a field in Kazakhstan, according to people familiar with the matter. If completed, the $2.2 billion deal would be China's third-largest overseas oil acquisition." The Journal continues, "The talks to buy Nations Energy Co., based in Calgary, Alberta, reflect the continuing efforts of Chinese energy companies to push abroad in their quest for energy. A deal isn't certain, according to one of the people familiar with the matter." The Journal adds, "A deal would be China's second-largest acquisition in oil-rich Kazakhstan. Last year, China National Petroleum Corp., China's biggest oil producer by output, beat out Russian rivals to acquire an oil field in Kazakhstan for $4.2 billion and built a pipeline to carry Kazakh crude to China. … In April, Cnooc Ltd., China's biggest offshore oil producer, bought a $2.7 billion stake in an oil field off the coast of Nigeria. … Nations Energy's main asset is the Karazhanbas oil field in Kazakhstan, which pumped 41,000 barrels of oil a day last year, according to the company's Web site. Both Cnooc and CNPC had passed up on buying the company."

Cathay In Talks To Buy Stake In Dragonair. The Wall Street Journal (6/6, Stanley, Santini) reports, "Cathay Pacific Airways is in talks to acquire a controlling stake in Hong Kong Dragon Airlines, people familiar with the matter said, in a long-anticipated deal that would greatly expand Cathay's access to China's sizzling aviation market and plug the biggest hole in its global network." The Journal continues, "A deal for Hong Kong-based Dragonair, as the company is known, could be valued at more than 8 billion Hong Kong dollars (US$1 billion) in cash and stock, according to a person knowledgeable about it. An agreement could be announced within days, but the terms aren't yet clear and the deal could still unravel, said the people familiar with the matter." The Journal adds, "Cathay Pacific would purchase the controlling stake from two mainland Chinese companies that together own 71.8% of Dragonair, these people said. It would also purchase a 7.7% stake held by Swire Pacific Ltd., part of the London-based Swire Group and Cathay's largest shareholder. The moves would simplify the complex relationship between the companies. Cathay already owns a 17.8% stake in Dragonair. … Cathay once controlled Dragonair but lost its influence, and relations between them soured. Now, in spite of its home base in Hong Kong, Cathay operates a thin passenger service to just two Chinese cities. While Dragonair flies to 23 destinations in China, more than any other airline based outside the mainland, Cathay has had to watch from the sidelines as many of its toughest foreign competitors have started and expanded their own lucrative networks in China."

Johanns, Leavitt Deliver Bird Flu Update. The Wall Street Journal Online (6/6) reports Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt and Agriculture Secretary Michael Johanns Monday briefed reporters on the latest news surrounding the spread of bird flu and what it means for the United States. Following Monday's briefing, Leavitt and Johanns appeared on several cable news programs. The Washington Post (6/6, A6) also reports the story in its "Washington In Brief" section.

Johanns Says Awareness Of Bird Flu Is Growing. In an interview with Bloomberg After Hours (6/5, 5:36 PM) Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said the US is "better prepared today than they were yesterday and tomorrow they'll be better prepared than they were today. … The awareness of this issue continues to ratchet up and as we talk to companies, they're paying attention to this idea: How do I run my business if all of a sudden 40% of my work force isn't here?"

Johanns was asked on CNBC's Power Lunch (6/5, 1:41 PM) what can be done to keep the virus from coming to this part of the world. Johanns said, "We do a number of things, we work with Homeland Security. They're there to protect borders, and do inspections, so, we have quarantines when birds come in, if they're a bird that has been here, we have quarantine procedures for them. We do a lot of surveillance testing. We work with the Department of Interior."

Leavitt Says Americans Should Prepare For US Outbreak Of Bird Flu. HHS Secretary Michael Leavitt was asked on Bloomberg After Hours (6/5, 5:36 PM) if Americans "should start to worry" about an outbreak in the US. Leavitt said, "The best thing is to do all you can to prepare and then relax. What can you do to prepare? If you're in a household, it's a good idea to have nonperishable food stored. If you have children who go to school, it would be a good idea to think through how you would care for them. These are the same provisions you would make for any kind of a disaster, whether it's a hurricane or bioterrorism event or nuclear event. Any of those would require this kind of preparation so basic prepared sentence what we're advocating."

Leavitt Downplays Case Of Human To Human Transmission Of Bird Flu Virus In Indonesia. On CNBC's Power Lunch (6/5, 1:41 PM), Leavitt was asked if he is troubled by news from Indonesia that family seems to exhibit human to human contact of the avian flu. Leavitt said, "We've been tracking it very closely, in fact, some of the CDC's best scientists, literally at the scene and come to the conclusion, the best hypothesis, there has been some form of person to person transmission, but not sustainable or efficient transmission, which is really what makes a pandemic." Leavitt added, "The people who were affected were sleeping together in a very close proximity to a person who clearly had avian influenza and it was not a big surprise to find they'd received it from another person and had healthcare workers or others in the village begun to receive the virus, it would have been a big concern, but we were able to confirm that that wasn't happening, nor has there been any genetic mutation of the virus at this point. So, we're becoming increasingly comfortable that while it does add to the body of evidence there's been some person to person, it had not—it's not sustainable and not pandemic quality."

New London, CT, Approves Evictions In Eminent Domain Dispute. The Boston Globe/AP (6/6, Singer) reports, "City officials (in New London, CT) voted Monday night to begin eviction proceedings against residents who refuse to leave their riverfront homes, signaling the end may be near in an eminent domain dispute that reached the U.S. Supreme Court." The AP continues, "The City Council approved the action 5-2, authorizing the city attorney to take the necessary steps, including possible court action, to evict the remaining two families and obtain the properties. A lawyer for the families said they are considering continuing their battle with the city." The AP adds, "The small city has been trying for a decade to redevelop the once vibrant Fort Trumbull neighborhood along the Thames River. Seven homeowners challenged the city's plans to seize their properties and build a hotel, convention center and upscale condominiums, saying eminent domain can't be used to make way for private development. … But a 5-4 Supreme Court ruling last year upheld the city's right to take the homes. The court, however, said states were free to restrict eminent domain seizures, and many already have. A proposal to change Connecticut's law died in this year's state legislative session. … Since the Supreme Court ruling, all but two families have settled with the city and agreed to leave."

Activist Moves To Slow Wind Energy Projects. The New York Times (6/6, Barringer) reports on the crusade of Dan Boone against wind energy. Wind projects "are in the midst of a huge growth spurt in many parts of the country, driven by government incentives to promote alternatives to fossil fuels. But Mr. Boone, who wields a botanist's trowel and a debater's knife with equal ease, wants to slow them down with community activism, regulatory action and legal challenges." Boone "says the areas he wants to protect are uniquely vulnerable. … Mr. Boone's quiver of anti-wind arguments includes economic analyses, but his first line of attack is biological: he contends that they are a threat to bats and potentially to migratory birds and that they break up forest habitat."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Senate Panel To Hold Hearings On FBI Efforts To Seize Anderson Papers. Roll Call (6/6, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "It appears there may be an even more bizarre genesis to the FBI's already unusual attempt to seize the papers of the late journalist Jack Anderson, who was 83 when he died in December. The Senate Judiciary Committee is set to hear about the allegedly sordid past of a former Anderson reporter who tipped off the FBI when it convenes this morning to hold a hearing on the controversy. According to a Senate Judiciary Committee source, a witness will testify that the entire Anderson investigation was triggered by a tip from a man convicted and imprisoned for sodomizing a young boy and who allegedly admitted to having a history of mental illness."

Lab In Mexico May Be Main Source Of "Bad" Heroin Linked To Overdoses. There are more than 200 media references today citing a possible source for fentanyl-laced drugs connected to a rash of recent overdoses. For example, the AP (6/5, Johnson) reports, "U.S. agents, working in cooperation with the Mexican government, have closed down a lab in Mexico that might be the main source of a powerful painkiller that has killed at least 100 heroin users in eight states. John Walters…said it's still not clear whether the painkiller, fentanyl, was mixed with heroin at the lab in Mexico or after it entered the United States. 'There may be more than one source,' Walters said. 'We think this is the principal source.'" Steve Robertson said the DEA "is testing samples of fentanyl seized in a May 28 raid of a suspected fentanyl-manufacturing operation near Guadalajara but has not yet confirmed that the drug is linked to the U.S. deaths."

In a separate report, the AP (6/6, Johnson) writes, "Authorities also warned yesterday that millions of deadly doses of fentanyl-laced heroin might still be on America's streets. The mixture has caused at least 100 confirmed deaths from Philadelphia to Chicago in recent months. … Deaths caused by fentanyl-laced drugs have also occurred in Michigan, Missouri, Ohio, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland, said John Walters. … The DEA plans to gather police officers and drug enforcement agents for a national meeting on the fentanyl problem June 14-15 in Chicago, Robertson said." A version of the AP story was published in newspapers and/or posted on the Web sites of CBS News, FOX News, CNN, the New York Times, Washington Post, USA Today, Forbes, Dallas Morning News, Houston Chronicle, Chicago Sun-Times, Detroit Free Press, and the UK's Guardian.

The Chicago Tribune (6/5, Coen, Maxwell) reports Walters "said it is too soon to know if the Mexican lab was the biggest source of the illicit drug, which has killed people in eight states. But authorities believe it may have been running long enough to push a major amount of fentanyl, used legally for pain management, into the illegal drug market, he said. … Garrison Courtney …said there could be a number of illegal sources for the drug, including other laboratories. Some of it has been stolen from medical facilities where it is often used in a patch for cancer patients and others with severe pain, Courtney said." The Tribune story was published by the Kansas City Star, Myrtle Beach Sun News, and Georgia's Columbus Ledger-Enquirer.

The Chicago Tribune (6/5, Graham) also has published a story outlining the effects of fentanyl.

The Washington Post (6/5, Slevin, Lydersen) reports from Chicago that since February, coroners "have recorded 55 fentanyl-related deaths in Cook County, with 45 more cases suspected. Some were unsuspecting users taking pure fentanyl; others were users taking a mixture. Scores overdosed but recovered -- and not all regretted using it. 'There's this consumer arc. At first there's fear, but then when the fear is over, it's like: Hey, that's good stuff,' said Greg Scott, a DePaul University sociologist who conducts government-funded research on injected drugs."

The Detroit News (6/6) reports, "But a rise in deaths linked to heroin spiked with the painkiller fentanyl hasn't deterred some hardcore addicts from seeking the drug. Desperate for a high that gets elusive with time, a dedicated batch of users is turning to the cocktail whose effects can last all day." The News adds, "Authorities would not comment Monday on their evidence...and a Drug Enforcement Administration spokesman in Chicago, Chris Hoyt, said agents 'are not ready to say the lab discovered in Mexico is directly related to what's happening here.'"

Newsweek (6/12) writes, "For junkies, the fentanyl-heroin cocktail has become the hot new high, as lethal as it is alluring. It is being blamed for hundreds of deaths this year in big cities in the Midwest and Northeast. In Wayne County, Mich., home to Detroit, there have been 50 deaths in just the past two weeks, including 19 in one deadly day in May."

Man Who May Have Peddled Drug Mixture Dies. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (6/5) reports, "A man believed to be peddling a potentially deadly heroin-fentanyl combination, who was shot in a confrontation with police in University City, has died from his wounds. Maurice A. Adkins…died about 10 p.m. Sunday at Barnes-Jewish Hospital. … Officials suspect that 20 or more deaths in the St. Louis area are linked to the potent drug combination."

Pittsburgh Police Arrest 5 Following Overdoses. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/6, Silver) reports, "City police detectives were working overtime to scoop up drug dealers and lean on users for information as a lethal batch of heroin snaked its way through city neighborhoods and beyond, causing at least 35 overdoses and as many as three deaths. … City police said they have arrested five people since the outbreak began Saturday, but they declined to release any details, saying that the investigation was ongoing."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/6, Srikameswaran) also reports, "The deaths of three heroin users and the emergency treatment of 35 more have prompted an overdose prevention expert to offer this advice: If you're going to use, have someone nearby in case you need help. Alice Bell, overdose prevention project coordinator at Prevention Point Pittsburgh, the region's only needle exchange program, said there had been talk about drug users in other cities overdosing on a powerful combination of heroin and a narcotic painkiller called fentanyl. Prevention Point staff had begun to inform its needle exchangers about the potential problem, but until two days ago no one had seen it here."

According to the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (6/6), two people "died in Pittsburgh on Monday -- bringing the total fatal overdoses here to three since Sunday. At least 36 people have overdosed in Allegheny County since the drug emerged on the streets on Friday."

More Probable Overdoses Reported In Michigan. The Detroit Free Press (6/5, Damron) writes, "Six people died from probable drug overdoses between Friday and Sunday morning, bringing the total number of likely drug-related deaths to 54 since May 18. But it will take weeks to determine whether the recent deaths were related to a dangerous mix of the painkiller fentanyl and heroin or cocaine, said Teresa Blossom, a Wayne County Health Department spokeswoman."

Response To Overdoses Criticized. The Toledo (OH) Blade (6/5) editorializes, "Given the number of confirmed overdoses - 130 in Wayne County from January, 2005, through April - the slow response is troubling. While tracking down leads can be time-consuming and require significant manpower, particularly when labs producing these drugs may be outside the metro Detroit area, perhaps even overseas, surely more could have been done when the death toll is at such dramatic levels. … Drug abusers share the blame, of course, and must bear a large part of the responsibility for their own fate."

Cable TV Coverage. CNN (6/5, 4:00 p.m.) reported, "US agents have closed down a lab in Mexico that might be the main source of a powerful and deadly painkiller. Fentanyl, mixed with heroin, has killed at least 100 heroin users in eight states. The federal drug czar says it's still not clear whether it was mixed at the lab in Mexico or after it entered the US. Five people were arrested in last month's bust. Officials say millions of deadly doses of the fentanyl-laced heroin might still be on the streets."

CLTV-Cable (6/5, 7:30 p.m.) Chicago reported, "White house officials say federal agents shut down a lab in Mexico. That may be the main source of production for fentanyl, the drug that's killing all those people. They aren't yet sure if the fentanyl was mixed with heroin at the lab, or if it happened later on the streets. Officials warn there are likely millions of doses of the deadly drug still on the streets."

Local TV Coverage. WLS-TV, Chicago (6/5, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "Federal investigators now believe they have tracked down the source of that deadly heroin here in Chicago."

PBS's WTTW-TV, Chicago (6/5, 7:00 p.m.) reported, "The nation's drug czar says he may have found a batch of bad drugs. John Walters of White House Office Of National Drug Control Policy says US agents busted a lab in Mexico that was mixing heroin with a dangerous narcotic, fentanyl.

WWMT-TV, Grand Rapids-Kalamazoo-Battle Creek, Michigan (6/5, 5:30 p.m.) reported, "Agents have taken down a lab in Mexico that makes fentanyl. The powerful painkiller has killed users in eight states, but the biggest concentration comes in laced heroin in the Detroit area. Drug czar John Walters says it's not clear whether the fentanyl was mixed with heroin in the lab in Mexico, or after it entered the US. Fentanyl laced- cocaine also turned up in some cities. "

Colombian Soldiers Accused Of Killing Anti-Drugs Team, 8 Arrested. The Boston Globe (6/6) reports, "Suspicions that a Colombian military unit assassinated a US-trained, elite antinarcotics team at the bidding of the drug mafia two weeks ago have proven true, officials say, in a case that has badly shaken public confidence in the military. On May 22, 10 of the country's most successful antidrug police were killed by a military platoon in the outskirts of Jamundí, an area under the influence of narco-traffickers 195 miles southwest of the capital, near Cali. Two military officers and six soldiers were arrested Thursday on the basis of incriminating cellphone text messages and crime-scene evidence that investigators say prove the eight men planned the killings. The suspects insist the shootings were a 'friendly fire' mistake."

Six DC Officers Put On Leave In Probe Of Inmates' Escape. The Washington Post (6/6, B4, Dvorak) reports, "The D.C. Department of Corrections yesterday put six officers on paid administrative leave while authorities investigate events leading to the escape of two inmates." The Post continues, "Devon Brown, the department's director, said investigators want to determine if any of the officers deliberately aided in the escape or unintentionally made mistakes that contributed to the breakout. He would not identify the officers." The Post adds, "Ricardo Jones and Joseph Leaks broke into the warden's empty office shortly after 10 a.m. Saturday, smashed through a reinforced glass window and slid down a canopy to freedom, officials said. Both were captured Sunday, one in Maryland and the other in Virginia. … Their escape -- from the bureaucratic errors that gave Leaks enough freedom on a work detail to execute the escape to the warning system that failed to properly notify the neighborhood of the breach – 'was a major breakdown,' Brown said yesterday. … The U.S. attorney's office and D.C. police are heading the criminal investigation. The Department of Corrections is conducting an internal investigation, and Brown cited several areas of special interest. … Leaks and Jones were captured by a task force led by the U.S. Marshals Service. Leaks was caught first, early Sunday, in a Fairfax County motel. Jones was captured about 11:30 p.m. Sunday after Prince George's County got a tip that he was hiding in a garage or shed in Seat Pleasant. Authorities found him in a shed in the 500 block of 71st Street, police said."

The Washington Times (6/6, McElhatton, Doolittle) reports, "Thomas Hession, chief inspector for the Capital Area Regional Fugitive Task Force, which is led by U.S. Marshals Service, said a tip to the Prince George's County Police Department led authorities to catch Jones in the backyard shed of a home in Seat Pleasant late Sunday night. Leaks was caught early Sunday at a motel in Alexandria. … Detective Michael Reese, of the Metropolitan Police Department, said the U.S. Attorney's Office is leading a criminal investigation into the escape. The probe also is being conducted by city police and the U.S. Marshals Service."

Some Dispute Effectiveness Of Federal Crime Task Force. An article distributed by Scripps Howard news service (6/6, Doyle) reports, "Federal reinforcements in Fresno, Calif., have helped local police lock up bad guys, but now investigators are questioning how well one of the law enforcement programs really works." Scripps Howard continues, "In a high-profile blitz last year, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives deployed extra troops to Fresno and some other selected cities. Welcomed by local officers and politicians alike, the Violent Crime Impact Team targeted gangs and gun-related crimes. … Since starting last June, the Fresno-based team of eight federal agents, two prosecutors and one deputy U.S. marshal have won kudos from their local colleagues. … 'It has been successful,' bureau spokeswoman Nina Delgadillo said Monday, noting that 'we have firearms that we've been able to take off of the streets.' … A 1 p.m. news conference at Fresno's federal courthouse on Thursday will give officials a chance to elaborate on their success stories." Scripps Howard adds, "The federal agents, though, also confront a perennial problem in public policy: How can they prove they're making a difference? On that, the jury may still be out. … In a new report, Justice Department investigators caution they can't be sure exactly how much credit the various Violent Crime Impact Teams deserve. There are 20 such teams nationwide, initiated as a pilot program now costing a total of $20 million this year. … 'ATF cannot conclusively show that the law enforcement operations it undertook during the ... pilot project were effective at reducing firearms crime in the target areas,' the Office of Inspector General investigators cautioned. … The Washington-based investigators, moreover, hinted at broader shortcomings. Successes may be exaggerated, teamwork hindered and goals missed. The Violent Crime Impact Team concept itself, investigators suggest, may simply be a new brand name for an old product."

Orton Selected As New US Marshal For Nevada. The AP (6/6) reports, "A former state gambling regulator has been named U.S. marshal covering Nevada." The AP continues, "Gary Orton is due to be sworn in June 16 as U.S. Marshal for the District of Nevada after being selected by President Bush. … Orton spent 26 years as an enforcement officer and deputy chief of the Nevada state Gaming Control Board. He previously spent eight years as a North Las Vegas police officer, and served in the United States Army from 1969 to 1972." The AP adds, "As U.S. marshal for Nevada, Orton will oversee security at U.S. District courts in Reno and Las Vegas and the protection of 23 federal judges, direct fugitive apprehension and federal prisoner custody and transport, and oversee federal witness security. … The marshals service also administers a Justice Department asset forfeitures program."

Maryland Man Pleads Guilty To Arson, Will Testify Against Co-Defendant. The Washington Post (6/6, B2, Castaneda) reports, "One of the two remaining defendants in an arson case that strained race relations in Southern Maryland admitted his guilt in federal court yesterday and agreed to testify for the government against the sole man still charged." The Post continues, "Michael M. Everhart, 21, entered his plea as part of an agreement to testify against Roy T. McCann, 23, the only one of five defendants in the case who has not pleaded guilty or been convicted. Everhart entered his plea during an hour-long hearing before U.S. District Judge Roger W. Titus in federal court in Greenbelt." The Post adds, "Everhart and McCann were tried in March in the arson fires that devastated a subdivision under construction in Charles County in the early morning of Dec. 6, 2004. The trial ended with a hung jury March 16, and Titus declared a mistrial. … Everhart, who was charged with 36 separate counts -- one count of arson and 35 counts of conspiracy -- pleaded guilty yesterday to one count of conspiracy to commit arson. His guilty plea and testimony could significantly bolster the government's case against McCann. … According to a statement of facts that was part of Everhart's plea bargain, Everhart joined McCann, Aaron L. Speed, Jeremy D. Parady and Patrick S. Walsh in splashing flammable materials in the entranceways of the houses they targeted. They set the fires using flares, matches, lighters and propane torches, according to the statement. … Titus set Everhart's sentencing for Sept. 8."

Convicted Murderer Still At Large, Leaving Tantalizing Clues For Federal Agents. The Los Angeles Times (6/6, Serrano) reports from Pollock, LA, "Richard Lee McNair's job in the prison factory was mending U.S. mailbags. Thousands of the leather pouches were routinely delivered to the shop at the federal maximum-security penitentiary here, and the middle-aged convict worked quietly each day, helping to stitch them back up. … Once the bags were refurbished, they were stacked on pallets, hundreds in a pile. McNair watched for four months as forklifts scooped up the pallets and hauled them to a warehouse just outside the prison walls. … One morning they carried off McNair — hidden under the bags. … And he was free again." The Times continues, "Twice before, in nearly two decades in custody, McNair has tasted freedom. Once he spread lip balm on his wrist, and slipped out of handcuffs. Another time he crawled to freedom through an air vent. Two other times his breakout attempts were foiled. … His latest escape was the first from a federal maximum security prison in 13 years. McNair, a confessed murderer, had just been moved to Pollock from the Supermax prison in Florence, Colo. — the nation's most secure lockup. … The government concedes it should have known he would again try to escape. … Since his April 5 run, he has crisscrossed the United States and Canada. He has left behind intriguing clues, almost as if daring the police and federal marshals to find him. … When he is caught, if he is caught, McNair is unlikely to go quietly. He was serving two life sentences — for shooting one man from behind and killing another at point-blank range during a 1987 burglary. … 'He has murdered in the past,' warned Deputy U.S. Marshal Richard Sansone Jr., who is based in Louisiana and is helping coordinate the manhunt. 'He will do most anything he can to stay out.' … What makes McNair, 47, tougher to catch and all the more dangerous is that he once worked in law enforcement. He is a stickler for detail and so methodical he used the Freedom of Information Act to obtain the FBI records on his last escape so he could study how they tracked him down."

IMMIGRATION:

Border Patrol Says Apprehensions Up 4%, Denies Recent Surge Of Illegals. USA Today (6/6, Keen) reports the Border Patrol "says apprehensions of illegal immigrants along the Mexican border are up nearly 4% so far this year because of increased enforcement. But advocacy groups say greater numbers are crossing the border because they are confused about conflicting legislation passed by Congress and hope to qualify for legal status." Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar "said Monday there has been no surge in the number of illegal crossings since President Bush announced in May that 6,000 National Guard troops would be sent to the border. Aguilar expects a decrease as more agents and Guard members are deployed." USA Today notes that confusion over Congressional legislation "means some illegal immigrants are being ripped off. Some pay $500-$1,000 to people claiming to be lawyers who promise to expedite applications for a guest-worker program that was passed by the Senate but not the House. Applications don't exist."

Tighter Security Along US-Mexico Border Blamed For Increased Fatalities. The Washington Post (6/6, A1, Pomfret), in a front-page story titled, "An Increasingly Deadly Trail: Tighter Border Has Illegal Immigrants Risking More Perilous Routes," reports that since 1993 "more than 3,500 people have died trying to cross into the United States through desert. And, as officials work to put more patrols and fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border, immigrant advocates fear there will be more deaths among the tens of thousands who attempt the trip." The Post adds, "Border Patrol statistics show that while the death toll mounts annually, the number of those apprehended while crossing the border has not changed significantly since 1993. But because federal agencies have tightened the border in urban areas, smugglers who move the men, women and children seeking to enter the United States illegally have funneled them onto increasingly perilous trails where temperatures are high, water is scarce and danger is abundant."

Contingent Of 6000 National Guard Troops Expected By August 1. USA Today (6/6, Hall) reports the National Guard "will have 800 troops along the U.S.-Mexican border by mid-June, and the 6,000 troops President Bush pledged to send to the southern border will be in place by Aug. 1, Lt. Gen. H. Steven Blum said Monday. … National Guard troops have worked with the Border Patrol…for nearly 20 years along the southern border, mostly helping the Border Patrol catch drug smugglers. There are nearly 500 Guard members there now, including more than 50 from Utah and Connecticut who just arrived in Arizona. None of those are part of Bush's Operation Jump Start plan to make troops available over the next two years to try to stem illegal immigration and tighten security."

The Washington Times (6/6, Seper) reports, "The presence of National Guard troops, who are not expected to perform law-enforcement functions, is aimed at freeing up Border Patrol agents to focus on enforcement along the border. A total of 300 National Guard troops are expected in Arizona by June 15."

The AP (6/6, Rotstein) reports that the troops already at the border "are working to widen the dusty dirt track used by the Border Patrol, compact it and top it with gravel so agents can get to hot spots faster."

Columnist Says US-Mexican Border Was Secure During "Braceros" Era. The New York Times' John Tierney (6/6) writes that President Bush "heads to New Mexico today to visit his new favorite school, the Border Patrol Academy. He wants it to train thousands more federal agents, but they'll make little difference unless Bush can teach Republicans the lesson learned by agents…a half century ago — the last time anyone could seriously claim the border was under control." Tierney adds, "What stopped the farmworkers from sneaking across? It wasn't simply the get-tough measures. … Along with the crackdown, officials encouraged farmers and ranchers to legally hire Mexican temporary workers called braceros. As new rules made it easier to hire braceros, the number of these legal workers doubled to more than 400,000 at the same time illegal immigration was plummeting."

Mexico Expands Environmental Reserve Along US Border. The AP (6/6, Stevenson) reports, "Mexico is creating an environmental reserve about 30 feet wide and 600 miles long on the Texas border, a 'green wall' to protect the Rio Grande from the roads and staging areas that smugglers use to ferry drugs and migrants across the frontier. … It will connect two large protected areas south of the river. When a third nature reserve, known as Ocampo, is created this year, the protected areas in Mexico will form a 'wall' of millions of acres of wilderness, matching Texas' Big Bend parks foot-by-foot along the border."

Immigration Debate Seen As Ignoring Illegals Who Have Overstayed Visas. The AP (6/6, Weissert) reports, "The little-acknowledged reality is that nearly half the estimated 12 million undocumented foreigners in the United States entered on bona fide U.S. visas — and simply never left. Authorities call them 'overstays' who have been largely overlooked in the vitriolic debate on immigration. … A study by the Washington-based Pew Hispanic Center last month indicated that 45 percent of the undocumented migrants in the United States overstayed legal visas." ICE spokesman Dean Boyd is quoted as saying, "The southwestern border gets all the attention, but it's staggering the number of people who come and overstay their visa. … It's a very large-scale problem." According to the AP, "The immigration reforms soon to be hashed out in a Congressional conference committee may crack down on employers who fail to make sure their workers are legal. But it's unclear whether the proposed reforms will send many 'overstayers' home."

Congressional Immigration Bills Blamed For Alleged Upsurge In Racism. The AP (6/6, Texeira) reports, "As the fight over immigration reform drags on, an ominous undercurrent to the debate — racism — is becoming more pronounced. From muttered ethnic slurs to violent attacks, activists say an anti-immigrant backlash seems to be growing in America's neighborhoods and workplaces. A few political leaders have called proposed immigration measures before Congress 'racist.' Some activists say the House of Representatives started it. … Some reacted the same way after the Senate passed an amendment to its immigration bill last month that declared English the national language." The AP notes that Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "called that 'racist' and 'divisive.'" The Long Island Immigration Alliance, the Southern Poverty Law Center and the Anti-Defamation League are cited as organizations that have denounced congressional legislation as "racist."

High School Teacher Praises Immigrant Students. In an op-ed for the USA Today (6/6) Patrick Welsh, a teacher at T.C. Williams High School in Alexandria, Va., writes, "With all the recent talk of immigration reform, one thing has become clear to me: While Congress still must thrash out its differences on policy, I can put real faces on this issue. Each day, I teach students who are immigrants, probably legal and illegal, and I can tell you that when I look into the eyes of these kids, I do not feel the sort of fear or loathing that some Americans have voiced. Instead, I see on their part a yearning to learn and a motivation to succeed that I don't always see in my American-born students."

TAX:

IRS Laptop Computer Lost. MSNBC.com (6/5, Sullivan) reported, "A laptop computer containing fingerprints of Internal Revenue Service employees is missing, MSNBC.com has learned. The computer was lost during transit on an airline flight in the western United States, IRS spokesman Terry Lemon said. No taxpayer information was on the lost laptop, Lemon said." The IRS "believes the computer contained information on 291 employees and job applicants, including fingerprints, names, Social Security numbers, and dates of birth. … Nothing on the computer would put taxpayer information at risk, Lemon said."

Kyl Says "Death Tax" Should Be Eliminated. Sen. Jon Kyl, chairman of the Senate Finance Subcommittee on Taxation and IRS Oversight, writes in USA Today (6/6) that the "death tax" should be eliminated. Kyl argues, "Ideally, we should repeal the death tax as many of our trading partners, including Canada and Australia, have done. At the very least, we should increase the exemption and reduce the rate to the same level as the tax on capital gains, so that those who pay it can do so without being forced to sell off business assets."

Editorials Oppose Efforts To Repeal Estate Tax. Three major papers oppose efforts to repeal the estate tax in their editorial sections this morning. An editorial accompanying Kyl's op-ed in USA Today (6/6) says, "Estate-tax opponents concede they might not have the votes for outright repeal. But they still hope to reduce the tax rate on inherited wealth to as low as 15% from the current 46%. That was a bad idea last year, and it's still a bad idea. Taxes must be paid by someone, and it is hard to think who they harm less than people who are both very rich and dead. … As they prepare to vote on what would be a huge windfall for the wealthiest Americans, senators should recall the sense of shame that prompted them to hold off last summer. Nothing has changed, except for the weather."

An editorial in the Washington Post (6/6, A14) says the "arguments for repeal are by turns wrong, muddled and internally contradictory." The Post says that "the exotic arguments in favor of abolishing the estate tax don't match the obvious ones for keeping it. The nation faces serious budget deficits, so why abolish a revenue stream? Inequality is rising, so why kill the most progressive federal tax? The competitive and meritocratic basis for the nation's economic success is under threat, so why take action that would encourage hereditary elites to entrench themselves?"

An editorial in the New York Times (6/6) also opposes abolishing the tax as well as Kyl's proposal to "drastically raise the thresholds at which the estate tax kicks in." According to the Times, "There is no moral justification for cutting estate taxes. … Any senator who votes for this bill -- or to end an expected filibuster -- does not care about the budget deficit or tax fairness, no matter what he or she may say to the contrary."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Congress Seen As Pushing Back Against Bush's Expanded Powers. USA Today (6/6, Page) reports after "five years of a concerted White House campaign, there are tentative signs that Congress and the courts are beginning to push back against what has been the greatest expansion of presidential powers in a generation or more." But those "pushing back include some congressional Republicans and conservative jurists who have been among President Bush's chief allies. The efforts surely would intensify if Democrats won control of the House or Senate in November's elections — and with it the power to convene hearings and issue subpoenas." Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., "who has pushed for stronger congressional oversight of intelligence operations," said, "You ask, 'Is the tide shifting?' and I say, 'Maybe, maybe.' If you ask me if I still feel like a lonely voice, I would say that I feel like a member of a small chorus." USA cites as examples GOP and Democratic criticism of the FBI search of Rep. William Jefferson's House office; the Senate Intelligence Committee vote to require notification about intelligence operations; the scrapped Dubai Ports deal; and treatment of terror suspects.

USA Today (6/6) lists several of the ways the Bush Administration has asserted executive power, such as secrecy in deliberation; restricted access to documents; setting aside laws or treaties; narrowly interpret new laws; warrantless domestic surveillance; and limiting judicial oversight.

Bush's "Declaratory Presidency" Seen As Flawed. In a Financial Times op-ed (6/6), Michael Fullilove, program director for global issues at the Lowy Institute for International Policy in Sydney, says that although President George W. Bush is "well known for his verbal awkardness," many of his "speeches – in particular his foreign policy speeches after 9/11 – are beautifully written and more than competently delivered." If "anything, Mr Bush's foreign policy speechifying suffers from the opposite problem: he is too verbal." But a "declaratory presidency also poses dangers. Mr Bush has badly overwritten his foreign policy, in two distinct ways. For most of his first term, Mr Bush pursued a muscular grand strategy aimed at imposing America's will on the world. He was the Charles Atlas of international relations. To reinforce his seriousness he delivered speeches that were strangers to nuance. They drew an explicit link between values and coercion, between freedom and force." It is "hard to avoid the conclusion that the sustained power of Mr Bush's language nudged the administration (and perhaps the president himself) toward risky policies that have proved costly."

Grassley Praises Paulson, Predicts Quick Confirmation. The AP (6/6, Crutsinger) reports Treasury Secretary-designate Henry Paulson Jr. "met Monday with the head of the Senate Finance Committee, who predicted that President Bush's selection…could be confirmed and on the job by early July." Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley "said he and Paulson had a productive meeting and that he believed the nomination could win Senate approval before Congress leaves for the July 4 break." Grassley said "the two covered a wide range of issues from the importance of overhauling the nation's complex tax code to the need to apply pressure to China to revalue its currency as a way of dealing with America's soaring trade deficit."

Paulson To Have Opportunity To Make Imprint On China Policy. The Washington Post (6/6, D1, Blustein) reports Paulson "may have little chance to make a mark on many economic issues. The administration's tax policies were pretty much set in Bush's first term, and its more recent big economic initiative, aimed at revamping Social Security, is moribund." But one issue "on which Paulson can surely exert influence is the U.S. relationship with China. The Treasury secretary has formal responsibility for some major decisions to be made in coming months, such as whether to label Beijing a 'currency manipulator.' And when it comes to cutting deals with Beijing, few U.S. business executives can match Paulson's record." To supporters "of warm relations between Washington and Beijing, a Paulson-led Treasury bears the promise of a heightened level of sophistication in dealing with thorny transpacific problems, especially China's policy concerning its currency, the yuan."

Former Official Says State Department Botched WMD Office Reorganization. Knight Ridder (6/6, Strobel) reports veterans weapons expert Dean Rust says the "reorganization of the State Department offices that are leading the fight against weapons of mass destruction was badly managed and politicized, which led to a flight of experts with decades of knowledge." Rust, who "watched the reorganization unfold, charges that its 'botched implementation' led many career officers to leave and 'will hamper the State Department's role at home and abroad for years to come.'" Knight Ridder adds Rust's account "appears in the upcoming issue of Arms Control Today magazine, published by the nonpartisan Arms Control Association. It's scheduled to be posted Tuesday on the group's Web site."

Republicans Voice Opposition To Bush Judicial Nominee. The Washington Post (6/6, A13) reports, "Some retired military officers have served notice that if conservatives keep pressing for a Senate confirmation vote for judicial nominee William J. Haynes II, it won't come without a fight." Democrats "have opposed Haynes since 2003, and now some Republicans are joining them. They object to his role as the Pentagon's top lawyer when controversial policies were adopted regarding harsh treatment of detainees captured in Afghanistan, Iraq and elsewhere."

Supplemental Spending Bill Still At Least $2 Billion Over White House Request. The Wall Street Journal (6/6, Rogers) reports a "$92.2 billion wartime spending bill taking shape in Congress has been cut substantially since passing the Senate last month but still provides at least $2 billion more in Katrina aid than the White House first requested." House-Senate negotiators "will meet tonight in hopes of expediting passage by Congress this week, and Republicans are confident they can avoid a veto fight with President Bush. But the deal rests heavily on borrowing against Federal Emergency Management Agency disaster funds, and that means FEMA will have to come back sooner to Congress for more money, quite possibly this fall."

The AP (6/6, Taylor) reports after "missing a Memorial Day deadline, negotiators hope to seal agreement this week. The White House says a money crunch is threatening military operations and training accounts, especially for the Army, and could slow training and equipping of Iraqi soldiers." The "overall limit has meant dumping or dramatically scaling back Senate initiatives like $4 billion in agriculture disaster assistance to farmers to help them deal with high fuel prices and damage from floods and droughts last year. The move promises to dismay Senate GOP sponsors of the farm aid such as Conrad Burns of Montana, embroiled in a very difficult re-election bid."

House, Senate Republicans At Odds Over Key Legislation. Roll Call (6/6, Billings, Pershing) reports as Congress "gets back to work this week, the Republican majority faces the daunting task of trying to advance several big-ticket legislative items amid a sometimes strained relationship between the two chambers." House and Senate Republicans "will not only wrestle with their Democratic opponents, but in some cases with each other, as they look to complete an emergency supplemental spending bill for Iraq and Hurricane Katrina recovery, as well as a pension bill, immigration reform and a lobby overhaul package." The majority "views passage of these as key to bolstering its chances in the November elections, along with consideration of several other measures important to the GOP base, including an anti-gay-marriage amendment, abolition of the estate tax and energy legislation." But GOP tensions "have risen in both chambers over some of the most hotly contested bills this year, leaving some to wonder whether the party can come together quickly enough to pass them in the time that remains in this Congress. Immigration and the emergency spending bill are the most high-profile measures on which Republicans have faced internal battles over how far to go in this election year."

Private Funds Paid For At Least 23,000 Congressional Trips Since 2000. Knight Ridder (6/6, Kuhnhenn) reports, "Join Congress, see the world. Join a congressman's staff, see more of it. Private groups, corporations or trade associations -- many with legislation that could affect them pending before Congress -- paid nearly $50 million since 2000 to send members of Congress and their staffers on at least 23,000 trips overseas and within the United States, according to a study released Monday." The trips "included at least 200 journeys to Paris and 150 to Hawaii, room rates of up to $500 a night and some high-flying on corporate jets that cost up to $25,000 a trip, according to a report by the Center for Public Integrity, American Public Media and Northwestern University's Medill News Service."

The CBS Evening News (6/5, story 9, 2:50, Mitchell) Attkisson) said members of Congress and their aides have "taken $50 million worth of private paid trips in just over five and a half years. That's according to analysts from The Center for Public Integrity who poured through mounds of congressional travel disclosure forms." The trips are "officially called educational work trips, but they just happen to be to some of the world's best vacation destinations." Wendell Rawls, The Center for Public Integrity: "Hawaii and Antigua and at the Greenbrier and Florence and Paris." Attkisson: "The Center's top watchdog, Wendall Rawls, says the travel is legal but ethically suspect since it can appear congressional influence is for sale." And if "you thought Congress was reforming these types of meetings, they are not. They have repeatedly rejected bans on private travel and nothing in any current proposals would change that."

The New York Times (6/6, Phillips) reports, "The study concluded that about 90 of the trips were paid for by lobbyists, which is an ethical violation, during the five and a half years examined. About 500 trips cost $10,000 or more each, and 16 cost $25,000 or more apiece, the study showed. About $20 million was spent on overseas travel."

The Washington Post (6/6, A1, Birnbaum) reports, "Many congressional offices have voluntarily curtailed their privately funded travel since disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to bribe public officials, in part with lavish overseas trips." But "lawmakers and their aides still may accept travel for official purposes from private interests without limit."

Rangel, Kaptur Singled Out. The Hill (6/6, Allen, Hearn) says the researchers "kept tabs on which offices filed incomplete, incorrect or late reports disclosing details of their travels. They singled out two lawmakers, Reps. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) and Marcy Kaptur (D-Ohio), for failing to disclose until six weeks ago that the Cuban government and a New York grocery mogul paid for their April 2002 trip to Havana to meet President Fidel Castro. Earlier disclosure reports had specified only a Minneapolis-based conservation group, the Sian Ka'an Conservation Foundation, as the sponsor." Rangel also "took fire for allowing the sponsors to pay travel costs for his wife and son, a violation of House rules that allow only one family member to be reimbursed." Rangel's chief of staff, George Dalley, "called the filing an honest mistake."

Conservatives Said To Be Ambivalent Toward Frist. The Hill (6/6, Bolton) reports that conservatives are "scratching their heads over what to make of" Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist. While the Senate will vote this week on constitutional amendment to ban same sex marriage, Frist "has also brought a skunk to what otherwise would be a conservative garden party by also scheduling the Native Hawaiian Government Reorganization Act, sponsored by Democratic Sen. Daniel Akaka (Hawaii). Conservative senators and activists hate that bill, which would allow native Hawaiians to establish their own government entity to "safeguard their welfare," according to a description by the Congressional Research Service."

Patrick Kennedy Returns To Work After Nearly A Month In Rehab. Rep. Patrick Kennedy returned to work Monday after spending almost a month in a drug rehabilitation clinic after an incident in which he crashed his car near the US Capitol. NBC Nightly News (6/5, story 8, 0:50, Williams) reported, "Rhode Island Democratic Congressman Patrick Kennedy made his first public appearance today after a month in a drug rehabilitation program." Kennedy "entered the Mayo Clinic after crashing his car on Capitol Hill, an accident he says he doesn't remember in part because he was taking the sleeping pill Ambien. Kennedy was treated for a long-standing prescription drug dependency and says today though he feels good, he is also grateful." Rep. Patrick Kennedy, Rhode Island: "Every day I'm on my knees thanking God that I didn't hurt somebody and this was a opportunity for me to get my life back on track. Frankly I didn't know how miserable I was until I started feeling better. And so, I'm really happy that I've had that this chance." Williams: "US Capitol Police cited Kennedy for three traffic violations. Today, he said he'll accept whatever consequences he deserves."

USA Today (6/6) reports that Kennedy "said that after struggling for two decades with addiction he knows he can no longer take any 'mood-altering' substances including alcohol."

The New York Times (6/6, Holusha) reports that Kennedy "said yesterday that he felt much better…and that he was looking forward to resuming his duties. But he said that he continued to suffer from bipolar disorder and a tendency toward addiction, and will need help from a support group to avoid a relapse."

Ramstad To Act As Kennedy's Sponsor. Roll Call (6/6, Hocking) reports on the "strong bond" between Kennedy and Rep. Jim Ramstad, who is a recovering alcoholic. Every Saturday for a month, "Ramstad drove an hour and a half from his house in Minnetonka, Minn., to the Mayo Clinic in Rochester to visit Kennedy while he was in rehab. … The Rhode Island Congressman has named Ramstad as a sponsor in his recovery efforts, said Kennedy spokesman Robin Costello."

Snow Jokes Of White House "Love Affair" With Media. In a "Verbatim" column, the Washington Post

(6/6, A13) reports, "White House press secretary Tony Snow's response at yesterday's White House briefing to a question from radio talk show host Lester Kinsolving: Kinsolving : The New York Times has just reported, 'This White House, like all White Houses, is obsessed with the press.' My question: Will you admit to this alleged obsession, or is this just one more New York Times exaggeration? Snow : It's more a love affair than an obsession, Lester."

FAA Imposes New Contract On Air Traffic Controllers. The Washington Post (6/6, D4, Barr) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The Federal Aviation Administration imposed a controversial new contract yesterday on the nation's 15,000 air traffic controllers that will slow the rate of pay increases for current workers and cut starting salaries for new hires by 30 percent. Marion C. Blakey , the FAA administrator, said a 60-day period for review by Congress of contract deadlocks at the agency had ended without any action."

OTHER NEWS:

Bernanke Warning, Iran Threat Drive Stock Markets Lower. Federal Reserve Board Chairman Ben Bernanke' warning yesterday about inflation prompted a sell off on Wall Street yesterday. USA Today (6/6, Kirchhoff) reports that in a speech to a banking conference, Bernanke "said the economy is entering 'a period of transition' to less robust growth. But he also implied that inflation, pressured by high energy prices, is now the bigger threat." The New York Times (6/6, Andrews) says "investors, increasingly convinced that the central bank will raise rates at its two-day policy meeting at the end of this month, immediately began selling stocks."

ABC World News Tonight (6/5, story 9, :20, Gibson) reported Chairman Bernanke "promised steps to keep surging energy prices from making matters worse. Wall Street took that as an indication that the Fed will raise interest rates again this month and as a result, stock prices plummeted. The Dow Industrials fell 199.15 points to its lowest close in three months [at 11,048.72]. The NASDAQ lost 49 points [to close at 2,169.62]."

The CBS Evening News (6/5, story 3, 1:20, Mason) reported, "So, what's happening? Well, blame it on the two I's -- Iran and inflation. First, Ayatollah Khamenei threatened the United States this weekend saying, 'If you make a wrong move regarding Iran, definitely the energy flow in this region will be seriously endangered.' Now, the markets took this as a sign that Iran, OPEC's second-largest producer, is ready to use oil as a weapon. That sent crude prices surging and stock prices tumbling. Then, new Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke speaking to bankers today said he's very worried about inflation. The market's read that as a signal the Fed intends to raise interest rates again soon."

NBC Nightly News (6/5, story 5, 0:35, Williams) reported, "Iran threatened to disrupt world oil supplies, which then sent oil prices higher and rattled the stock market early today. Then this afternoon, the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Ben Bernanke said he's still concerned about inflation, which then renewed interest rate fears. All that have combined to send the market sharply lower today." The Wall Street Journal (6/6, Browning, Ip), Washington Times (6/6, Hill), Financial Times (6/6, Guha, Beales), Washington Post (6/6, A1, Henderson, Masters) and USA Today (6/6, Shell) run similar reports.

Iranian Threat Pushes Oil Prices Up. USA Today (6/6, Hagenbaugh) reports, "Oil prices climbed to the highest in nearly a month Monday after Iran warned over the weekend that any efforts to punish the major oil producer could lead to a reduction in world supply. Average US retail gasoline prices, meanwhile, edged higher. After jumping more than $1 in trading early in the day, oil ended the day up 27 cents at $72.60 a barrel." That was "the highest since May 11 and marked the second-consecutive trading day of increases. Prices are less than $3 from the all-time high hit in April."

High Fuel Prices Said To Put US Jobs At Risk. USA Today (6/6, Hagenbaugh) reports, "The rising cost of oil has put a squeeze on the companies that use oil as an ingredient for their products. Although they are down from the records seen recently, oil prices are up more than 20% from a year ago and are more than 150% higher than they were five years ago. Natural gas prices have also risen." USA Today adds "manufacturers, faced with strong global competition, are unable to pass along all of the added costs to customers. That means prices for most oil-derived products will likely barely budge as a result of higher energy costs." But "the impact on manufacturers and other companies that use oil-based ingredients could be significant, causing a ripple effect throughout the economy. As firms are faced with rising prices and see their margins cut, they may have to cut back on production, reduce pay increases or maybe even cut jobs or shut down."

California Attorney General Investigating Spike In Gas Prices. The CBS Evening News (6/5, story 4, 2:20, Mitchell) reported, "The Energy Department says gasoline is up two cents in the past week to a nationwide average of $2.89 a gallon. In California it is a whole lot higher $3.27. The chief law enforcement officer in the state wants to know why." CBS (Hughes) added, "California's Attorney General began hauling the CEOs of major oil companies into his office today, demanding in closed door sessions that those executives tell him under oath why gas prices are higher here than almost anywhere else in the nation." Bill Lockyer, California Attorney General: "This is legal thievery in my view. And it's because it's an oligopoly, it's -- when you have a handful of companies, seven exactly, that control almost the entire California market." Hughes: "Those companies insist they're operating within the law and not trying to gouge their customers. Still, California drivers pay an average of $3.31 a gallon, up more than $1 since the start of the year. The Attorney General also wants to know why refiners' profit margins soared 130% at a time when the price of crude oil increased by only 14%." What "is true, according to estimates from the California energy commission, is that profits on each gallon of gas have risen from around 30 cents per gallon at the start of the year to around $1 per gallon now."

CA50 Special Election Seen As Test Of Discontent With GOP. USA Today (6/6, Welch) reports the San Diego special election today for California's 50th CD "has become a test of voter discontent with Republican leadership and frustration over the porous border with Mexico." In the race "to replace disgraced Republican former congressman Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, Republican nominee Brian Bilbray, a former three-term congressman from a neighboring district, would in any other time be a heavy favorite against a Democratic opponent." But the race "between Bilbray and Francine Busby, a relative newcomer to politics, appears to be coming down to a tight finish. Both candidates have said their private polling shows each with a very slight lead." Gary Jacobson, political scientist at the University of California, San Diego, said, "If Republicans lose a district that is this Republican, they ought to be real worried. It's driven by unhappiness with the state of the nation."

The Hill (6/6, Kaplan, O'Connor) reports, "Trying to leave nothing to chance, Republicans sought to ensure victory in today's runoff election to replace imprisoned" former Rep. Cunningham "while Democrats sought to shape the post-election spin by arguing that even losing is winning." Hoping "to push former Rep. Brian Bilbray (R-Calif.) into office, the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) paid for automated phone calls recorded by President Bush, Laura Bush and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and kept up its television advertising campaign." After today's vote, the NRCC "will have spent $5 million on the race. Over the weekend, the Republican National Committee (RNC) paid to send approximately 160 'deployed volunteers' to San Diego to help the Bilbray campaign turn out supporters, an RNC official said. An estimated 65 of those volunteers, working 10- to 12-hour days making phone calls and knocking on doors, are Republican staff members on Capitol Hill." Political observers "expected the race to be close, although they disagreed on whether it would be a harbinger of Democrats' fortunes for winning the House in November's midterm elections."

Roll Call (6/6, Drucker) reports Busby has "pushed" Bilbray "to the limit in the special election runoff that was forced by Cunningham's resignation and subsequent incarceration after he admitted to taking bribes. Republicans acknowledge that she effectively has exploited Bilbray's post-legislative career as a lobbyist in a San Diego-area district that has experienced multiple corruption scandals of late, including at the local government level." But Bilbray, "a longtime, staunch opponent of illegal immigration despite other views considered moderate by Republican standards, successfully has nailed Busby on that subject. His support for the hardline House immigration bill — and his opposition to the Senate bill — has been well-received by voters and the local newspapers."

Busby Comments To Immigrants On Voting Papers Color Final Days Of Race. The AP (6/6, Hoffman) reports Republicans "seized on Democrat Francine Busby's comments that sounded like encouragement for illegal immigrants to help her campaign as the GOP sought an edge in the final hours of a surprisingly close House race." Immigration "looms large in the runoff election," and Busby's remarks, "and her subsequent explanation that she misspoke, has drawn much of the attention in the race's last days." Speaking to "a largely Hispanic audience last Thursday, Busby faced a Spanish-speaking questioner who said he wanted to help her campaign but lacked voting papers. The question was translated into English and she responded, 'Everybody can help. You can all help. You don't need papers for voting, you don't need to be a registered voter to help.'" Bilbray "criticized the Democrat, saying she was encouraging possible illegal immigrants to volunteer for the campaign." But Busby "said she had been trying to encourage underage high school students or people who weren't registered — but are in the country legally — to participate in the political process."

National Discontent Could Fuel Primary Challengers As Eight States Go To Polls. The AP (6/6, Tanner) reports, "The old adage says all politics are local. But challengers this year are convinced that national dissatisfaction with Iraq, immigration and political corruption give them an unusual chance to topple sitting governors, senators and House members." The primaries today "for governor in Alabama and California, a Senate seat in Montana and a handful of House contests, among other races, will put their faith to the test." The CA50 special election is the "most-watched congressional contest," but "in all, eight states are holding primaries, with polls also open in Mississippi, New Jersey, New Mexico, South Dakota and Iowa, where there is an open governor's seat."

Democrats Given Good Chance To Capture One Chamber In November. The Wall Street Journal (6/6, Calmes) reports, "As a bad year for Republicans keeps getting worse, expectations are growing that Democrats could capture at least one house of Congress, ending one-party dominance of the nation's capital and crippling President Bush for his final years." Democrats currently "are in a position to win the 15 seats they need to take control of the House. They have a harder task, however, snagging the six seats needed in the Senate. As the list of vulnerable Republicans grows, all sides are scouting for signs of an electoral wave like that of 1994, which swept away the Democrats' four-decade control of Congress." A recent poll had President Bush's approval rating "at 23% in New York, home to as many as six endangered Republicans. Particularly threatened are Republican moderates in Democratic-leaning areas, including the Northeast, the Ohio River Valley and Florida." Two elections "being held today are being closely watched as potential barometers for the fall: a special election in California to replace former Republican Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, who has pleaded guilty to bribery charges; and a Senate primary in Montana, where scandal-touched Sen. Conrad Burns faces a Republican challenge."

Campaign Already Heating Up With Unexpected Intensity. The New York Times (6/6, Nagourney) reports even for "candidates who will not face the voters for five months, the campaign is shaping up as not only the most contested midterm election in over a decade, but also the most substantive. In a typical election year, intense campaign activity normally does not begin until around Labor Day." Democrats and Republicans "said they were struck by the level of political activity now going on. Television advertisements have been shown by candidates in at least five districts, party officials said, and there are radio and Internet advertisements popping up around the country." Moveon.org, "the liberal advocacy group, began broadcasting hard-hitting advertisements attacking Republican incumbents in four states nearly three months ago and is about to start a second round on Thursday, officials with the organization said." If this "early pattern holds, it could undercut Republican efforts to prevent this election from becoming a national referendum on Mr. Bush and Republican policies."

Democrats Seek To Enhance Communication With Military Families. The Washington Times (6/6, Pfeiffer) reports Democrats are "seeking ways to reach out to military families, hosting a discussion yesterday to help congressional staffers better communicate with men and women serving in the armed forces." Kathy Roth-Douquet and Frank Schaeffer, "authors of 'AWOL: The Unexcused Absence of America's Upper Classes from Military Service -- and How it Hurts Our Country,' spoke in a Capitol basement office filled with Democratic staffers who shared their personal stories of military service and examples of being part of a military family while trying to relate to 'elite' colleagues who 'dismissed' their experiences." Yesterday's discussion "was sponsored by the Truman National Security Project, a Washington think tank that declares its aim is to boost Democrats' 'national security credentials' through an 'innovative, distinctly Democratic approach to national security.'"

Webb's Stance On Affirmative Action Draws Scrutiny. The Washington Post (6/6, B8, Helderman) examines Virginia Democratic Senate candidate James Webb's stance on affirmative action, noting that Webb "said he has been writing and thinking about the issue for years." The Post notes that Webb "comes to an unusual view among candidates in either major party: He supports affirmative action for blacks but otherwise thinks preferential job and education programs should be awarded based on economic conditions or eliminated altogether." His opponent in next Tuesday's primary, Harris Miller, "has characterized Webb's views as out of step with most party members, using affirmative action as a prime example."

Feingold, Warner Address New Hampshire Democrats. The Washington Times (6/6, Bellantoni) reports that potential 2008 Democratic presidential candidates addressed New Hampshire's Democratic convention last weekend. Wisconsin Sen. Russ Feingold "fired up the crowd by urging his party to stand up and fight against the Iraq war." Former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner "gave a broad speech focused mostly on domestic issues, prompting some Democrats to say the Virginian seemed a more likely contender to make it all the way to the White House." While Feingold "threw the audience political red meat," Warner "kept the Bush-bashing to a minimum and instead espoused centrist themes of deficit reduction, better math and science education, and ensuring localities have adequate infrastructure to avoid catastrophes like the flooding during Hurricane Katrina."

Bill Clinton Hopes To Raise $20 Million For Democrats This Year. Former President Bill Clinton is scheduled to appear at more than two dozen Democratic fundraisers this year. The New York Times (6/6, Hernandez) reports that Clinton hopes "to collect at least $20 million for his party's drive to recapture Congress."

Clinton Narrates Audio Tour For Presidential Library. The Washington Post (6/6, A13) reports that former President Bill Clinton's presidential library in Little Rock will son begin offering an audio tour narrated by the former President. The tour "was Clinton's idea and is the first narrated by a former president for a presidential library, said Jordan Johnson, spokesman for the William J. Clinton Foundation. Visitors pay an extra $3 for a device shaped like an oversize cordless phone. For each exhibit, Clinton recounts his thoughts on and memories of the topic."

Republican Turned Democrat Says GOP Broke With Him. DeWayne Wickham writes in USA Today (6/6) reports that former Kansas state GOP chairman Mark Parkinson, who spearheaded the unsuccessful effort to derail the 2002 gubernatorial campaign of Democrat Kathleen Sebelius, has been named by Sebelius to be her running mate in this year's gubernatorial campaign. Republicans "have branded Parkinson a traitor, but he told me he didn't break with the GOP, it broke with him. It became more interested in cultural warfare than improving schools, economic development 'for everyone' and the idea that government should not be involved in people's personal lives."

Brother Of Murderer Turns To Philanthropy. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (6/6, A1, Davies) reports that Louis Capano, Jr. , who 20 years ago helped his brother cover up a murder, has turned to philanthropy, making two $1 million donations "to put his family's name on buildings at elite Catholic schools he attended." Capano's efforts are "triggering a debate over whether charity can help earn forgiveness."

In "Setback" For US, Islamic Militia Seizes Control Of Mogadishu. ABC World News Tonight (6/5, story 6, :25, Gibson) reported, "In Somalia, an Islamic militia has now seized call of the capital, Mogadishu, after weeks of fighting. That is raising fears that the war-torn nation could fall under the sway of al Qaeda. No one group has controlled Mogadishu since Somalia's government fell in 1991. The militia's victory is a setback for the US, which backed a coalition of warlords." Knight Ridder (6/6, Landay) says the militia's takeover is "a setback to US efforts to contain the spread of militant Islam. US officials and other experts warned that if the militias consolidated their victory they would establish an Islamist state where al-Qaeda could secure bases from which it could spread its violent ideology to other East African and Horn of Africa nations."

The New York Times (6/6, Lacey) quotes Assistant Secretary McCormack saying, "We don't want to see Somalia turn into a safe haven for foreign terrorists. ... We do have very real concerns about that." Bloomberg (6/6, Tighe) notes UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan "yesterday appealed to all groups to stop fighting and begin talks, the UN said on its Web site. Thousands of people have been displaced from their homes in Mogadishu, the UN said." The AP (6/5, Hassan), Financial Times (6/6, England, Dinmore), USA Today (6/6, For), Washington Post (6/6, A10, Hassan) and Washington Times (6/6, Hassan), among others, also reports the story.

Visiting Congolese Leader Pans US Support For Warlords. AFP (6/6) reports, "Congo's president and current African Union head Denis Sassou Nguesso hit out at US support for Somali warlords and expressed hope Washington would work to establish a government in Mogadishu. 'We think, and what we told President Bush, that most important is to establish a government that must help the Somali people to have a real government,' Sassou Nguesso told journalists after meeting Bush and" Secretary Rice. "'We think that if this effort is needed, we have to move in this direction, in order that the Somali government can truly be established in Mogadishu. ... The presence of various groups, the warlords, is not a permanent solution.'"

Solana In Tehran To Pitch Incentives Package. The New York Times (6/6, Cooper) reports EU foreign policy head Javier Solana "arrived in Tehran on Monday night with incentives intended to resolve the nuclear crisis with Iran, including a proposal to allow Iran to upgrade its aging civilian air fleet through the purchase of aircraft parts from an American company, Boeing." The deal may also include "waiving trade sanctions against Iran to allow the purchase of American agricultural technology, said European diplomats and a senior Bush administration official." Although the exact proposal so far remains private, "several European and American diplomats described parts of the proposal, speaking anonymously because they were not authorized to comment publicly. The offer includes a commitment from the six nations to support Iran's plan for a nuclear energy program for civilian use, including building light-water reactors through joint projects with other countries, the diplomats said. The United States and Europe also agreed to back Iran's membership in the World Trade Organization." That said, "the most compelling item...may be the American offer to end its nearly three-decade policy against direct talks with Iran and to join in the negotiations over Iran's nuclear program."

White House Asks For Patience. AFP (6/6) reports, "The White House pleaded for patience with overtures to Iran, saying 'there is hope' that Tehran will accept an internationally brokered compromise on its nuclear programs. 'I would counsel patience,' spokesman Tony Snow told reporters. 'At this point, as we've said all along, let's give it time. Let's let the Iranians take a look at what the offers are, at the incentives and disincentives.'"

UN Urged To Take Legal Action Against Ahmadinejad For Violating Charter. David B. Rivkin Jr. and Lee A. Casey, lawyers who served in the Justice Department during the administrations of Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush, write in today's Washington Post (6/6, A15), "Speaking last October at a Tehran conference on 'The World Without Zionism,' Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, referred to Israel as a 'disgraceful blot" and called for it to be "wiped off the map.' … Although Ahmadinejad's bellicose statements were condemned by the United States and a number of its European allies, the condemnation was not followed up by a concerted diplomatic and legal effort in the UN Security Council. It ought to be," and " there is a good legal basis for such action. Ahmadinejad's words clearly violate Article 2.4 of the UN Charter. This provision, to which Iran has agreed, requires all UN member states to 'refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state.'"

Washington-Hanoi Military Ties To Expand. The New York Times (6/6, Gordon) reports Secretary Rumsfeld and senior Vietnamese leaders "agreed Monday to increase their military contacts and to discuss additional ways to broaden their defense cooperation." The Times notes, "Vietnam was an important stop on an Asian swing that has already taken Mr. Rumsfeld to a meeting of defense experts in Singapore." In Hanoi, Rumsfeld "heaped praise on his hosts. He lauded Vietnam's economic development, which he inspected Sunday night with a walk through the city's streets." While "the Vietnam War still casts a long shadow" on bilateral relations, "it is China, a subject that Mr. Rumsfeld said went unmentioned Monday during his talks…, that has added impetus for the new courtship."

The AP (6/6, Baldor) focuses its coverage on Rumsfeld's renewed call for a full accounting of US service members, saying he "is pressing Vietnam for underwater searches and access to aging witnesses in stepped-up efforts.... 'We still have work to do,' Rumsfeld said, though he added that he was pleased Vietnamese military officials had pledged in meetings with him to do more to help recover the remains. 'As we all agree, we don't want to forget the importance of this.' Rumsfeld told reporters U.S. officials will work to see if the U.S. can provide technical assistance with underwater recovery efforts."

Rumsfeld Says US Committed To Engagement In Asia. Secretary Rumsfeld pens an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal Asia (6/6) entitled "A Pacific Nation." The 850-word piece outlines the positions taken by the US at the Singapore Shangri La Dialogue, and the changing culture of US-Asian relations that has permitted new cooperation. Rumsfeld says the US "is -- and always will be -- a Pacific nation," and argues that the US "must, and we will, stay engaged" in Asia "to address a range of traditional, as well as unconventional, security concerns." The op-ed also appears on the website of the domestic Wall Street Journal.

Darfur Tops Agenda Of Bush Meeting With Congolese President. The AP (6/6) reports President Bush "said Monday that it's important for United Nations forces to take over peacekeeping as soon as possible in the Darfur region of Sudan... Bush met at the White House with Denis Sassou-Nguesso, president of the Republic of Congo and head of the 53-nation African Union, to discuss Darfur, AIDS and other issues." Following the meetings, Bush is quoted saying, "We talked about our common commitment to help end the genocide in Darfur. ... I appreciate the president's leadership in helping negotiate a peace agreement, and I appreciate his leadership in working with the United Nations so we can get the AU forces blue-helmeted as quickly as possible." Sassou-Nguesso is quoted saying, "I was happy to see President Bush give his entire support to the development of Africa. ... We discussed a lot of issues that we're all interested in: Peace, security, and not just in Africa, but beyond Africa, in the world."

Bush Hosts Honduran President At White House. The AP (6/6, Pickler) reports President Bush "heard concerns about immigration reform from south-of-the-border ally Honduras on Monday and offered assurances that he was committed to a bill that treats foreigners with respect while upholding U.S. laws. Bush met in the Oval Office with Honduran President Manuel Zelaya," and the two leaders "discussed ways to expand commercial opportunities between their nations and to make sure democracies in Latin America are strong. [Bush] said they also talked about the immigration bill being negotiated on Capitol Hill." Zelaya "thanked Bush for 'the frankness with which he has spoken about the solutions to the common problems we face in the Western Hemisphere.'"

Abbas To Call Referendum On Recognizing Israel. USA Today (6/6) reports, "Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas said Monday that attempts to get the Hamas-led government to implicitly recognize Israel have failed to produce agreement and that he will call a national referendum on the issue." The move "sets Abbas on a collision course with Hamas." The AP (6/5, Daraghmeh) notes Abbas "had set a midnight deadline for agreement. But a participant in late-night talks with Palestinian factions said the president determined they had failed an hour before that."

The New York Times (6/6, Erlanger, Myre) reports the referendum "is expected to be called for July and will be seen as a vote of confidence in Hamas, which won legislative elections in late January but has been isolated internationally and financially because of its refusal to recognize the right of Israel to exist, to forswear violence and to accept previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements."

US, South Korea Hold Free Trade Talks. The AP (6/6, Crutsinger) reports, "The United States and South Korea held their first round of talks Monday aimed at achieving a free trade agreement between the two nations before the end of the year." An agreement with South Korea, "America's seventh-largest trading partner," would be "the most economically significant such pact the United States has reached since it tore down barriers with Mexico and Canada more than a decade ago." Assistant US Trade Representative Wendy Cutler, who is heading the US delegation, "expressed optimism that the talks can be concluded before the end of the year even though the negotiators will have to deal with such tough issues as removing barriers to American farm products, pharmaceuticals and US autos."

Syrian Students Building Nascent Pro-Democracy Movement. The Christian Science Monitor (6/6, Brandon) reports that a "handful" of Syrian student activists are "agitating for reform and struggling to build a pro-democracy student movement in Syria, where martial law imposed in 1963 forbids unofficial political gatherings or groups. … While no organized student movement exists at present, one may be emerging. A small number of students are loosely linked but have no official names, leaders, or organization. They simply come together to organize political debates, spread democratic ideas, and take opinion polls.

Ford Foundation Establishes African Philanthropic Network. The New York Times (6/6, Dugger) reports that the Ford Foundation "will announce today the creation of a new philanthropic venture, led by Africans and based in Dakar, Senegal. The project, Trust Africa, aims to strengthen an expanding network of nonprofit groups across the continent that seek to hold governments accountable, whether elected or dictatorships. Ford has committed $30 million to this new foundation."

Westerners Encouraged To Support Investment In African "Sweatshops." The New York Times' Nicholas Kristof (6/6) writes that while westerners "mostly despise sweatshops as exploiters of the poor," the poor "tend to see sweatshops as opportunities. … Sure, sweatshop work is tedious, grueling and sometimes dangerous. But over all, sewing clothes is considerably less dangerous or arduous — or sweaty — than most alternatives in poor countries. Well-meaning American university students regularly campaign against sweatshops. But instead, anyone who cares about fighting poverty should campaign in favor of sweatshops, demanding that companies set up factories in Africa. If Africa could establish a clothing export industry, that would fight poverty far more effectively than any foreign aid program."

China Acknowledges Role Played By Private Environmental Groups. The New York Times/AP (6/6, Press) reports Zhu Guangyao, deputy chief of the China's Environmental Protection Agency, said pollution costs China more than $200 billion a year" and "called for better legal protection for grass-roots groups so they could help clean up the environment." Zhu "said that the importance of private environmental groups in China had lagged behind their role in other countries, and that his agency wanted to play a more important role in developing 'legislation to secure their interests and existence in China.'"

EU Resists Acceptance Of Genetically Modified Crops. The New York Times (6/6, Rosenthal) reports that the few EU countries "that have banned genetically modified organisms are on the front lines of a war over the future of modified food in Europe, the only large swath of the world that does not already grow or buy the crops. Facing international pressure and a lawsuit brought by the United States, Canada and Argentina at the World Trade Organization, the union said this year that all member states must open their doors to genetically engineered crops and prepare practical and legal regulations to ensure safety for health and the environment. But five countries have imposed eight different types of bans. Many others use their votes in Europe's Council of Ministers to block the crops from entering."

State Department Criticizes Germany Over Sex Traffic. The New York Times (6/6, Cooper) reports, "On the eve of the World Cup in Germany, the State Department's big concern is not over whether the American soccer team has a prayer of getting past the Czech Republic and Italy, but rather over the flood of prostitutes expected into Germany from Eastern Europe, Asia and Africa. The United States, in its annual report on forced labor and trafficking in persons, called Germany, which has legalized prostitution, 'a source, transit and destination country' for sex workers, the more so during the soccer tournament." According to the Times, "The warning to Germany was a rare slap at a close American ally."

Natural Disasters Undermine Indonesian Province's Tourism Industry. The New York Times (6/6, Gelling) reports that Indonesia's Yogyakarta Province, which was devastated by the recent earthquake, "is the second most popular tourist destination in Indonesia, Bali being the first. … Tourism accounts for about 20 percent of the province's income and is second only to agriculture as a source of revenue." But, "Even before the quake, tourism here was threatened by fears of an eruption at Mount Merapi, just north of Yogyakarta. A marketing campaign to show tourists that Yogyakarta, 20 miles south of the volcano, is out of Merapi's reach began several weeks ago and included organized visits to the mountain's slopes."

Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood Said To Be Less Radical Than Often Portrayed. In his column for the Wall Street Journal (6/6) Bret Stephens writes, "For years, the only group outside [the Egyptian] government that has reliably provided broad-based social services has been the Muslim Brotherhood, which, although officially banned, exists as a kind of parallel state within Egyptian society. … Were a free and fair election held tomorrow, the Brotherhood would probably win about 40% of the vote according to Gamal al-Banna, the leading scholarly authority on the group. This is all the more true because the Brotherhood isn't quite the jihadist, Khomeini-type movement frequently portrayed in the West."

WSJournal Sees Peruvian Election As Evidence Of Anti-Chavez Backlash. The Wall Street Journal (6/6), in an editorial, writes, "Governments that produce hyperinflation and unchecked terrorism have a way of ending political careers. So how then to explain the victory in Sunday's Peruvian presidential elections of Alan Garcia, whose 1985-1990 term included all that and more? The answer is that Mr. Garcia's opponent was Ollanta Humala, a protégé of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez. By electing Mr. Garcia, Peruvian voters sent a message that they don't want to follow Venezuela over the cliff."

TERRORISM NEWS:

US Officials Predict Domestic Terrorist Attack By Year's End. US intelligence Officials told CBS News privately that they expect a terrorist attack in the US, possibly before the end of the year. The CBS Evening News (6/5, lead story, 2:55, Stewart) reported, "US officials believe the Canadian arrest and three recent domestic incidents in the United States are evidence the US homeland will be hit again soon, and privately, they say, they'd be surprised if it didn't come by the end of the year. The first of the domestic incidents, all of which drew little attention at the time, began here with the holdup of a string of Torrance, California, gas stations last summer. Muslim converts who bonded together in prison planned to use the robberies to finance attacks on 20 Army recruiting stations. … Then this February in Toledo, police busted another cell. This one consisted of three men training to attack US forces overseas." And "then just two months ago, a pair of Atlanta men, one a Georgia Tech engineering student, were arrested not long after communicating by e-mail with two of the suspects arrested in Canada over the weekend. The Atlanta men are charged with videotaping domestic targets, including the US Capitol and World Bank. Analysts now conclude similarities between all the cases were dramatic. All were self financed, all were self-motivated, and in each case, the men were seeking out others to join their cell."

Townsend Says US Is Vulnerable At All Points Of Entry. Frances Townsend, Assistant to the President for Homeland Security and Counterterrorism was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (6/5) how vulnerable Americans are because of the potential of terrorists crossing in from the north. Townsend responded, "We're vulnerable at all of our ports of entry. For that reason, particularly on the northern border, the President since 2001 has tripled the number of Border Patrol agents, he's -- we've invested over $120 million in advanced technology along the northern border. We're working with the Canadian government on a Western Hemisphere travel card that is biometrically enabled so we can facilitate legitimate travel but be sure that we understand and know who's coming in and exiting our country."

Canadian Terror Suspects' International Ties Draw Scrutiny. The CBS Evening News (6/5, story 2, 2:20, Bowers) reported, "The arrests over the weekend in Canada are now part of a larger international investigation involving possible terror cells in at least seven countries. Authorities are now looking for connections between those arrested in Canada and suspected terrorists already in custody in the US, Bangladesh, Bosnia, Great Britain, Sweden and Denmark." The developments "are certain to feed fears about security along the United States northern border which at 4,000 miles is the world's longest and some fear already an overlooked path for terrorists to enter the US." CNN's The Situation Room (6/5, Blitzer) reported that the "alleged conspiracy" among young Muslims in Toronto "is also causing lots of concern in this country, and there are indications [of] some cross-border connections."

Canadian Suspects Made Contact With Georgians Who Cased DC Landmarks. CNN's The Situation Room (6/5, Meserve) reported, "US counterterrorism officials says two of the Canadian suspects had e-mail communications with two U.S. citizens arrested this spring on terrorism charges. … Officials say some of the Canadians also had contact with British terrorism suspects arrested last fall and with Islamic militants in Bangladesh, Bosnia, Denmark and Sweden."

The Washington Times (6/6, Seper) reports Canadian and US intelligence officials "are investigating links between Canadian terror suspects accused of plotting to bomb government buildings and Islamic militants in the United States and other countries. Investigators are looking at links between two Atlanta men arrested in March after they videotaped" Washington DC landmarks and two of the Canadians "identified as part of a terrorist ring. The Canadians were arrested last year trying to smuggle weapons into Canada." According to the Times, US officials have established that the two "had been in contact via computer with some of the 17 terror suspects arrested Saturday in Canada." FBI spokesman Richard Kolko "acknowledged over the weekend that some of the Canadian suspects had been in 'contact' with the two Georgia men but said there was 'no current outstanding threat to any targets on U.S. soil emanating from this case.'"

US Border Patrol Stations On "High Alert." The AP (6/5, Crary) reports the US "tightened…checks of traffic from Canada on Monday as debate over the long and hard-to-police border intensified. … Calls for tougher security measures were countered by pleas from business and civic leaders on both sides to keep border crossings as quick and simple as possible." U.S. Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar "said patrol stations along the 4,000-mile border — especially those adjoining Ontario — are on high alert because of the arrests, although investigators say the suspects' alleged plot apparently involved only targets in Canada." U.S. Customs and Border Protection official Kristi Clemens "said some traffic headed into the United States would under go tougher procedures at the 89 ports of entry along the border."

Knight Ridder (6/6, Montgomery) reports "some lawmakers are calling for a harder look at the northern border" and adds that "even before" 9/11 "the northern border had a reputation as a potential open door for extremists who'd settled in Canada to take advantage of its liberal immigration policies. One Canadian officer was quoted as describing the country as 'Club Med for terrorists.'"

Suspects Used Internet To Establish International Network. NBC Nightly News (6/5, story 2, 1:50, Williams) reported, "US officials say the Internet was both the inspiration and the downfall for the group arrested in Canada. Like the terrorists behind the 2004 Madrid train bombing, the Canadians are thought to be part of an emerging trend with no direct connections to bin Laden and al Qaeda." John Miller, FBI: "These groups aren't being supported by a central hub that's taking care of their funding, their equipment; their bombing expertise. They're putting themselves together in the field and doing it with whatever resources they can generate on their own." NBC went on to report, "The net around the Canadian cell began to tighten last October with the arrest in London of a man suspected of operating a terrorist Internet site, one that investigators say the Canadian group was using, too. The FBI says two Atlanta area students arrested two months ago were also using it and took the bus to Toronto a year ago to meet some of the Canadians."

Six Of The Seventeen Suspects Considered Ringleaders. The Washington Post (6/6, A12, Struck) reports, "Six men arrested in a broad police sweep last weekend have been charged with hatching the alleged plot to set off a powerful bomb somewhere in Ontario, according to charges made public Monday. A total of 17 people were arrested -- 12 adults and five juveniles -- and all have been charged under Canada's post-Sept. 11, 2001, terrorism laws. But details made public Monday suggest that some members of the group may have had more limited knowledge of the alleged plot than others." The Post also reports that "several" suspects "came under scrutiny as a result of political conversations on the Internet that were monitored by authorities."

ABC World News Tonight (6/5, story 3, 2:45, Ross) reported, "Canadian police say more arrests are likely as they seek to unravel what they describe as a home grown terror cell that got its inspiration from Osama bin Laden and was intent on striking as soon as it could, until police moved in this weekend. The plot was designed to inflict mass casualties with truck bombs made of fertilizer, according to police here." In "this case, all of those arrested are Canadian citizens, most of whom live in tree-lined suburbs just outside Toronto, including the alleged ring leader, a 43-year-old school bus driver with four children named Qayyum Abdul Jamal. Authorities say he was active at this storefront mosque, where he helped to radicalize, and recruit others, in their teens and early 20s."

NBC Nightly News (6/5, lead story, 2:45, Tibbles) reported Canadian Police "became aware the group was allegedly trying to purchase three tons of ammonium nitrate, the same chemical used in the Oklahoma City bombing, only three times as much. So they stepped in. Friday, when the bags were delivered, the chemical had been replaced with harmless powder. Some 400 heavily-armed police swept in."

Attention Drawn To Gaps In Canadian Immigration And Intelligence Practices. The Washington Times (6/6, Sheikh) reports, "Canadian security and immigration practices came under scrutiny yesterday after the weekend arrests of 17 persons suspected of plotting to blow up southern Ontario landmarks. About 90 percent of immigration applicants from Pakistan and Afghanistan in the past five years have not been sufficiently screened for security concerns, Jack Hooper, deputy director of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), told a Senate committee last month. Security analysts, meanwhile, warned that past cuts in staffing and funding for the nation's security services have left them short of manpower to search for terrorist cells."

Arrests Said To Have "Shattered" Canadians' Self Image. The Los Angeles Times (6/6, Williams) reports that the "thwarted suspected terrorist plot has shattered the image that many Canadians have of themselves as more secure, more generous and more likable than their U.S. neighbors." Prime Minister Stephen Harper is quoted as saying, "Their alleged target was Canada, Canadian institutions, the Canadian economy, the Canadian people. … We are a target because of who we are and how we live, our society, our diversity and our values -- values such as freedom, democracy and the rule of law."

Padilla's Attorney Challenges Government's Evidence. The AP (6/5, Anderson) reports Andrew Patel, an attorney for alleged al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla "is asking a judge to throw out key evidence, saying the warrant for his arrest was based on statements from one source who claims he was tortured and another who was heavily medicated. … The evidence being challenged includes a cell phone allegedly provided to Padilla by another al-Qaida operative, an address book containing names of his alleged al-Qaida recruiter and sponsor, and more than $10,000 in cash."

Jury Begins Deliberations In Trial Of Maryland Muslim Schoolteacher. The Washington Times/AP (6/6, Barakat) reports closing arguments were heard yesterday in the trial of Ali Asad Chandia, third-grade teacher at a Muslim school in Maryland "who is charged with providing material support to Lashkar-e-Taiba, a group that supports Muslim control of…Kashmir. … The U.S. government declared Lashkar a terrorist group in December 2001." The AP notes Chandia's prosecutors "have said Lashkar served as a potential gateway for Americans and others who wanted to join the Taliban in neighboring Afghanistan in its fight against U.S. troops in late 2001."

Senate Intelligence Committee Considers Privacy Act Terrorism Exemption. UPI (6/5, Waterman) reports, "A little-noticed proposal from the Senate intelligence committee would exempt federal agencies from important provisions of the Privacy Act in the name of the war on terrorism. The committee's annual authorization bill, which was sent to the Senate last month after a unanimous vote, would initiate a three-year pilot program, during which U.S. intelligence agencies would be able to access personal information about Americans held by other federal departments or agencies if it is thought to be relevant to counterterrorism or counterproliferation."

LATimes, NYTimes Blast Administration's Reading Of Geneva Conventions. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (6/6) notes its article yesterday which reported that "the Defense Department, over the objection of the State Department, has decided to omit from a new Army Field Manual on interrogation a prohibition against 'humiliating and degrading treatment' contained in Common Article 3 of the Geneva Convention. … Pentagon officials — supported by Vice President Dick Cheney's office — apparently have come to believe that including the prohibition in the manual would cramp the style of interrogators and create an 'unintentional sanctuary' for Al Qaeda fighters." According to the Times, "Omitting Article 3 from the interrogation manual not only would be handing the enemies of the United States a propaganda victory, but by giving interrogators an inch of discretion, it would be encouraging some of them to take a mile. Such slippage isn't just a matter of speculation. It's what happened at Abu Ghraib."

The New York Times (6/6), in an editorial, notes the Los Angeles Times article and concludes, "It defies belief that this administration is still clinging to its benighted policies on prisoners after the horrors of Abu Ghraib, the killings at American camps in Afghanistan and the world's fresh outrage over what appears to have been the massacre of Iraqi men, women and children in the village of Haditha."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Townsend Says Cuts In Homeland Security Funds Were "Inevitable." Frances Townsend, Assistant to the President for Homeland Security and Counterterrorism was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (6/5) about criticism of Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff from politicians in New York State, Washington, D.C. and Michigan over cuts in funding. Townsend said, "There should be no doubt that New York is the number one in terms of its risk. And for that reason, since the inception of the grant program New York has received more than $500 million in grant money. This year, the request to Congress in the budget for grant money was reduced by Congress by over $360 million. So there were -- it was inevitable that there were going to be some cuts. … And we're just going to have to work through this, both with New York, with Washington, D.C., with Michigan, and with our allies up on the Hill."

Protestors Heckle Negroponte At Boarding School Commencement. The AP (6/6, Gram) reports National Intelligence Director John Negroponte spoke to graduates of St. Johnsbury Academy in Vermont, "where his son John was one of the graduates." The AP adds, "About 75 peace activists stood outside in the drizzle holding signs and giving speeches, alleging that Negroponte was a key player in abusive U.S. foreign policies from Central America in the 1980s to Iraq today. … Police arrested four protesters, two who were removed from the hall while heckling during Negroponte's speech and two who ventured onto what police said was the academy's private property."

Pentagon 9/11 Memorial Groundbreaking Set For June 15. The Washington Post (6/6, A4, Dwyer) reports James J. Laychak, president of the Pentagon Memorial Fund, "announced yesterday that a groundbreaking ceremony will occur June 15, a huge milestone in the nearly five-year fundraising effort for the 9/11 monument. About 150 family members and other guests, including Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, are expected to attend the invitation-only ceremony, which will be held at the memorial site on the west lawn of the Pentagon."

Pataki, Bloomberg Said To Have Misallocated Ground Zero Recovery Funds. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (6/6) Debra Burlingame, a director of the World Trade Center Memorial Foundation, writes, "The public has heard plenty about the 'empty pit of Ground Zero,' but most do not know that the $2.8 billion allocated to Lower Manhattan in cash grants has virtually all been spent. It is difficult to trace where all the money went while being routed through the Department of Housing and Urban Development and six different city and state entities." According to Burlingame, Gov. George Pataki "signed off on $25 million worth of recovery funds for American Express, which expressly announced it hadn't intended to leave Lower Manhattan. … Goldman Sachs, which made $4.55 billion dollars in net profits in 2004, received a $2 billion 'assistance' package consisting of triple-tax-free Liberty Bonds, tax credits and cash the following year." Mayor Michael Bloomberg "has declined to fully explain his allocation of $650 million dollars worth of Liberty Bonds to construct the Bank of America tower in midtown, an allocation that competes with downtown redevelopment; or why he awarded $114 million in Liberty Bonds to the Ratner office tower -- in Brooklyn."

Government's Method Of Paying For Katrina Cleanup Said To Increase Costs. NBC Nightly News (6/5, story 7, 2:45, Williams) reported, "Could it be the way the government pays for all that cleanup work" in the hurricane zone in the Gulf Coast "that is leading to so much waste?" NBC (Myers) added, "The collection, hauling and smashing of debris still is a daily ritual. Cost to taxpayers? Already, $2.5 billion, but government investigators and those closest to the cleanup now say hundreds of millions of taxpayer dollars may have been wasted." Troy Hebert's "debris removal company helped clean up after past hurricanes. He complains that this time, the Army Corps of Engineers gave debris removal contracts to four major corporations who did little actual cleanup themselves and instead farmed out much of the job to layers of local subcontractors: The result?" Hebert: "They were able to make huge, huge sums of profits off of actually other people doing work to clean up our communities. And that's not the way it should be." Rep. Tom Davis: "Contractors were being paid two, three times what they should have been paid to get the job done, and the job took in some cases two and three times as long as it would have."

Landrieu Said To Be On Mission To Explain Katrina Devastation. The Hill (6/6, Allen) reports Sen. Mary Landrieu says she's "still in a fight to explain" the Hurricane Katrina's devastation. "'It's important for people to understand what really happened, who is responsible, why it happened, so that we can actually fix it,' she said. For Landrieu, villains are easy to identify: President Bush and top White House officials, the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) and House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.)." She says FEMA "should not be the vehicle for federal assistance because it is 'dysfunctional.'

New Orleans Public Housing Residents Returning To Storm-Damaged Apartments. The New York Times (6/6, Saulny) reports displaced New Orleans public housing residents have returned "from Atlanta, Baton Rouge, Houston and elsewhere" to urge "the city to reopen their storm-damaged apartments. … "Outside the largest complex, the St. Bernard Housing Development in the Seventh Ward, tenant groups have organized evacuees into a tent city called Survivors Village." Though "city and federal housing officials who have opened fewer than 1,000 of more than 8,000 public housing units," tenants "promised on Sunday to gut and rebuild their own units, and they said they planned to be back permanently -- with or without the city's permission -- as soon as their work was done."

Foley Calls For FEMA's Removal From DHS. Rep. Mark Foley, in an op-ed in The Hill (6/6) writes that with predictions of "another volatile year" for hurricanes, "structural problems remain that plague" FEMA, including its placement within "the top-heavy government bureaucracy of the Department of Homeland Security." Foley says, "By placing FEMA in the labyrinth of government agencies housed in DHS, we have put FEMA's priorities in direct competition for attention with our efforts to protect our cities from al Qaeda and to protect our borders." Foley adds that he introduced legislation last year to "sever FEMA from the DHS bureaucracy" and "make it the nimble, quick-response team that it wants to be."

Amendment Would Prevent Use Of FEMA Funds To Buy Luxury Items. In its "Under The Dome" column, The Hill (6/6, Dufour) reports Rep. Virginia Foxx has introduced an amendment to the homeland-security appropriations bill to combat the use of government-issued debit cards to buy "Louis Vuitton purses and other luxury goods." Foxx's "Louis Vuitton Amendment" reads, "None of the funds made available to the Federal Emergency Management Agency in this act may be used to purchase a Louis Vuitton handbag." A Foxx spokeswoman said "the language is designed to 'highlight the abuse that occurred with the debit cards last year so that it doesn't happen again.'"

Red Cross Says Reforms In Place Following Katrina. USA Today (6/6, Nichols) reports that following "complaints…of supply shortages, poorly run shelters, inadequate phone and computer systems and a lack of outreach to rural areas" in the response to Hurricane Katrina, the national Red Cross' interim President and CEO, Jack McGuire, says the charity "now has far-reaching reforms in place." He "says the Red Cross will have more resources, a streamlined process to get aid to victims, a vastly expanded communications network and a new effort to reach out to…communities." McGuire says the charity will have to "earn" back its pre-Katrina image, which it will do "by showing what happens in the next hurricane season."

GAO Criticizes US Tidal Wave Preparedness. The Washington Post (6/6, A4, Daly) reports the GAO issued a report yesterday warning that while "technology is able to detect the formation of a tsunami fairly quickly," the US "lacks a robust warning system and detailed knowledge on the impact a0 tidal wave could have on coastal areas." Meanwhile, "false alarms may have lulled West Coast residents into an inaccurate sense of security." The GAO "urges that the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration develop 'loss estimation' software for tsunamis similar to those available for hurricanes or floods so officials can predict how severe a potential storm would be."

The Washington Times (6/6, Hudson) reports that while "the National Weather Service issues timely warnings," alert systems on the West Coast "cannot transmit to some coastal areas, the report said. … The GAO recommends updated maps and more community participation in the National Weather Service's TsunamiReady program. Participation is low 'because of community perceptions of a low tsunami threat and perceived high cost versus benefit.'"

WAR NEWS:

Marines Expected To Face Charges Over Killing Of Iraqi In Hamdania. As the US military continues its investigation into the alleged murder of 24 Iraqi civilians at Haditha, investigations into other killings of Iraqis by US soldiers or Marines are also proceeding. In one instance, eight Marines face charges in the death of an Iraqi man in Hamdania. The suspected Marines initially reported the Iraqi was slain while planting a roadside bomb; subsequent witnesses have called this report into question.

ABC World News Tonight (6/5, story 4, 2:06, Karl) notes the "report is signed by Sgt. Lawrence Hutchins. Marine officials do not dispute the authenticity of the report, but investigators now believe the story it tells is a lie. Officials say creditable eyewitnesses told investigators the Marines simply dragged the unarmed man out of his house, shot him, and planted an AK-47 and a shovel on his body. At least seven Marines and a Navy corpsman on the scene at the time have been arrested and locked up in the brig at Camp Pendleton, California, awaiting charges. Officials say this investigation is moving more quickly than the Haditha investigation, because in this case, several of the Marines have confessed. Officials tell me they expect charges in this case, including murder charges, in the next week or two."

The CBS Evening News (6/5, story 5, 1:30, Mitchell) reported, "Several Marines under investigation for the murder of an Iraqi civilian last April have made statements admitting they set out that night to kill an Iraqi. They were looking for a man they believed was an insurgent responsible for attacks on Marines. When they couldn't find him, they went to another house, pulled an unarmed Iraqi into the street and shot him." Pentagon officials "say he was shot by a patrol of seven Marines and one Navy corpsman who then planted a rifle and a shovel next to his body in an effort to make it look like he was an insurgent caught burying a roadside bomb." Officials "who know what's in several of their statements say this is a case not just of murder, but premeditated murder."

US Commanders To Get Preliminary Report On Haditha Killings. The CBS Evening News (6/5, story 5, 1:30, Mitchell) reported, "A member of Congress who visited Iraq said today US commanders there will soon get a preliminary report from investigators on the alleged massacre of Iraqi civilians last November in Haditha."

Kline Says Top General Will Review Report On Haditha Killings. Rep. John Kline, who has just returned from Iraq, said Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the second-ranking U.S. general in Iraq, will soon review a preliminary criminal report into the alleged massacre by of Iraqi citizens in Haditha by US Marines. The AP (6/5, Frommer) reported that Kline said "it was unclear when the report would be released."

Knight Ridder (6/5, Lasseter) reported that "counterinsurgency is among the most complex forms of warfare, and sometimes the wrong people are killed. While outrage gathers over the reported killings of 24 civilians by U.S. Marines in the western Iraqi town of Haditha, US military units…quietly go about the daily task of patrolling a very complicated battlefield."

Haditha Said Not To Be Generating Outrage Among Iraqis. NBC Nightly News (6/5, story 6, 2:05, Engel) reported that on al-Iraqiya, "Not mentioned in the broadcast -- Haditha -- where US Marines allegedly murdered 24 civilians last November. It was first reported here in detail last week and only then because the incident was denounced by the prime minister. Now it's barely on the news. Today at state-sponsored Al-Iraqiya TV, we asked the news director why." Karim Hamadi, Al-Iraqiya TV (via translator): "If we played it up or sensationalized it, more Iraqis would want to attack US troops and more Iraqis would die." Engel: "We went to a Baghdad pizzeria to gauge reaction to Haditha. Most said it's just another massacre, does it matter who carried it out?"

Photographs From Iraq Said To Undermine Military's Image. The Washington Post (6/6) carries the musings of reporter Philip Kennicott on the significance of photographs in exposing "the flaws of the military's carefully constructed image of discipline." He asserts, "Photographs made Abu Ghraib a symbol of shame throughout the world. And photographs and video images are again undermining the military's cherished reputation for calm under fire and heroic self-restraint." Photographs and investigations coexist uneasily, because the former are "immediate," while the latter are "methodical and often slow." Kennicott concludes, "And the only image that fades, as the war grinds on, is the one with which we prepared for battle: the fantasy, so beloved of Americans, of a clean, surgical, decent war."

Former Marine Says Entire Corps Should Not Be Condemned Because Of Haditha. David Danelo, a former Marine officer and Iraq war veteran, writes in the Los Angeles Times (6/6), "Several Marines have already been convicted in the court of public opinion in the Haditha case. As military investigators evaluate these allegations, those on the sidelines should avoid castigation of an entire system because of the errors of a few." Danelo adds that "as we condemn the handful who have backslid in their pursuit of the Spartan Way, we should not forget to esteem the thousands who…have kept their honor clean amid Iraq's insanity."

Gunmen Kidnap 50 In Daylight Baghdad Raid. In a daylight raid on bus stations in central Baghdad, gunmen wearing police uniforms kidnapped at least 50 people Monday. ABC World News Tonight (6/5, story 5, :20, Gibson) reported, "In Iraq, today, an audacious kidnapping in central Baghdad. Gunmen in police uniforms seized at least 50 people from bus stations in broad daylight. The hostages were herded into more than a dozen vehicles and driven away. No motive is known. The Interior Ministry denied that police were involved."

The CBS Evening News (6/5, story 6, 2;10, Palmer) reported, "Witnesses say ten vehicles like those used by the Interior Ministry police pulled up midmorning. Men in police uniforms rounded up about 50 people at gunpoint. 'They bounded them and blindfolded them,' says this witness. 'And then they covered them with blankets and drove off.' The Interior Ministry dominated by Shi'a groups denies its men were involved, but it's long been accused by Sunnis of running death squads. Today's abductions follow a weekend of sectarian bloodletting." Christians, Shiites, Sunnis, "no one is safe. New statistics from US intelligence measure just how much the violence has surged. Attacks of all kinds are up 64% in the five months from January to May."

NBC Nightly News (6/5, story 6, 2:05, Engel) reported, "The lead story tonight on Iraqi TV -- yet another mass kidnapping. Relatives protested after gunmen dressed as police took more than 50 people hostage at Baghdad's central bus station."

The AP (6/6) reports, "Lt. Col. Falah al-Mohamedawi, an Interior Ministry spokesman, said the gunmen arrived at midmorning in the Salihiya business district, where several transportation companies are based and where buses pick up passengers bound mostly for Jordan, Syria and Lebanon. Witnesses said the attackers blocked roads leading into the area before grabbing people seemingly at random. The gunmen beat the captives before putting bags over their heads and herding them into more than a dozen vehicles."

A front page story in the Washington Post (6/6, A1, Hernandez, Aldin) reports that the fate of the hostages "was unknown Monday night, but. But the scale and audacity of the operation were unusual even by the capital's lawless standards."

The Los Angeles Times (6/6, Stack, Rasheed) reports, "In Baghdad, leaving home to work, shop or visit family has become an increasingly dangerous proposition. Violence rears up without warning; residents navigate a citywide obstacle course of roadside bombs, shootouts and security checkpoints. … Monday's mass kidnapping took place in a bustling, shabby commercial district in downtown Baghdad. The site is relatively fortified: It stands just a stone's throw from the Justice Ministry, amid a network of Iraqi police checkpoints."

Man Gets Life Sentence For Role In Hassan Kidnapping. The New York Times (6/6, Tavernise) reports that a man who "apparently played a minor role in the kidnapping of Margaret Hassan, a British-Iraqi aid worker whose disappearance and death showed that no one was immune from insurgent viciousness," was sentenced to life in prison Monday. Judge Saab Khorshid of the Central Criminal Court "sentenced Mustafa Muhammad Salman al-Jibouri, a man associated with a Sunni mosque in central Baghdad, to life in prison, a British Embassy official said. The charge, according to an Iraqi lawyer who watched the trial, was aiding and abetting: Mr. Jibouri held Ms. Hassan's purse after she was abducted, though he said he did not know whose it was at first."

Pentagon Says Iraqis Believe That Violence Will Diminish. The Washington Post (6/6, A12, Pincus) reports that according to the Pentagon's quarterly report to Congress, "Iraqis have confidence the new Baghdad government will improve the situation" of frequent sectarian attacks. Anthony Cordesman criticized the study as "a fundamentally false picture of the political situation in Iraq, and of the difficulties ahead." He stated that the American people and Congress need an "honest portrayal." Cordesman disputed the Pentagon view that 90% of suicide bombings in Iraq are carried out by Al Qaeda.

NATO Official Claims Afghanistan Is More Stable Than Iraq. Freelance writer Tulin Daloglu writes in the Washington Times (6/6), "The pictures of the anti-US riots last week in Kabul show the immense contradictions of Afghanistan. Monday's riot, triggered by a traffic accident involving an American military truck, was the worst since the fall of the Taliban. The next day, however, was absolutely calm, illustrating how impossible it is to predict anything that will happen in Afghanistan. Hikmet Cetin, NATO's senior civilian representative, says the riots did not accurately express either the level of anti-American sentiment or the people's attitude toward foreign influences." Cetin "says he is sure that NATO will defeat the Taliban. … He acknowledges that putting together the institutions of government and statehood, along with educating the people, will take a long time. But he refused to compare Afghanistan and Iraq. 'There is no deep ethnic and religious division in Afghanistan like there is in Iraq,' he said."

Afghanistan Has World's Second-Highest Rate Of Newborn Deaths. The Washington Post (6/6, A10, Constable) reports that according to international studies, Afghanistan is "one of the most dangerous places in the world to be born or to deliver a child. In a recent report, the US charity Save the Children found that Afghanistan has the world's second-highest rate of newborn deaths, 60 per 1,000 births, just below Liberia." The Post adds, "Although Afghanistan has had a stable, Western-backed government since late 2001 and foreign donors have since spent tens of millions of dollars to improve health care, conditions still conspire to sabotage the chances of healthy and normal births."

Senate Panel Would Expand Mission Of Imagery Intel Agency. The Washington Post (6/6, A13, Pincus) reports, "The Senate Select Committee on Intelligence wants to expand the mission of the nation's imagery intelligence agency so that it can provide U.S. forces on the ground with laptop computers that display still pictures and video of what may lie over the next hill." The panel wants to give the director of the national intelligence authority to direct the National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency (NGA) "to 'analyze, disseminate and incorporate' into its national system 'likenesses, videos, or presentations produced by ground-based platforms including handheld or clandestine photography taken by or on behalf of human intelligence collection organizations.' The new visual materials would be available along with traditional mapping data for retrieval by mission planners and troops in the field."

DOJ:

Former DOJ Spokesman Blasts Gonzales Over BALCO. The Legal Times (6/5, McLure) reports, "It's not often you see one of former Attorney General John Ashcroft's aides publicly criticize the current Justice Department. But that's exactly what former Ashcroft spokesman Mark Corallo did last week when he submitted an affidavit bashing the DOJ for issuing subpoenas to two San Francisco Chronicle reporters who wrote articles about the BALCO steroid investigation based on leaked grand jury testimony." The Times continues, "In supporting the reporters' motion to quash, Corallo accused Justice's leadership of violating long-standing departmental policies that discourage subpoenaing reporters except in certain circumstances 'where immediate action is required to avoid the loss of life or the compromise of a security interest.' … 'I just saw an egregious abuse of power,' says Corallo. 'There seems to be this attitude at [the DOJ] that just because the law says we can, we will.'" The Times adds, "Corallo, who now runs his own public relations company, has some clients who likely didn't mind him taking a swat at his old employer. He's been retained by Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, the securities class action firm indicted by the Justice Department last month. He's also served as spokesman for Karl Rove, the presidential aide under scrutiny by DOJ Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald in the investigation into the leak of CIA agent Valerie Plame's identity. That case, of course, may hinge on the degree to which reporters are compelled to cooperate with prosecutors and defense lawyers. … Corallo, however, says his client list didn't affect his decision to jump into the BALCO matter. 'None of my clients had any idea that I was doing this,' he says. Regardless, his move will likely burn bridges with some fellow Republicans at the DOJ."

Assistant USA Tapped As Pentagon IG Nominee. The AP (6/5) reports, "Assistant U.S. Attorney David Laufman is President Bush's pick to be the Pentagon's chief overseer of internal investigations." The AP continues, "The White House on Monday sent the Senate Laufman's nomination for inspector general at the Defense Department. … If confirmed, Laufman would replace Joseph E. Schmitz, who resigned last September to become chief operating officer for the Prince Group, a division of Blackwater USA, which provides security services to troops in Iraq and around the globe." The AP adds, "The inspector general is the principal adviser to the secretary of defense for matters relating to the prevention of fraud, waste and abuse in the Defense Department. …. Laufman, who received a bachelor's degree from the University of Pennsylvania and a law degree from Georgetown University, is assistant U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia. … Before that, he was chief of staff for the office of the deputy attorney general at the Justice Department. Earlier in his career, he was investigative counsel for the House Ethics Committee."

DOJ's Privacy Advocate's Powers Are Limited. The Legal Times (6/6, Mclure) reports, "From spying on domestic-based international phone calls without a court warrant to reportedly obtaining the phone records of tens of millions of customers of AT&T, BellSouth and Verizon, the federal government appears to have made safeguarding Americans' privacy a low priority. … So it may come as a surprise to learn that the Justice Department -- the agency responsible for defending such programs -- has a top official charged with making sure the agency doesn't violate Americans' rights while pursuing terrorists. Jane Horvath became the department's first full-time chief privacy and civil liberties officer in February. … But her powers are limited and, in the view of a number of privacy advocacy groups, negligible. Unlike privacy officers in Europe and Canada, she has no power to subpoena federal law enforcement officials with knowledge of alleged privacy or civil liberties violations. Nor can she report independently to Congress. … 'I tend to think it is window dressing,' says David Sobel, general counsel of the Electronic Privacy Information Center. 'The creation of a position like this within DOJ is a matter of [the department] paying lip service to the very real privacy problems that arise from their activities.' … And, in fact, Horvath herself says she has no intention of taking a confrontational approach or acting independently of Justice's leadership in defending privacy rights at an agency that has vigorously defended the National Security Agency's domestic spying and whose own investigators are increasingly circumventing federal courts to collect personal information on American citizens."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Bawag Settles Refco Charges With US For $675 Million. The AP (6/6) reports, "Austria's Bawag PSK bank will pay at least $675 million to avoid prosecution and to settle bankruptcy claims after admitting its role in the collapse of commodities brokerage Refco Inc., U.S. authorities announced Monday." The AP continues, "The bank, together with the Austrian Trade Unions Association, which owns Bawag, will forfeit $337.5 million to the United States to be distributed to victims of the fraud at Refco, according to prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission. … In return, U.S. authorities have agreed not to prosecute Bawag, U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said." The AP adds, "The government will distribute half of the $337.5 million in forfeited funds to the Refco bankruptcy estate and half to other victims of the Refco fraud, he said. … In a statement, the bank said it will initially pay $158 million, with $150 million being divided equally between the Refco creditors and the U.S. Department of Justice and another $8 million being paid to a class-action settlement fund. … The bank said the Justice Department will distribute its money to the Refco estates and the securities claimants, among others. … As much as a year later, the bank will pay the remainder, to be split equally between the Justice Department and Refco creditors, the bank said."

USA Today (6/6, Farrell) reports, "The settlement was part of a non-prosecution agreement between federal prosecutors and the Bank fur Arbeit und Wirtschaft (Bawag), headquartered in Vienna. In a statement, Michael Garcia, the U.S. Attorney in Manhattan, said the bank merited the non-prosecution agreement because new management, installed in January after the scandal, was cooperating fully with the criminal investigation. … Although no mention was made of the bank's previous management, prosecutors and regulators from the Securities and Exchange Commission are continuing their investigation." USA adds, "The deal lifts a cloud of uncertainty from the bank, while resolving most of the financial claims that have been lodged against it for its role in propping up Refco, now in Chapter 11. 'We're pleased to have resolved all these matters,' said Andrew Levander of the Dechert law firm, which represents Bawag. 'We believe this generally resolves all potential claims against Bawag.'"

Enron Prosecutors Have Possible Future Targets, But Might Be Winding Down. The Wall Street Journal (6/6, Emshwiller) reports, "The giant federal investigation of Enron Corp. has produced criminal charges against 32 people, and it is continuing. But will it ever spit out charges against anyone else?" The Journal continues, "That question hangs over the four-year-old probe in the wake of its greatest victory: the convictions last month of former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay and former President Jeffrey Skilling on conspiracy and fraud charges. The four-month trial of those two men was viewed as a culmination of the federal criminal probe that began in the wake Enron's collapse into bankruptcy in December 2001." The Journal adds, "Theoretically, the federal Enron Task Force still has lots of potential targets for criminal charges. Some even came up by name during the Lay/Skilling trial. Court filings in that case said about 100 individuals have been identified as co-conspirators of the two men. Of those criminally charged, 16 have pleaded guilty, eight have been convicted at trial, two have been acquitted and the rest are awaiting trial. … Among the senior executives whose names have come up during the criminal proceedings is Jeff McMahon, who served various senior Enron positions; David Duncan, one of the company's outside auditors and the only man in the Enron saga to have pleaded guilty to a crime and then reversed himself; and Greg Whalley, who took over as Enron's president when Mr. Skilling unexpectedly quit in August 2001. … Some observers believe that with its biggest case now completed, the Task Force is unlikely to file new cases. Instead, it probably will wind down its efforts and focus on cleaning up the already filed charges. 'Enron Beach is closed, and not just for the summer,' says Jacob Frenkel, a former federal prosecutor now in private practice in Rockville, Md. … However, others say the government could feel obligated to bring additional cases even after nabbing the two top figures at the company. As a prosecutor, 'you want to make sure that the people most culpable are held to account,' says Jonathan Halpern, a former federal prosecutor now in private practice in New York. … Another possibility is that any future cases will be handled as civil matters by the Securities and Exchange Commission, which could seek large monetary penalties from individuals."

Central Figure In Milberg, Weiss Case Lost His Midas Touch. The New York Times (6/6, Creswell, Glater) reports, "When it came to investing, Howard J. Vogel seemed to possess a perverse kind of Midas touch. … In early October 1997, he bought 50 shares of Oxford Health Plans. Three weeks later, the stock nose-dived, and Mr. Vogel lost about $3,000 of his investment. Still, Mr. Vogel reaped $1.1 million." The Times continues, "How was that possible? … Mr. Vogel was a plaintiff in a shareholder lawsuit filed by the New York securities litigation powerhouse Milberg Weiss Bershad Hynes & Lerach against Oxford Health. In 2003, the company, along with other parties that were sued, paid $300 million to settle. … Most of the investors received pennies on the dollar for their losses. But Mr. Vogel, then a real estate mortgage broker in Englewood, N.J., was not just a hapless investor who bought the wrong stock at the wrong time." The Times adds, "Mr. Vogel now says, according to a plea agreement with federal prosecutors, that he and members of his family were actually linchpins in a long-running arrangement that helped Milberg Weiss snare the lucrative lead counsel position in the Oxford Health and many other securities lawsuits, reaping hundreds of millions of dollars in legal fees. … Mr. Vogel, who has since moved to Florida, is a central figure in the government's case against Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, as the law firm is now called. Last month, a federal grand jury in Los Angeles indicted the firm and two of its name partners on several criminal charges, including racketeering conspiracy and money laundering. The firm is accused of making $11.3 million in illegal secret payments to Mr. Vogel and two others who served as plaintiffs in more than 150 lawsuits. … The firm contends it has done nothing improper and has vowed to fight the charges against it. But Milberg Weiss is struggling to keep its lawyers and clients from walking away. Several lawyers have left the firm and a number of institutional investors, including the New York state employee pension fund, have removed it as counsel in high-profile lawsuits."

Prudential To Fight Arbitrators' Ruling. The Wall Street Journal (6/6, Craig) reports, "An arbitrator once accused of being in Wall Street's pocket was part of a panel that unexpectedly returned a $14.5 million penalty against a major Wall Street firm." The Journal continues, "In late May, a New York Stock Exchange arbitration panel unanimously ordered Prudential Securities Inc. to pay $11.8 million plus back interest to Charanjit and Harpreet Sahni, a Roslyn Heights, N.Y., couple who alleged that Prudential mismanaged some of their money. From 2000 to 2004, the couple's Prudential account dwindled to less than $1 million from $23 million. Wachovia Corp. acquired a 62% stake in Prudential Securities in July 2003 from Prudential Financial Inc., which retained a 38% stake." The Journal adds, "A Prudential spokesman said of the ruling: 'We don't believe this decision conforms with the law, and we are considering taking steps to have the decision vacated.' … The case is significant not only for its size -- it is the third-largest award ever handed down by an NYSE panel -- but also because the couple's lawyer worked to have one of the three arbitrators who heard the case, a former Merrill Lynch & Co. employee named Robin Henry, removed from the panel."

WSJournal Says Judge Can Set Limits On DOJ In Corporate Fraud Cases. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/6) says federal Judge Lewis A. Kaplan is expected to rule on whether the Justice Department overstepped its bounds in pursuing the KPMG tax-fraud case. If Kaplan "rules against the government, it may lead to an overdue rethinking of how far prosecutors can go in demanding cooperation from companies under investigation." Kaplan "can lay down an important and necessary marker for corporate fraud cases going forward. Whether he imposes any sanction on the government, and of what sort, will show if Justice can get away with acting unjustly."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby's Attorneys Look To Documents For Defense. The Legal Times (6/5, Kelley) reports, "I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby Jr. never meant to lie to the FBI or to a federal grand jury. Instead, his lawyers blame 'confusion' or a 'faulty memory' for his failure to disclose conversations he had with reporters about CIA operative Valerie Plame. … In other words, he simply forgot." The Times continues, "Given the hectic nature of his job as Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff, Libby's lawyers say, it's understandable that their client might have failed to remember 'snippets of conversation' he felt were unimportant. … And even if he did talk to reporters about Plame, the defense argues, he had no motive to lie about it later because he didn't know her status was classified and therefore was unaware he had done anything wrong. … Then again, they contend, it might just be that the reporters who claim they talked to Libby about Plame are themselves confused." The Times adds, "Little by little, Libby's lawyers have revealed aspects of their defense in court filings and at pretrial hearings. They've indicated what players likely will be called as witnesses, and they've made requests for thousands of documents — actions that shed light on likely trial strategies. … 'It looks like the defense is going in a few directions, one of which is that Valerie Plame was so unimportant that even if Libby was mistaken, he didn't intend to lie,' says Peter Henning, a former lawyer with the Justice Department's Criminal Division and now a law professor at Wayne State University in Michigan. 'It looks like they may also raise some challenges as to what was actually said in these fairly short conversations with reporters.' … Libby is accused of lying to a grand jury and to FBI agents investigating claims that someone in the White House leaked Plame's identity to the media in the summer of 2003 to retaliate against her husband, Joseph Wilson, an outspoken critic of the Iraq war. When questioned about his knowledge of the leak, Libby allegedly lied about how and when he learned of Plame's CIA status, and with whom he discussed the classified information."

WSJournal Says Case Against Libby Is Weak. An editorial in the Wall Street Journal (6/6) says that Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald's use of a Journal editorial as part of his perjury and obstruction case against former Vice Presidential aide Scooter Libby, "suggests that his case is a lot weaker than his media spin. Mr. Libby wasn't a source for our editorial, which quoted from the October 2002 National Intelligence Estimate concerning the Africa-uranium issue. But Mr. Fitzgerald alleges in a court filing that Mr. Libby played a role in us getting the information, which in turn shows that 'notwithstanding other pressing government business, [Libby] was heavily focused on shaping media coverage of the controversy concerning Iraqi efforts to obtain uranium from Niger.'" The Journal adds, "The more of Mr. Fitzgerald's case that becomes public, the more it looks like he has made the terrible mistake for a prosecutor of taking Joe Wilson's side in what was essentially a political fight."

US Charges Seven With Drug, Money Laundering Scheme. The AP (6/6, Gentile) reports, "Seven people, including two affiliated with Limelight Films Inc., a film and TV distribution company, have been charged as part of a two-year investigation into allegations of drug trafficking, money laundering and arms dealing." The AP continues, "Bruno D'Esclavelles, 45, chief executive of Limelight, and Alexander de Basseville, 35, who is affiliated with Limelight's parent, the Swiss firm ADB Swiss S.A., were arrested in Alexandria, Va., and charged with conspiracy to distribute the drug Ecstasy." The AP adds, "Federal officials say de Basseville met several times over two years with undercover agents posing as international drug traffickers. … De Basseville offered to launder drug money, supply weapons and broker drug deals for the agents, according to a press release from the U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia and a separate release from the Drug Enforcement Administration. … Authorities say that on two occasions, de Basseville and D'Esclavelles took cash, which they were told came from drug sales, and laundered it through Limelight Films. … In February, de Basseville and D'Esclavelles allegedly arranged for an associate, Thomas Frischknecht of the Netherlands, to sell 10,000 Ecstasy pills to undercover agents. The pills were shipped to the agent in Virginia, authorities said."

On its Web site, ABC News (6/6) reports, "A man engaged to Charlie Chaplin's granddaughter was arrested in a drug sting targeting a group that trafficked the drug ecstasy from Europe to Los Angeles and used a Hollywood movie studio to launder money, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration. DEA officials say Alexandre De Basseville, who is engaged to Chaplin's granddaughter Kiera Chaplin, and Bruno D'Esclaelles, the CEO of Limelight Films, met on several occasions with undercover federal agents during the past two years and attempted to set up deals to bring 500,000 ecstasy pills into the United States." ABC News also quotes Karen Tandy's statement from the DEA press release.

Businesses Wary Of Governmental Data-Sharing Efforts. Information Week (6/6, Greenemeier) reports, "A Justice Department proposal that ISPs retain records for two years is just the latest in a growing list of data collection initiatives by federal agencies. … To protect the public from terrorism and other hazards, the U.S. government mines its vast databases for signs of trouble. Increasingly, the feds are requesting--even demanding--that businesses share their data, too. But such cooperation isn't cheap or easy, and several industries are pushing back to protect their customers' privacy." IW continues, "Not long after forcing Internet companies to submit search terms, search result URLs, and other information as part of its enforcement of the Child Online Protection Act, the Justice Department is going a step further. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is now asking the likes of Google, AOL, and Verizon to keep subscriber information and other customer data for at least two years, just in case the government needs it for criminal investigations. Currently, Internet companies are under no obligation to save that data at all. … People want the government to have the data needed to fight crime and terrorism; it's the potential misuse of personally identifiable data--names, addresses, Social Security numbers, Web search histories--that is deeply worrisome." IW adds, "The feds have been mostly successful in getting businesses to cooperate. Following the 9/11 terrorist attacks, the government looked to transportation companies, especially airlines, to hand over information that can be used to match passengers and transportation workers with names on terrorist watch lists. However, while they initially complied with Homeland Security projects such as the Computer Assisted Passenger Pre-Screening System and Secure Flight, some airlines have said they're uneasy with the government's ability to safeguard their data from loss or misuse. … Privacy advocates worry about the volume of data being collected (millions of records and many terabytes of data), the length of time it's stored, and the level of detail. … Yet even as one data-sharing arrangement comes under scrutiny, another arises. The U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention has requested that international airlines store passenger emergency contact information for six months in the event of a bird flu outbreak."

House Democrats To Determine Fate Of Jefferson's Ways And Means Seat. The Hill (6/6, Hearn) reports that with "emotions still raw over House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) recent request that Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) relinquish his seat on the Ways and Means Committee while he faces a government bribery investigation, House Democrats are convening a meeting this evening of their Steering and Policy Committee. The committee is charged with determining panel memberships, among other matters." It was "unclear at press time whether the steering committee, which is stocked with Pelosi loyalists, would discuss Jefferson's situation or vote to take him off the tax-writing panel."

Roll Call (6/6, Kornacki) reports the timing of the meeting announcement -- "it was only a few session days ago that Jefferson ignored a demand from House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) that he leave Ways and Means immediately — promptly ignited speculation that Pelosi is planning to ask the Steering and Policy Committee to recommend to the full Democratic Caucus that Jefferson be stripped of his assignment on the exclusive panel." A senior Democratic aide, however, "said that Pelosi is expected to broach the Jefferson subject but said that she is likely to tread carefully, perhaps only sampling opinion instead of calling for specific actions."

House Leaders Willing To Let Courts Decide Fate Of Jefferson Documents. CQ (5/5, Ferrechio) reports, "Once-irate House leaders now are inclined to sit back and let judges determine whether the executive branch overstepped its bounds with the first-ever search of a lawmaker's Capitol Hill office." The "uproar over the 18-hour search and removal of documents from the Rayburn House Office Building has subsided to such a large degree that House General Counsel Geraldine Gennet turned down an offer from the Justice Department to meet about it this week." Instead, Gennet "told investigators that the House position is to let a court decide the fate of the seized items, said Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse. There will be a meeting sometime next week, Roehrkasse said."

Safavian Denies Lying About Golfing Trip With Abramoff. The New York Times (6/6, Shenon) reports former White House budget official David Safavian "acknowledged Monday that he had provided 'a lot of insight and advice,' including government information not available to the public, to the lobbyist Jack Abramoff in 2002." But Safavian "testified that he had not violated ethics rules in accepting the lobbyist's invitation for a golfing trip to Scotland that summer." Safavian "insisted in testimony in federal court here that he had not lied to government investigators when he was asked about the golf trip, although he acknowledged giving them inaccurate information about some contacts with Mr. Abramoff, a former lobbying partner."

Government Executive (6/6, Mandel) reports, "David Safavian, former head of the Office of Management and Budget's procurement policy division, took the stand in his own defense for the second time Monday, describing how he provided assistance to his friend and former colleague Jack Abramoff in ways that approached, but did not cross, lines of propriety." GE continues, "Safavian faces charges that he lied about his dealings with Abramoff to obtain clearance from the General Services Administration ethics office to go on a golfing trip to Scotland while serving as the chief of staff at that agency, and that he subsequently obstructed two investigations into his participation in the trip. … As the final witness in his own defense, Safavian testified that he had advised Abramoff on efforts to take over two GSA-controlled properties, as was clear from a large number of e-mail messages presented as evidence by Justice Department lawyers earlier in the case. But on Friday, Safavian had testified that while he had not expected some of that assistance to actually help, he had moved his friend's queries forward so Abramoff could get answers from the appropriate GSA decision-makers. … Safavian said he had arranged a meeting and provided information about a large GSA property in White Oak, Md., that Abramoff hoped to lease for a religious school he and his wife founded, despite it being clear that the effort to lease the property would not ultimately succeed. He said he had tried to explain that the religious nature of the school and potentially hazardous condition of the buildings ruled out leasing the property to Abramoff's Eshkol Academy."

Indicted Senator Begins Testimony At Tennessee Waltz Trial. The Memphis Commercial Appeal (6/6, Buser) reports, "Former state senator Roscoe Dixon took the stand Monday in his bribery trial, hoping to undo five days of testimony and secret recordings that prosecutors say illustrate a politician on the take. Dixon, who resumes the stand today, testified for about 45 minutes near the end of the day, telling jurors of his family background, of working and attending college, of 16 years of service in the Army and Tennessee National Guard and his life as a legislator from 1982 to 1994. 'Lobbyists play a very powerful role,' said Dixon, who addressed jurors in a personable manner and sometimes added gentle humor to his answers. … 'Everybody wants to get your ear.'" WMC-TV Memphis (6/5) and WPTY-TV Memphis (6/5) also reported on Dixon's testimony.

Jury Hears Tape Of Dixon Complaining About Senate Pay. The AP (6/6, Baird) reports Dixon "complained that his job as a lawmaker paid too little, according to a recording played for a federal jury Monday. 'I need to get in the big league, man,' Roscoe Dixon said on a recording played at his bribery and extortion trial. L.C. McNeil, an FBI agent testifying under his code name, said the recording was made in August 2004 when he was talking with Dixon about the senator's desire to leave the Legislature." The AP adds that Dixon "complained that no matter how much per diem pay he drew above base salary, he could not make more than $30,000 a year as a Senator. 'Everybody got some semi-hustle,' he said of the state Legislature." WTVF-TV Nashville (6/5) reports McNeil also "told the jury he talked to Barry Myers about paying bribes to Dixon. Myers has been described as a 'bag man' by federal investigators."

Former Chicago Water Official Testifies About Political Hires. The Chicago Tribune (6/6, Mihalopoulos, Bush, 643K) reports, "From the time Mayor Richard Daley took office, dozens of city department managers gathered before elections at the plumbers' union hall or other sites to get campaign marching orders from top mayoral aides, a former Daley loyalist testified Monday in the City Hall corruption trial. Donald Tomczak, a longtime Water Department official and veteran political operative, said he then would summon his top deputies to his office in the Jardine Filtration Plant to tell them which candidates would get help from hundreds of blue-collar city water workers." The Tribune adds that "Tomczak described a Daley campaign organization in which high-ranking city officials doubled as political coordinators," and "promotions for water workers were based more on precinct-by-precinct election results than actual job performance." The Chicago Sun-Times (6/6, Korecki, Novak, Warmbir) notes, "Assistant U.S. Attorney Patrick Collins asked if two soldiers in Tomczak's political army deserved the city positions they were given. 'Were they the best men for the jobs?' Collins asked. 'No,' Tomczak said plainly. 'They were active in my political group and did a good job.'"

Federal Monitor Finds Numerous Incidents Of Improper Behavior By UMDNJ Dean. The Philadelphia Inquirer (6/6, Graham, 423K) reports, "The allegations that have been swirling around Warren Wallace for weeks finally came to light yesterday, and the details were not pretty. A federal monitor investigating the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey, where Wallace was a senior dean until he was fired last week, accused him of manipulating the petty-cash system and steering a lucrative no-bid catering and cafeteria contract to a friend. The monitor's report also said Wallace, a Gloucester County freeholder and chairman of the Delaware River and Bay Authority, had devoted 'significant' amounts of university time and resources to his political jobs. … The monitor said Wallace's actions were, 'at a minimum, unethical.'" The Inquirer notes, "The monitor received a tip May 17 that Wallace's secretary was shredding documents, and the FBI quickly raided his office." The Camden Courier-Post (6/6, Greenblatt) adds, "The report said members of the school's Admissions Committee said Wallace forced them to interview a relative who had not yet taken the Medical College Aptitude Test or completed application essays. Committee members told investigators that Wallace's actions damaged the school's reputation, but he defended his behavior in a letter to the panel's chairman, the report said. Wallace's efforts on his daughter's behalf ultimately caused UMDNJ officials to fire him, university spokeswoman Anna Farneski said on Monday."

Investigators Collect DNA Evidence For Case Against Jeffs. CNN's Anderson Cooper 360 (6/5, Roberts) reported, "Fugitive polygamist and cult leader Warren Jeffs…remains on the FBI's most wanted list tonight, a $100,000 bounty on his head. Jeffs is wanted for alleged sex crimes involving minors. Tonight his whereabouts are still unknown, but authorities are busy strengthening their case against him." CNN (Kaye) added, "During this raid of the FLDS compound in Colorado City, Arizona, investigators weren't expecting to find…Jeffs but evidence against him – evidence that could prove Jeffs forced young girls to marry men sometimes twice their age and give them children. … If Jeffs performed the marriages and DNA evidence proves girls were under age when they conceived, Jeffs will have even bigger problems than he has simply living in illegal polygamist lifestyle."

Family Of Mob-Hit Victim Blames Government For Death. The AP (6/6) reports, "John McIntyre thought he was going to a house party on Nov. 30, 1984. … Instead, he was chained to a chair, interrogated, strangled, then shot in the head." The AP continues, "McIntyre's family is suing the federal government for $50 million, alleging that McIntyre was killed by fugitive crime boss James 'Whitey' Bulger after former FBI Agent John Connolly tipped him that McIntyre was cooperating with authorities in an investigation of Bulger." The AP adds, "As the McIntyre family's wrongful death lawsuit went to trial Monday, attorney Steven Gordon gave chilling details of McIntyre's killing. … Gordon said McIntyre was lured to a house by Bulger and Stephen 'The Rifleman' Flemmi, leaders of the notorious Winter Hill Gang. … After he arrived carrying a case of beer, McIntyre was handcuffed and chained to a chair, then interrogated by Bulger, who asked him if he was talking to authorities about Bulger's failed plan to ship guns to the Irish Republican Army on a Gloucester fishing boat. … 'It did not take much time for John McIntyre to say he was,' Gordon said. … Flemmi, Bulger's former right hand man, who pleaded guilty to participating in McIntyre's death, is expected to be a key witness for the McIntyre family. … Flemmi, who is serving a life sentence in 10 killings as part of a plea deal that spared him the death penalty, testified in a deposition last year that Connolly told Bulger that McIntyre had begun talking to federal authorities about Bulger's criminal activities. … Flemmi testified only briefly Monday before the trial recessed for the day. He is scheduled to resume his testimony Tuesday."

Couple Accused Of Selling Children Await Extradition. The AP (6/6) reports, "A fugitive couple accused of trying to sell their children in Mexico spent the weekend in San Diego jails will be extradited to Arizona." The AP continues, "The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children reportedly tipped off federal investigators about the couple. The tip led Mexican authorities to arrest 20-year-old Jessica Karin Heird and 37-year-old Edward Henry Leader in Tijuana on Friday. … Mexican authorities reportedly found the couple's 3-year-old son, but their 18-month-old daughter was still missing. The San Diego Union-Tribune reported that the boy and girl were sold, though there was no word on who paid for the children or what the price was."

KGTV, San Diego (6/6) reports, "Heird -- who is six months pregnant -- and Leader had been living south of the border for several years and allegedly decided to make money by selling two of their youngest children, Deputy U.S. Marshal Omar Castillo said Monday. … Investigators believe the suspects took cash for their 18-month-old daughter and 3-year-old son. Authorities have since recovered the youngsters, who evidently were not physically harmed during their ordeals, Castillo said."

"Mafia Cops" Sentenced To Life In Prison. The Long Island Newsday (6/6, Destefano) reports, "The 'Mafia Cops' took eight lives and yesterday, they learned theirs would be lost to prison." Newsday continues, "Saying their crimes were the worst he ever saw, a Brooklyn federal judge hit two ex-Police Department detectives with life terms in prison and million-dollar fines for their roles as mob hit men. … 'It is hard to visualize a more heinous offense,' said Judge Jack B. Weinstein as he announced in a packed courtroom the heavy sentences for Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa for their roles in eight gangland murders during a bloody period that stretched from the mid-1980s into the early 1990s. … 'These are probably the most heinous crimes ever tried in this courthouse,' Weinstein said. … 'These two men stand before you unrepentant and remorseless and perhaps by a higher power unforgivable,' said lead prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Henoch. 'Police are supposed to protect people; we don't have death squads here -- at least we aren't supposed to.' … But in another twist in a case that has been filled with complex legal issues, Weinstein delayed imposition of the sentences until hearings are held later this month on critical post-trial motions for either acquittal or new trials. Both defendants will remain jailed but have asked Weinstein to overturn the April guilty verdicts, in part because the statute of limitations on the federal racketeering charges had expired. … Weinstein is also going to hold a hearing on Eppolito's and Caracappa's claims that their high-profile lawyers, Bruce Cutler and Edward Hayes, respectively, gave them ineffective representation. The lawyers have denied that claim. But no matter how Weinstein decides those issues, the case will be litigated for years."

The New York Times (6/6, Feuer) reports, "There was little reaction from either man in Federal District Court in Brooklyn and both returned to jail, where Mr. Caracappa's face has grown skeletal and Mr. Eppolito has grown a white goatee and gotten somewhat slimmer. … By law, the friends and family of a victim can address the court at sentencing, and before the penalty was read, there were brutally emotional — and achingly personal — accounts from the survivors. … One of them was Michal Weinstein, daughter of the jeweler, Israel Greenwald, who on Feb. 10, 1986, disappeared after giving young Michal a hug as she waited for a bus. She was 10 years old then, and as she spoke from the stand, addressing both defendants by name, it was with a caged fury that only now, after 20 years, had found release. … 'You took away our daddy,' she said, 'and by doing that you took away our childhood. You took away our mother. You stole our innocence. You filled our nights with nightmares and our days with torture.'"

The AP (6/6, McShane) reports, "Both defendants have been jailed since their April 6 convictions on racketeering charges that included murder, kidnapping, drug dealing and obstruction of justice. … Eppolito, 57, whose father was a member of the Gambino crime family, and Caracappa, 64, were respected detectives who worked for Luchese underboss Anthony 'Gaspipe' Casso between 1986 and 1990. The eight murders were committed while they were simultaneously on the payrolls of the New York Police Department and Casso." The AP notes, "The sentencing delay was anticlimactic compared to the courtroom theatrics that preceded it. Barry Gibbs, who spent almost 20 years in jail after a wrongful conviction in a case where Eppolito was lead investigator, stood up in the middle of Eppolito's speech to attack the ex-detective before federal marshals led him out of the courtroom. … 'Remember what you did to me? To me? You framed me!' he screamed as the crowd burst into cheers."

The Los Angeles Times (6/6, Barry) reports, "Hayes and Cutler delivered memorable opening and closing statements but called few witnesses. Cutler's entire defense lasted 13 minutes. Eppolito has replaced him with a new lawyer, Joseph Bondy, who said Cutler should have identified other potential perpetrators and allowed Eppolito to take the stand. Caracappa's new lawyer, Daniel Nobel, filed a similar complaint Monday morning." The Times continues, "Attorneys for the pair argued that the verdict should be thrown out because, except for one charge, the crimes did not fall within the statute of limitations for racketeering."

Scalia Rebukes Alito In Speedy Trial Case Ruling. The Legal Times (6/6, Mauro) reports, "Just four months after joining the Supreme Court, Samuel Alito Jr. on Monday joined the club of jurists who have been targets of Justice Antonin Scalia's wrath." The Times continues, "Alito wrote Zedner v. United States for a unanimous Court on Monday, siding with a criminal defendant in a dispute over interpretation of the Speedy Trial Act. But Scalia, while joining the decision, wrote a concurrence criticizing Alito for citing the legislative history of the statute, which Scalia believes is irrelevant. … 'Because the use of legislative history is illegitimate and ill advised in the interpretation of any statute -- and especially a statute that is clear on its face -- I do not join this portion of the Court's opinion,' Scalia wrote." The Times adds, "The side spat is a small but significant sign of Alito's independence from Scalia, whom many presumed would be a consistent conservative ally and friend. … In the drafting process, Alito could easily have mollified Scalia by deleting the paragraph that invoked legislative history. In interpreting acts of Congress, Scalia has vocally criticized reliance on legislative history -- congressional floor statements, committee reports, and the like -- in his 20 years on the Court, preferring instead to go strictly by the words of the statute. But the fact that Alito left the paragraph in, and Scalia felt moved to object to it, revealed at least some daylight between the two. … Alito's use of legislative history places him closer to the camp of moderate-liberal Justice Stephen Breyer, who last year warned in his book 'Active Liberty' of 'the danger that lurks where judges rely too heavily on text.'" The Times notes, 'Monday's ruling favored Jacob Zedner, indicted in 1996 on seven charges of bank fraud. Both he and the prosecution sought delays in the trial, raising red flags because of requirements of the Speedy Trial Act that a trial begin 70 days after a defendant is charged. Responding to a request from the judge, Zedner signed a form waiving his rights 'for all time' under the law. … After four years of procedural delays, Zedner moved to dismiss the indictment, claiming the prosecution had violated the Speedy Trial Act. The motion was denied, the trial proceeded, and he was found guilty. The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled against Zedner, finding that because he had contributed to the delay in the trial, he could not object to it."

High Court To Consider Retroactivity Of "Blakely." The AP (6/6) reports, "The Supreme Court said Monday it will decide whether inmates can reopen challenges to prison sentences based on a Court ruling two years ago that limited judicial discretion in sentencing." The AP continues, "Justices will hear arguments this fall from Lonnie Burton, who is serving nearly 47 years in prison in Washington state for rape, robbery and burglary. … Burton's lawyers told justices that the judge increased Burton's sentence by about 21 years, declaring that he deserved a harsher sentence than the sentencing scheme provided for there." The AP adds, "The case two years ago was also from Washington state. Justices on a 5-4 vote overturned the sentence of a Washington state man for kidnapping his estranged wife. A judge, acting alone, had determined that Ralph Blakely acted with 'deliberate cruelty' and deserved a longer prison term. … Justices did not say then how the decision would affect old cases. Justice Antonin Scalia authored that opinion, for an odd right-left lineup of justices."

Texas Man Slated For Execution For 1992 Murder. The AP (6/6, Graczyk) reports, "A man who killed his girlfriend with an ax while he was high on crack cocaine is to be executed by lethal injection Tuesday, the 11th person to be put to death in Texas this year." The AP continues, "Timothy Titsworth, 34, is the first of three scheduled to die this month in the nation's most active capital punishment state. The U.S. Supreme Court refused to review Titsworth's case in January." The AP adds, "Evidence showed Titsworth, who dropped out of school before he reached high school and worked as a roofer, was high on crack cocaine at the time of the July 23, 1992, attack. … 'I didn't think that I had a problem and didn't accept the help and treatment provided to me,' Titsworth, who had walked out of at least two drug treatment programs, wrote on an anti-death penalty Web site. 'With my fear, ignorance and denial of the truth that so many others have seen, I ended up here: on Texas death row.' … Before the killing, Titsworth had avoided a five-year prison term for auto theft by attending a boot camp for two months, an option available to him as a first-time felony offender. He was released on probation. … Three months later, he was arrested and charged with capital murder for the slaying of his girlfriend, who died at the mobile home they shared in Amarillo, in north Texas. Christine Sossaman, 26, had been hit about 16 times with a dull two-bladed ax as she slept."

Duke To Reinstate Lacrosse Team. ABC World News Tonight (6/5, story 11, :15, Gibson) reported, "The Duke University lacrosse team is being reinstated. Duke's president said today the team will be allowed to play next season under strict rules and on probation. The team's season was cancelled in April after an exotic dancer claimed she was raped by three team members."

Two Women Charged With Insurance Fraud In California Hit-And-Run Cases. The Los Angeles Times (6/6, Dimassa) reports, "Two women in their 70s were arraigned today on nine counts of fraud in connection with multimillion-dollar life insurance policies they took out on two homeless men who were later killed in hit-and-run accidents." The Times continues, "The women, Olga Rutterschmidt and Helen Golay, pleaded not guilty to the charges, which include mail fraud and aiding and abetting a crime in connection with life insurance statements. … Authorities have said that the women are suspects in the 2005 death of Kenneth McDavid and the 1999 death of Paul Vados. The women allegedly took out 19 life insurance policies on the men and eventually cashed in more than $2.2 million in claims after the transients died in hit-and-run pedestrian accidents in Los Angeles. … No charges have been filed in the men's deaths. … U.S. Magistrate Judge Paul L. Abrams ordered a July 25 trial date for Rutterschmidt and Golay, who remain in federal custody."

Police Lineups Called Flawed, But Improvements Seen Unlikely. In an op-ed in the New York Times (6/6), David Feige, a former public defender in the Bronx, writes, "The police lineup — in which the anxious eyewitness casts an accusing gaze on a string of sullen men (or women) on the other side of one-way glass — is as much a staple of actual law enforcement as it is of 'C.S.I.' and 'Law & Order.' It is also highly flawed. Yet because of a poorly designed study of lineups in Illinois, much-needed improvements to the process may not be forthcoming." Feige continues, "For some time now, scientists, criminologists and defense lawyers have advocated ending the tradition of having the witness view potential suspects all at once and going instead to a sequential method, in which the witness views suspects (or photographs of them) one at a time. Better still is the 'double-blind' sequential test, in which the law-enforcement official administering the lineup does not know who is the suspect and who are 'fillers.' … A pilot project in Minneapolis and a generation of peer-reviewed laboratory experiments have concluded that the sequential method has a smaller error rate than old-fashioned simultaneous lineups. New Jersey now uses sequential lineups, and legislatures or commissions in California, North Carolina, Virginia and Wisconsin have endorsed them. … In April, however, Illinois officials released a study showing the new method was less reliable than the traditional one, based on results in three police districts. According to the study, witnesses using the sequential method picked out an innocent person — someone brought in as a filler — 9 percent of the time, compared with a 3 percent rate for simultaneous lineups (both figures are oddly below the typical error rate in such studies of 20 percent or more)." Feige adds, "Prosecutors often tell us defense lawyers that they, too, want the fairest possible trials. But when it comes to identifications, it seems they want precisely what the current flawed lineups give them: suspect identifications."

More Colleges Offering Training In Digital Forensics. USA Today (6/6, Swartz) reports, "One of the hottest new courses on U.S. college campuses is a direct result of cybercrime" -- digital forensics. Already "about 100 colleges and universities offer undergraduate and graduate courses in digital forensics, with a few offering majors." While, "five years ago, there were only a handful." The field is "considered a crucial weapon in law enforcement's escalating war against computer-related crimes." The FBI, National Security Agency and the CIA, local law-enforcement officials and companies are all said to be "clamoring for experts in finding and preserving digital evidence."

Children Abducted By Parents Life Uncertain Lives. In a lengthy front-page article, the Washington Post (6/6, Montes) reports on children abducted by a parent, focusing on Carl Dodd and his 13-year search for the daughter whose mother he has accused of abducting from Washington, DC. The Post reports that "the teenager who greeted him at the police department in April was distant, doubtful. She asked him pointed questions: Why had her mother been arrested? Why were so many reporters around? Sunglasses partially hid her eyes, and when Dodd asked her to take them off so he could really see her, she refused. She made it clear she intended to stay with her grandmother in Wilmington, Del. … The reunion may have ended Dodd's determined search for his daughter, Marilyn Byrd, who disappeared with her mother from Southeast Washington when she was 4. But it was just the beginning of the long road back to a relationship with his only child, now a young woman of 17." The Post adds, "For people who spent their childhoods hiding out with a distraught parent, taking on new identities, the hardest part comes when the child is recovered and so-called normal life resumes. That is when they finally can afford to get angry about being used as a pawn in a nasty battle between the two people they loved the most. … Few understand Marilyn Byrd's conflicting emotions better than three people who spoke recently about their lingering bitterness over childhoods on the lam: … · Rebekah Ford, 28, a Wisconsin resident, still shudders as she recalls the most shocking moment of her childhood. It was the day the FBI came to her elementary school and showed her a flattened milk carton with her picture on it. Until then, she did not know that she was a missing child and that her name was not Heather Ann Brown. … Sam Potash of Philadelphia, who just turned 19, can finally speak publicly about the 8 1/2 months he spent on the run with his father when he was 10. He got used to pretending his name was Ben Davis and repeating the lie that his mother -- who was desperately searching for him -- was dead. … One of Liss Hart-Haviv's most vivid memories is trying to comfort her sobbing mother in a phone booth outside a California women's shelter after they had fled from her father. She was 10 and felt so old and alone. She even had a different name. … Three years ago, Hart-Haviv started Take Root, the first national organization for adults who went through such experiences as children. The cases continue to grow: More than 200,000 children are taken each year by a parent or other family member, according to the Justice Department."

CIVIL LAW:

High Court Rules Against Reporters Seeking To Keep Sources Secret. The Christian Science Monitor (6/6, Richey) reports, "Four journalists have lost their bid to reverse a judge's order to either disclose their confidential sources or face $500 per day in fines." The US Supreme Court yesterday "declined to take up the reporters' cases to examine whether a generally recognized 'reporters' privilege' against revealing sources should extend to a civil lawsuit brought by former nuclear-weapons-lab scientist Wen Ho Lee." The action "marks the second time in a year that the justices have let stand a judicial order seeking to force members of the media to renege on professional pledges of confidentiality made to government officials to obtain information for their news reporting."

The Wall Street Journal/AP (6/6) reports, "Late last week, Mr. Lee, who had sued the government for violating his rights under the Privacy Act, settled the lawsuit. He will receive $1.6 million from the government and five news organizations." Journalists "had been in civil contempt of court for refusing to disclose who leaked them information about an espionage investigation of Mr. Lee. The four reporters are H. Josef Hebert of the Associated Press, James Risen of the New York Times, Bob Drogin of the Los Angeles Times and Pierre Thomas, formerly of CNN and now working for ABC News." The Washington Post (6/6, A3, Lane) notes the reporters "no longer face contempt-of-court penalties for not naming their confidential sources, and their attorneys had been expected to file papers with the court asking it to dismiss the matter as moot."

LATimes Urges "Shield Law." The Los Angeles Times (6/6) editorializes, "Five news organizations -- including the Los Angeles Times -- agreed last week to pay a total of $750,000 to Wen Ho Lee, a former nuclear scientist who was arrested in 1999 and jailed for nine months as part of an espionage investigation at the Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico. The payments, part of a negotiated settlement of Lee's lawsuit accusing the US government of leaking information to the media from his personnel files, mean that reporters for The Times and the other news organizations won't be punished for declining to identify confidential sources." But "that slippery slope can be avoided if Congress follows the example of two-thirds of the states (including California) and enacts a 'shield law' providing limited but real protection to journalists' confidential sources."

SCOTUS Limits Firm's Use Of Civil RICO Suits. The AP (6/6, Locy) reports, "The Supreme Court on Monday limited the use of civil anti-racketeering laws by companies seeking damages for allegedly illegal acts by their competitors." The AP continues, "In two separate cases, the high court tackled the growing controversy over the increased use of civil provisions of a federal law that was designed to root out organized crime from legitimate businesses. The AP adds, "By an 8-1 vote, justices reversed an appeals court decision that had allowed Ideal Steel Supply Corp., a New York steel mill product supplier, to sue its chief competitor, National Steel Supply Inc., owned by Joseph and Vincent Anza. … Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, writing for the majority in the steel company case, said the victim of racketeering must suffer 'direct' injury from illegal acts. … Ideal Steel Supply alleged that National Steel Supply defrauded New York state tax authorities by offering lower prices minus taxes to customers who paid in cash. … But Kennedy said the direct victim of the fraud was not Ideal Steel Supply but New York state."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

DOJ To Monitor Elections In California, Alabama. The AP (6/6) reports, "The U.S. Department of Justice said Monday that it will monitor Tuesday's primary election in seven California counties to make sure officials adequately serve voters who don't speak English." The AP continues, "Alameda, Orange, San Benito, San Diego, San Mateo, Santa Clara and Ventura counties all are required to provide election information, ballots and voting assistance information in one or more minority languages under the 1965 federal Voting Rights Act." The AP adds, "In San Diego County, for instance, officials settled a federal lawsuit in 2004 by agreeing to provide voting materials in Spanish, Tagalog and Vietnamese, along with poll workers who can translate in those languages. … Alameda County is using paper ballots in Tuesday's primary because its 4,000 Diebold Election Systems touchscreen machines failed to meet federal and state standards. That is expected to cause delays in reporting the election outcome because the county does not have enough optical scanners to count the ballots at all polling places. … In each of the seven counties, observers directed by lawyers from the department's Civil Rights Division will watch and record voting activities at polling places. The department also will monitor elections in Alabama, New Jersey, New Mexico and South Dakota, all of which have primary elections on Tuesday."

The AP (6/6) reports, "The federal government will monitor polling place activities during primary elections in Hale County, Ala., on Tuesday to ensure compliance with the Voting Rights Act, the Justice Department announced Monday." The AP continues, "Hale County is one of 18 counties in Alabama, California, New Jersey, New Mexico and South Dakota to be monitored during Tuesday's voting. … Federal observers will watch and record activities during voting hours at polling locations to ensure that the rights of voters to participate in the election is not denied on the basis of their race. The department sends hundreds of observers each year to monitor elections across the country."

Bush Calls For Constitutional Amendment To Ban Gay Marriage. President Bush yesterday called for a constitutional amendment to ban same sex marriage. Bush's remarks were reported by all three networks last night, and are receiving ample attention on local TV stations and today's major newspapers. With the amendment being given little chance of passing – chances are "slim to none," said CNN's The Situation Room (6/5, Blitzer), while USA Today (6/6, Stone) estimates there's "virtually no chance" the Senate will approve it – the President's speech is being portrayed as an effort to rally his social conservative base with an eye on the November elections. The Los Angeles Times (6/6, Reynolds, Gerstenzang) reports White House Press Secretary Tony Snow "acknowledged there was a 'political dimension' to Bush's speech, because the measure was before the Senate, but said in response to a question, 'I don't think it's posturing.'" The Times adds, "As for making same-sex marriage a priority at a time when issues such as the war in Iraq have hurt Bush's poll numbers, Snow said the president could 'deal with more than one issue at a time.'" Bush "spoke at the Eisenhower Executive Office Building, next door to the White House. Some of those invited had been told the session would take place in the White House Rose Garden, a location that would have elevated the status of the meeting, but without explanation the venue was shifted."

The AP (6/5, Kellman) reports "all Senate Democrats, except Ben Nelson of Nebraska, oppose the amendment," and "together with moderate Republicans, the Democrats are expected to block" it. ABC World News Tonight (6/5, lead story, 2:45, Tapper) reported, "The President's critics say Mr. Bush spent the day putting important issues, such as the war in Iraq, on the back burner. The President met with religious leaders today in order to put a Federal constitutional ban on same sex marriage on the front burner." It's an "issue that the President used during his re-election campaign to rally his Christian conservative base. Many have been angry about the President's relative silence on the subject since then." But passage of the amendment is "highly unlikely." According to "a new ABC News poll, 58% of Americans say same-sex marriage should be illegal. But only 42% favor amending the Constitution. 51% say it should be up to the individual states."

On ABC World News Tonight (6/5, story 2, 1:20, Stephanopoulos) reported, "The politics are all about intensity. And according to our poll, the number of Americans who are strongly opposed to gay marriage is more than two the size of the number who are strongly for it. And that group of voters who want to block gay marriage is three-times as likely to vote on the issue. So, even though you're not going to see the President spending a lot of public time on this after today, the Republicans are going to zero in on those motivated voters, with targeted radio ads, with mailings especially in rural areas of Pennsylvania, Ohio and Missouri, where the incumbent's in tight races."

NBC Nightly News (6/5, story 4, 2:25, Gregory) reported, "Just a year ago, he said he really wasn't going to be pushing this issue because the support wasn't there. But what's changed? Only the fact that the President and his party now feel they need this issue." Today's remarks were "similar to those the President made during his last election year push on this issue two years ago." Then, "there weren't enough votes and the amendment died. Today, the votes still aren't there, but there is now plenty of pressure on this President to rally his conservative base and convince so-called values voters to get out and vote this fall." With his "second term hobbled by the war in Iraq, gay marriage is just one issue important to conservatives the President is highlighting."

The CBS Evening News (6/5, story 8, 0:20, Mitchell) reported, "The amendment has become a rallying point for Republicans this election year, and the Senate opens debate on it tomorrow but backers there do not have the two-thirds majority they need for passage."

Fox News' Special Report (6/5, Hume) reported that "while this thing may not succeed legislatively, there are some who think it might make some sense politically." CNN's The Situation Room (6/5, Blitzer) said "many Republicans are keen on making a statement in this congressional election year, including President Bush. With his conservative base shakier than ever, Mr. Bush declared…that he's proud to stand with supporters of a gay marriage ban." CNN's The Situation Room (6/5, Bash) later reported that Republicans have a "short-term political goal here, and that is the fact that conservatives say across the board, that they are very upset about the way their Republican leaders here in Washington, especially those up for reelection in 2006 are governing and they simply think that they have not paid attention to their issues enough."

Local TV coverage of Bush's remarks was extensive, with at least 500 local television newscasts across the country running. Local reports also suggested the President intends to use the issue to solidify support for the GOP among conservative voters before November's midterms. A less pervasive, but still prominent, theme of many of the segments was the President's silence on the issue since winning reelection -- a reelection several stations attributed, at least partially, to his opposition to gay marriage at the time. Many stations featured Sen. Joseph's Biden complaint, taken from NBC's Meet the Press on Sunday, that "the world's going to Hades in a handbasket" while the Senate debates gay marriage and other hot-button social issues. Typical of the coverage was WBBM TV Chicago (6/5, 6 PM), which reported that though the White House "says the President, who has been largely silent on the issue since his re-election, is talking about it now because of the impending senate vote" some "critics call the timing suspect."

WAGA TV Atlanta (6/5, 10 PM) reported that the President "said marriage between a man and a woman is one of the most fundamental and important human institutions and…should not be redefined by so-called 'activist' judges, who he says are overturning the state laws that ban gay marriage against the will of the majority of voters." WAGA noted that "last month, a state court judge here in Georgia struck down the state's constitution ban on gay marriage on a technicality."

KABC TV Los Angeles (6/5, 11 AM) reported "is hoping to use the topic to win political points in November."

WFLA TV Tampa-St. Petersburg (6/5, 11:30) asked, "Why this issue, Why now? … Opposition to gay marriage helped power the president to reelection in 2004 his critics now see a political diversion."

WJBK TV Detroit (6/5, 12 PM) reported, "Gay right activists are gearing up to blanket Capitol Hill. They're urge urging senators to vote against the banning of gay marriage." A gay activist was shown saying, "We're talking…discrimination being put in the constitution. That couldn't be more out of line with where with where the American people are right now."

Knight Ridder (6/5, Douglas) reports "critics on both sides of the debate accused the president of playing politics with the socially sensitive issue by seeking to rouse social conservatives to support Republicans in this congressional election year even if the cause has no realistic hope of enactment," and Bloomberg (6/6, Keil) says Bush made his pitch for the amendment "facing record low job-approval ratings…as he and his Republican Party seek to rally supporters ahead of the November congressional elections."

The Washington Post (6/6, Abramowitz, Babington) reports, "Aides have portrayed the president as a somewhat reluctant warrior in a battle forced on him by judges who have struck down laws against same-sex marriage in Maryland, New York and other states." The White House itself "has been unusually divided on the issue, with Vice President Cheney making it clear that he disagrees with the president and first lady Laura Bush saying the issue should not be made a political tool." Los Angeles Times (6/6, Reynolds, Gerstenzang) also mentions Cheney's stance in the last paragraphs of its story.

The New York Times (6/6, Rutenberg) reports "Republican Party officials in several states have released statements attacking Democrats who are not expected to vote for the amendment," and a "conservative group, the Family Research Council, is planning to ask lawmakers to take 'a marriage protection pledge' and then tell voters who signs it and who does not."

Some analysts see risks for the GOP as the debate shifts to this issue. CQ (6/6, Perine) reports some conservatives "are dismayed that Senate Republican leaders have backed away from their vow to move all of President Bush's appellate court nominations through the Senate. And many oppose provisions in the Senate's immigration overhaul measure (S 2611) that would set millions of illegal immigrants on a path to citizenship." Larry Sabato, a University of Virginia political scientist, "says this week's truncated debate on gay marriage could cause conservatives to ask themselves 'why bother to vote for Republicans when they can't produce on our issues?'"

Moreover, the Christian Science Monitor (6/6, Feldmann) says "the GOP's efforts at creating a 'big tent' image will be put to the test. Some of the most vulnerable members of Congress -- many of them moderate Republicans from the Northeast -- could be hurt by the debate, as it highlights a point of view less resonant in that part of the country than in others."

Republicans Hope Vote Will Help DeWine, Santorum. The Wall Street Journal (6/6, Lueck, Mullins) reports Republicans "hope the bill can help some embattled candidates at the polls. One is Ohio Republican Sen. Mike DeWine. A gay-marriage ban on the 2004 ballot in the Buckeye State is widely credited with drawing evangelicals to the polls and helping Mr. Bush narrowly carry that state. But Mr. De-Wine opposed that measure, citing objections to language that he said would invite lawsuits. That is one reason he appears to have trouble rallying social conservatives. This year, Mr. DeWine is a sponsor of the Senate amendment, which doesn't include the language he objected to previously." In Pennsylvania, "where Republican Sen. Rick Santorum is in a close contest to keep his seat, Republicans have highlighted his support of the gay-marriage amendment to help separate him from Democrat Bob Casey Jr."

The Washington Times (6/6, Dinan, Fagan) notes the National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) "used the Senate's marriage-amendment debate to criticize the Democratic challenger to Sen. Rick Santorum, a Pennsylvania Republican facing a tough re-election battle." They chided Casey "for not speaking at a Saturday meeting in Pittsburgh of the Stonewall Democrats, a homosexual rights group that supports him. Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean did speak to the group." From the other side, "the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee sent out an e-mail to supporters yesterday from Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, blasting Republicans. 'It's election season and down-in-the-polls Republicans are turning to their same old playbook -- fear and division,' wrote Mr. Reid, Nevada Democrat. 'We need a president and a Congress that doesn't play divisive politics.'"

Kennedy Says Gay Marriage Amendment Is Bigotry. Fox News' Special Report (6/5, Hume) reported, "Senator Ted Kennedy says the constitutional amendment banning gay marriage is bigotry pure and simple." Kennedy "says the amendment should be called quote, the right wining election strategy amendment, and accused the administration of using fear tactics."

More Commentary. Columnist E.J. Dionne writes in the Washington Post (6/6), "This month's offensive by President Bush and his allies in Congress against gay marriage and flag burning proves one thing: The Republican Party thinks its base of social conservatives is a nest of dummies who have no memories and respond like bulls whenever red flags are waved in their faces. The people who should be angry this week are not liberals or gays or lesbians, but the president's most loyal supporters. … When Bush was at his position of maximum strength after the 2004 election, did he use his political energy on behalf of a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage? Not at all."

Eugene Robinson writes in the Washington Post (6/6, A15), "What uncharted realm lies beyond brazen cynicism? A wasteland of utter shamelessness, perhaps? A vast Sahara of desperation, where principle goes to die? Someday George W. Bush and the Republican right will be able to tell us all about this barren terra incognita, assuming they ever find their way home. The Decider's decision to whip up a phony crisis over same-sex marriage -- Values under attack! Run for your lives! -- is such a transparent ploy that even conservatives are scratching their heads, wondering if this is the best Karl Rove could come up with." Bush "might as well open his next presidential address by giving himself a new title: The Distracter."

Supreme Court To Hear Affirmative Action Cases. ABC World News Tonight (6/5, story 10, :20, Gibson) reported, "The Supreme Court said today it will decide a major affirmative action issue -- whether public schools can use race as a factor in deciding which students attend which public schools. It will consider cases from Seattle to Louisville. But the case pertains to many more cities and the court will hear arguments in the fall."

The CBS Evening News (6/5, story 7, 0:20, Mitchell) reported, "This is the first time the two Bush appointees," Chief Justice John Roberts and Associate Justice Samuel Alito "will rule on a racial issue." NBC Nightly News (6/5, story 3, 0:35, Williams) said that during their "years as Justice Department lawyers, both Chief Justice John Roberts and Associate Justice Samuel Alito strongly opposed racial quotas."

USA Today (6/6, Biskupic) says the Seattle and Louisville cases "test whether the Constitution's guarantee of equality allows schools to use race as a factor in admissions. In both disputes, lower courts backed the school plans, and parents of white students appealed."

The New York Times (6/6, Greenhouse) reports the court's action came three years "after the court upheld a racially conscious admissions plan at the University of Michigan Law School. Writing for the majority in that 5-to-4 decision, Grutter v. Bollinger, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor suggested that, at least in higher education, affirmative action might be necessary for another 25 years." The new cases "do not ask the court to revisit that decision, and the justices are unlikely to do so. But the implications are far-reaching nonetheless. T he eventual decision, roughly a year from now, could not only set the court's path in this area but could also shape the climate in which government policies with respect to race will be debated."

The AP (6/6, Holland) reports, "The court's announcement that it will take up the cases this fall provides the first sign of an aggressiveness by the court under new Chief Justice John Roberts. The court rejected a similar case in December when moderate O'Connor was still on the bench. The outcome will most likely turn on her successor, Alito. … Both Roberts, 51, and Alito, 56, worked as Justice Department lawyers during the Reagan administration to limit affirmative action."

The Legal Times (6/6, Mauro) reports, "The cases granted review on Monday, Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1 and Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education, will be argued together this fall, possibly injecting the affirmative action debate into the election season. In both cases, white parents challenged programs that used race as a factor in school placements in ways that they say disadvantaged white students." The Times adds, "In Seattle, where students have broad choice as to which high school they will attend, race is a 'tiebreaker' factor in deciding which students will be assigned to a high school that is oversubscribed and racially imbalanced. The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, in an en banc ruling citing Grutter, upheld the program last October. … The other case involves schools in Louisville and the surrounding area, a district that was under a federal court desegregation decree from 1975 to 2000. After the order was lifted, a new plan was adopted that allowed for a wider range of student choices but required all schools to seek a black student enrollment of between 15 percent and 50 percent of the student body. In June 2004, Judge John Heyburn II of the Western District of Kentucky upheld the program in general, though he disapproved of some of the racial categorizing involved."

The Christian Science Monitor (6/6, Richey), Washington Post (6/6, A3, Lane), Los Angeles Times (6/6, Savage), Wall Street Journal (6/6, Bravin, Ben Winograd) and Washington Times (6/6, Price), among other sources, run similar stories on the case.

Verizon Hit With Record Penalty In Bias Suit. The Washington Post (6/6, D1, Joyce) reports, "Verizon Communications Inc. will pay almost $49 million to 12,326 current and former female employees as part of a landmark class-action lawsuit alleging pregnancy discrimination." The Post continues, "The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission reached a settlement in 2002 against Verizon predecessors Nynex Corp. and Bell Atlantic Corp. But the total amount of the settlement was not made public until yesterday, when the EEOC completed its projections of how much would be paid in future benefits. … The final figure makes the case the largest pregnancy discrimination settlement in EEOC history. It covers women in 13 states and the District." The Post adds, "Nynex and Bell Atlantic were accused of violating federal law by denying women pension and other benefit accruals when they spent time on pregnancy or maternity leave. … The total compensation paid thus far is more than $25.3 million. The EEOC told a U.S. District Court in New York yesterday that it projected that an additional $23.6 million would be paid in future benefits. The announcement came after years of calculating which women were denied benefits when on leave. … The suit alleged that the predecessor companies violated the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Pregnancy Discrimination Act of 1978 and the Equal Pay Act of 1963 by denying women service credits for leaves of absence taken between July 1965 and April 1979. The companies also denied pension credits for child-care leaves of absence until December 1983."

ANTITRUST:

Adobe, Microsoft Square Off In PDF Dispute. The San Jose Mercury News (6/6, Boudreau) reports, "Adobe Systems and Microsoft have seemed to co-exist in a mutually beneficial ecosystem for years. … But their cause for common ground, a little piece of software millions have used but may have hardly noticed -- the Adobe PDF -- is now the reason the gloves are coming off." The News continues, "At the core of the tension is Microsoft's move to create technology to compete with Adobe's PDF franchise, and difficult negotiations around incorporating Adobe's mostly open standard PDF software into the next generation of Office programs. … While Microsoft makes software such as Word and Excel that lets people create documents, Adobe can turn those documents you might print out on paper into digital, ready-to-be-e-mailed files through its Portable Document Format (.pdf)." The News adds, "Last week, behind-the-scenes friction between the two became public when Microsoft said it expected Adobe to file a lawsuit against the Redmond, Wash. company, possibly in the European Union, which recently has become more receptive to Microsoft antitrust concerns than U.S. regulators. … The dispute underscored the Silicon Valley axiom: Companies that cooperate often can end up trying to devour each other's business. … Adobe makes money from its business-document processing software Adobe Acrobat, which is part of its Intelligent Document division and accounted for 36 percent of its revenue, or $708 million, in 2005. A person must own a copy of Adobe Acrobat to make a PDF, but only needs to download a free version of Acrobat Reader to view a PDF that has been sent to them."

In a column for the Washington Post (6/6, D5), Rob Pegoraro writes, "If you want to know why so many computer programs are so bad these days, take a look at the Adobe-Microsoft mess. … These two powerful software developers have gotten into an argument over whether Microsoft can include a new feature in its upcoming Office 2007 productivity suite -- the ability to save your work as a Portable Document Format (PDF) file. … In the process, they're showing how old-fashioned greed and the more modern ailment of lawsuit phobia can turn a promising program sour." Pegoraro continues, "Judged strictly on its merits, there's nothing to argue about that feature. It would end the worry that your Word, Excel or PowerPoint document might look weird or be unreadable on someone else's computer. PDF files preserve their appearance -- from fonts to footnotes to photos -- wherever they're read, so long as a recipient has a PDF-reader program. These programs, almost all free, are available for nearly every kind of computer, down to "smart phones" and handheld organizers. … Competing productivity suites, such as Corel's WordPerfect Office and the free and open-source OpenOffice.org, have offered this option for years. So does Apple's Mac OS X, which offers PDF output as a systemwide feature. When Microsoft announced in October that it would follow suit in its next release of Office, it seemed like a refreshing acknowledgment of reality in Redmond, Wash. … You'd think that would have delighted Adobe as well. The San Jose, Calif., firm has worked for years to establish the PDF as a standard way to share data, having written versions of its free Adobe Reader for all the major desktop and handheld operating systems. And while the company charges $299 for its Adobe Acrobat PDF-creation toolkit, it's encouraged other developers to release their own. … For some reason, however, Adobe saw things differently when Microsoft wanted to join the PDF party. As Microsoft explained, in February, Adobe asked it to sell this feature as a separate add-on for Office 2007."

Brookfield And Partner To Buy Trizec For $4.8 Billion. The Wall Street Journal (6/6, Forsyth) reports, "In a $4.8 billion deal confirming that the real-estate market for office space remains hot despite rising interest rates, Brookfield Properties Corp. and a private-equity partner agreed to buy Trizec Properties Inc." The Journal continues, "The purchase, announced yesterday, of the Chicago-based office real-estate investment trust is one of the biggest deals yet in a continuing frenzy of mergers and acquisitions in the public real-estate world. Brookfield, based in Toronto and New York, is pairing with the Blackstone Group, a private-equity firm that has been involved in a number of high-profile acquisitions over the past few months, including a $2.8 billion buyout of CarrAmerica Realty Corp. in March." The Journal adds, "The Trizec acquisition gives Brookfield -- already one of the largest players in office real estate in North America -- an even bigger profile in the hot markets of Washington and Manhattan, and provides an entry into Los Angeles, another market that has caught fire in the past few quarters. … Included in the deal is the acquisition of Trizec Canada Inc., a mutual fund traded on the Toronto Stock Exchange that has a 38% interest in Trizec Properties. Brookfield will acquire the shares of Trizec Properties and Trizec Canada for a combined cash transaction of $4.8 billion and the assumption of about $4.1 billion in debt -- $29.01 a share for all Trizec Properties common stock not owned by Trizec Canada, and $30.97 a share for the Trizec Canada stock."

China Conglomerate Makes Bid For Canadian Oil. The Wall Street Journal (6/6, Oster, Santini, Sender) reports, "Citic Group, a state-owned conglomerate in China, is in talks to buy a closely held Canadian oil company whose main asset is a field in Kazakhstan, according to people familiar with the matter. If completed, the $2.2 billion deal would be China's third-largest overseas oil acquisition." The Journal continues, "The talks to buy Nations Energy Co., based in Calgary, Alberta, reflect the continuing efforts of Chinese energy companies to push abroad in their quest for energy. A deal isn't certain, according to one of the people familiar with the matter." The Journal adds, "A deal would be China's second-largest acquisition in oil-rich Kazakhstan. Last year, China National Petroleum Corp., China's biggest oil producer by output, beat out Russian rivals to acquire an oil field in Kazakhstan for $4.2 billion and built a pipeline to carry Kazakh crude to China. … In April, Cnooc Ltd., China's biggest offshore oil producer, bought a $2.7 billion stake in an oil field off the coast of Nigeria. … Nations Energy's main asset is the Karazhanbas oil field in Kazakhstan, which pumped 41,000 barrels of oil a day last year, according to the company's Web site. Both Cnooc and CNPC had passed up on buying the company."

Cathay In Talks To Buy Stake In Dragonair. The Wall Street Journal (6/6, Stanley, Santini) reports, "Cathay Pacific Airways is in talks to acquire a controlling stake in Hong Kong Dragon Airlines, people familiar with the matter said, in a long-anticipated deal that would greatly expand Cathay's access to China's sizzling aviation market and plug the biggest hole in its global network." The Journal continues, "A deal for Hong Kong-based Dragonair, as the company is known, could be valued at more than 8 billion Hong Kong dollars (US$1 billion) in cash and stock, according to a person knowledgeable about it. An agreement could be announced within days, but the terms aren't yet clear and the deal could still unravel, said the people familiar with the matter." The Journal adds, "Cathay Pacific would purchase the controlling stake from two mainland Chinese companies that together own 71.8% of Dragonair, these people said. It would also purchase a 7.7% stake held by Swire Pacific Ltd., part of the London-based Swire Group and Cathay's largest shareholder. The moves would simplify the complex relationship between the companies. Cathay already owns a 17.8% stake in Dragonair. … Cathay once controlled Dragonair but lost its influence, and relations between them soured. Now, in spite of its home base in Hong Kong, Cathay operates a thin passenger service to just two Chinese cities. While Dragonair flies to 23 destinations in China, more than any other airline based outside the mainland, Cathay has had to watch from the sidelines as many of its toughest foreign competitors have started and expanded their own lucrative networks in China."

Johanns, Leavitt Deliver Bird Flu Update. The Wall Street Journal Online (6/6) reports Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt and Agriculture Secretary Michael Johanns Monday briefed reporters on the latest news surrounding the spread of bird flu and what it means for the United States. Following Monday's briefing, Leavitt and Johanns appeared on several cable news programs. The Washington Post (6/6, A6) also reports the story in its "Washington In Brief" section.

Johanns Says Awareness Of Bird Flu Is Growing. In an interview with Bloomberg After Hours (6/5, 5:36 PM) Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns said the US is "better prepared today than they were yesterday and tomorrow they'll be better prepared than they were today. … The awareness of this issue continues to ratchet up and as we talk to companies, they're paying attention to this idea: How do I run my business if all of a sudden 40% of my work force isn't here?"

Johanns was asked on CNBC's Power Lunch (6/5, 1:41 PM) what can be done to keep the virus from coming to this part of the world. Johanns said, "We do a number of things, we work with Homeland Security. They're there to protect borders, and do inspections, so, we have quarantines when birds come in, if they're a bird that has been here, we have quarantine procedures for them. We do a lot of surveillance testing. We work with the Department of Interior."

Leavitt Says Americans Should Prepare For US Outbreak Of Bird Flu. HHS Secretary Michael Leavitt was asked on Bloomberg After Hours (6/5, 5:36 PM) if Americans "should start to worry" about an outbreak in the US. Leavitt said, "The best thing is to do all you can to prepare and then relax. What can you do to prepare? If you're in a household, it's a good idea to have nonperishable food stored. If you have children who go to school, it would be a good idea to think through how you would care for them. These are the same provisions you would make for any kind of a disaster, whether it's a hurricane or bioterrorism event or nuclear event. Any of those would require this kind of preparation so basic prepared sentence what we're advocating."

Leavitt Downplays Case Of Human To Human Transmission Of Bird Flu Virus In Indonesia. On CNBC's Power Lunch (6/5, 1:41 PM), Leavitt was asked if he is troubled by news from Indonesia that family seems to exhibit human to human contact of the avian flu. Leavitt said, "We've been tracking it very closely, in fact, some of the CDC's best scientists, literally at the scene and come to the conclusion, the best hypothesis, there has been some form of person to person transmission, but not sustainable or efficient transmission, which is really what makes a pandemic." Leavitt added, "The people who were affected were sleeping together in a very close proximity to a person who clearly had avian influenza and it was not a big surprise to find they'd received it from another person and had healthcare workers or others in the village begun to receive the virus, it would have been a big concern, but we were able to confirm that that wasn't happening, nor has there been any genetic mutation of the virus at this point. So, we're becoming increasingly comfortable that while it does add to the body of evidence there's been some person to person, it had not—it's not sustainable and not pandemic quality."

New London, CT, Approves Evictions In Eminent Domain Dispute. The Boston Globe/AP (6/6, Singer) reports, "City officials (in New London, CT) voted Monday night to begin eviction proceedings against residents who refuse to leave their riverfront homes, signaling the end may be near in an eminent domain dispute that reached the U.S. Supreme Court." The AP continues, "The City Council approved the action 5-2, authorizing the city attorney to take the necessary steps, including possible court action, to evict the remaining two families and obtain the properties. A lawyer for the families said they are considering continuing their battle with the city." The AP adds, "The small city has been trying for a decade to redevelop the once vibrant Fort Trumbull neighborhood along the Thames River. Seven homeowners challenged the city's plans to seize their properties and build a hotel, convention center and upscale condominiums, saying eminent domain can't be used to make way for private development. … But a 5-4 Supreme Court ruling last year upheld the city's right to take the homes. The court, however, said states were free to restrict eminent domain seizures, and many already have. A proposal to change Connecticut's law died in this year's state legislative session. … Since the Supreme Court ruling, all but two families have settled with the city and agreed to leave."

Activist Moves To Slow Wind Energy Projects. The New York Times (6/6, Barringer) reports on the crusade of Dan Boone against wind energy. Wind projects "are in the midst of a huge growth spurt in many parts of the country, driven by government incentives to promote alternatives to fossil fuels. But Mr. Boone, who wields a botanist's trowel and a debater's knife with equal ease, wants to slow them down with community activism, regulatory action and legal challenges." Boone "says the areas he wants to protect are uniquely vulnerable. … Mr. Boone's quiver of anti-wind arguments includes economic analyses, but his first line of attack is biological: he contends that they are a threat to bats and potentially to migratory birds and that they break up forest habitat."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Senate Panel To Hold Hearings On FBI Efforts To Seize Anderson Papers. Roll Call (6/6, Akers) reports in its "Heard on the Hill" column, "It appears there may be an even more bizarre genesis to the FBI's already unusual attempt to seize the papers of the late journalist Jack Anderson, who was 83 when he died in December. The Senate Judiciary Committee is set to hear about the allegedly sordid past of a former Anderson reporter who tipped off the FBI when it convenes this morning to hold a hearing on the controversy. According to a Senate Judiciary Committee source, a witness will testify that the entire Anderson investigation was triggered by a tip from a man convicted and imprisoned for sodomizing a young boy and who allegedly admitted to having a history of mental illness."

Lab In Mexico May Be Main Source Of "Bad" Heroin Linked To Overdoses. There are more than 200 media references today citing a possible source for fentanyl-laced drugs connected to a rash of recent overdoses. For example, the AP (6/5, Johnson) reports, "U.S. agents, working in cooperation with the Mexican government, have closed down a lab in Mexico that might be the main source of a powerful painkiller that has killed at least 100 heroin users in eight states. John Walters…said it's still not clear whether the painkiller, fentanyl, was mixed with heroin at the lab in Mexico or after it entered the United States. 'There may be more than one source,' Walters said. 'We think this is the principal source.'" Steve Robertson said the DEA "is testing samples of fentanyl seized in a May 28 raid of a suspected fentanyl-manufacturing operation near Guadalajara but has not yet confirmed that the drug is linked to the U.S. deaths."

In a separate report, the AP (6/6, Johnson) writes, "Authorities also warned yesterday that millions of deadly doses of fentanyl-laced heroin might still be on America's streets. The mixture has caused at least 100 confirmed deaths from Philadelphia to Chicago in recent months. … Deaths caused by fentanyl-laced drugs have also occurred in Michigan, Missouri, Ohio, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland, said John Walters. … The DEA plans to gather police officers and drug enforcement agents for a national meeting on the fentanyl problem June 14-15 in Chicago, Robertson said." A version of the AP story was published in newspapers and/or posted on the Web sites of CBS News, FOX News, CNN, the New York Times, Washington Post, USA Today, Forbes, Dallas Morning News, Houston Chronicle, Chicago Sun-Times, Detroit Free Press, and the UK's Guardian.

The Chicago Tribune (6/5, Coen, Maxwell) reports Walters "said it is too soon to know if the Mexican lab was the biggest source of the illicit drug, which has killed people in eight states. But authorities believe it may have been running long enough to push a major amount of fentanyl, used legally for pain management, into the illegal drug market, he said. … Garrison Courtney …said there could be a number of illegal sources for the drug, including other laboratories. Some of it has been stolen from medical facilities where it is often used in a patch for cancer patients and others with severe pain, Courtney said." The Tribune story was published by the Kansas City Star, Myrtle Beach Sun News, and Georgia's Columbus Ledger-Enquirer.

The Chicago Tribune (6/5, Graham) also has published a story outlining the effects of fentanyl.

The Washington Post (6/5, Slevin, Lydersen) reports from Chicago that since February, coroners "have recorded 55 fentanyl-related deaths in Cook County, with 45 more cases suspected. Some were unsuspecting users taking pure fentanyl; others were users taking a mixture. Scores overdosed but recovered -- and not all regretted using it. 'There's this consumer arc. At first there's fear, but then when the fear is over, it's like: Hey, that's good stuff,' said Greg Scott, a DePaul University sociologist who conducts government-funded research on injected drugs."

The Detroit News (6/6) reports, "But a rise in deaths linked to heroin spiked with the painkiller fentanyl hasn't deterred some hardcore addicts from seeking the drug. Desperate for a high that gets elusive with time, a dedicated batch of users is turning to the cocktail whose effects can last all day." The News adds, "Authorities would not comment Monday on their evidence...and a Drug Enforcement Administration spokesman in Chicago, Chris Hoyt, said agents 'are not ready to say the lab discovered in Mexico is directly related to what's happening here.'"

Newsweek (6/12) writes, "For junkies, the fentanyl-heroin cocktail has become the hot new high, as lethal as it is alluring. It is being blamed for hundreds of deaths this year in big cities in the Midwest and Northeast. In Wayne County, Mich., home to Detroit, there have been 50 deaths in just the past two weeks, including 19 in one deadly day in May."

Man Who May Have Peddled Drug Mixture Dies. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch (6/5) reports, "A man believed to be peddling a potentially deadly heroin-fentanyl combination, who was shot in a confrontation with police in University City, has died from his wounds. Maurice A. Adkins…died about 10 p.m. Sunday at Barnes-Jewish Hospital. … Officials suspect that 20 or more deaths in the St. Louis area are linked to the potent drug combination."

Pittsburgh Police Arrest 5 Following Overdoses. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/6, Silver) reports, "City police detectives were working overtime to scoop up drug dealers and lean on users for information as a lethal batch of heroin snaked its way through city neighborhoods and beyond, causing at least 35 overdoses and as many as three deaths. … City police said they have arrested five people since the outbreak began Saturday, but they declined to release any details, saying that the investigation was ongoing."

The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (6/6, Srikameswaran) also reports, "The deaths of three heroin users and the emergency treatment of 35 more have prompted an overdose prevention expert to offer this advice: If you're going to use, have someone nearby in case you need help. Alice Bell, overdose prevention project coordinator at Prevention Point Pittsburgh, the region's only needle exchange program, said there had been talk about drug users in other cities overdosing on a powerful combination of heroin and a narcotic painkiller called fentanyl. Prevention Point staff had begun to inform its needle exchangers about the potential problem, but until two days ago no one had seen it here."

According to the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (6/6), two people "died in Pittsburgh on Monday -- bringing the total fatal overdoses here to three since Sunday. At least 36 people have overdosed in Allegheny County since the drug emerged on the streets on Friday."

More Probable Overdoses Reported In Michigan. The Detroit Free Press (6/5, Damron) writes, "Six people died from probable drug overdoses between Friday and Sunday morning, bringing the total number of likely drug-related deaths to 54 since May 18. But it will take weeks to determine whether the recent deaths were related to a dangerous mix of the painkiller fentanyl and heroin or cocaine, said Teresa Blossom, a Wayne County Health Department spokeswoman."

Response To Overdoses Criticized. The Toledo (OH) Blade (6/5) editorializes, "Given the number of confirmed overdoses - 130 in Wayne County from January, 2005, through April - the slow response is troubling. While tracking down leads can be time-consuming and require significant manpower, particularly when labs producing these drugs may be outside the metro Detroit area, perhaps even overseas, surely more could have been done when the death toll is at such dramatic levels. … Drug abusers share the blame, of course, and must bear a large part of the responsibility for their own fate."

Cable TV Coverage. CNN (6/5, 4:00 p.m.) reported, "US agents have closed down a lab in Mexico that might be the main source of a powerful and deadly painkiller. Fentanyl, mixed with heroin, has killed at least 100 heroin users in eight states. The federal drug czar says it's still not clear whether it was mixed at the lab in Mexico or after it entered the US. Five people were arrested in last month's bust. Officials say millions of deadly doses of the fentanyl-laced heroin might still be on the streets."

CLTV-Cable (6/5, 7:30 p.m.) Chicago reported, "White house officials say federal agents shut down a lab in Mexico. That may be the main source of production for fentanyl, the drug that's killing all those people. They aren't yet sure if the fentanyl was mixed with heroin at the lab, or if it happened later on the streets. Officials warn there are likely millions of doses of the deadly drug still on the streets."

Local TV Coverage. WLS-TV, Chicago (6/5, 6:00 p.m.) reported, "Federal investigators now believe they have tracked down the source of that deadly heroin here in Chicago."

PBS's WTTW-TV, Chicago (6/5, 7:00 p.m.) reported, "The nation's drug czar says he may have found a batch of bad drugs. John Walters of White House Office Of National Drug Control Policy says US agents busted a lab in Mexico that was mixing heroin with a dangerous narcotic, fentanyl.

WWMT-TV, Grand Rapids-Kalamazoo-Battle Creek, Michigan (6/5, 5:30 p.m.) reported, "Agents have taken down a lab in Mexico that makes fentanyl. The powerful painkiller has killed users in eight states, but the biggest concentration comes in laced heroin in the Detroit area. Drug czar John Walters says it's not clear whether the fentanyl was mixed with heroin in the lab in Mexico, or after it entered the US. Fentanyl laced- cocaine also turned up in some cities. "

Colombian Soldiers Accused Of Killing Anti-Drugs Team, 8 Arrested. The Boston Globe (6/6) reports, "Suspicions that a Colombian military unit assassinated a US-trained, elite antinarcotics team at the bidding of the drug mafia two weeks ago have proven true, officials say, in a case that has badly shaken public confidence in the military. On May 22, 10 of the country's most successful antidrug police were killed by a military platoon in the outskirts of Jamundí, an area under the influence of narco-traffickers 195 miles southwest of the capital, near Cali. Two military officers and six soldiers were arrested Thursday on the basis of incriminating cellphone text messages and crime-scene evidence that investigators say prove the eight men planned the killings. The suspects insist the shootings were a 'friendly fire' mistake."

Six DC Officers Put On Leave In Probe Of Inmates' Escape. The Washington Post (6/6, B4, Dvorak) reports, "The D.C. Department of Corrections yesterday put six officers on paid administrative leave while authorities investigate events leading to the escape of two inmates." The Post continues, "Devon Brown, the department's director, said investigators want to determine if any of the officers deliberately aided in the escape or unintentionally made mistakes that contributed to the breakout. He would not identify the officers." The Post adds, "Ricardo Jones and Joseph Leaks broke into the warden's empty office shortly after 10 a.m. Saturday, smashed through a reinforced glass window and slid down a canopy to freedom, officials said. Both were captured Sunday, one in Maryland and the other in Virginia. … Their escape -- from the bureaucratic errors that gave Leaks enough freedom on a work detail to execute the escape to the warning system that failed to properly notify the neighborhood of the breach – 'was a major breakdown,' Brown said yesterday. … The U.S. attorney's office and D.C. police are heading the criminal investigation. The Department of Corrections is conducting an internal investigation, and Brown cited several areas of special interest. … Leaks and Jones were captured by a task force led by the U.S. Marshals Service. Leaks was caught first, early Sunday, in a Fairfax County motel. Jones was captured about 11:30 p.m. Sunday after Prince George's County got a tip that he was hiding in a garage or shed in Seat Pleasant. Authorities found him in a shed in the 500 block of 71st Street, police said."

The Washington Times (6/6, McElhatton, Doolittle) reports, "Thomas Hession, chief inspector for the Capital Area Regional Fugitive Task Force, which is led by U.S. Marshals Service, said a tip to the Prince George's County Police Department led authorities to catch Jones in the backyard shed of a home in Seat Pleasant late Sunday night. Leaks was caught early Sunday at a motel in Alexandria. …

Detective Michael Reese, of the Metropolitan Police Department, said the U.S. Attorney's Office is leading a criminal investigation into the escape. The probe also is being conducted by city police and the U.S. Marshals Service."

Some Dispute Effectiveness Of Federal Crime Task Force. An article distributed by Scripps Howard news service (6/6, Doyle) reports, "Federal reinforcements in Fresno, Calif., have helped local police lock up bad guys, but now investigators are questioning how well one of the law enforcement programs really works." Scripps Howard continues, "In a high-profile blitz last year, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives deployed extra troops to Fresno and some other selected cities. Welcomed by local officers and politicians alike, the Violent Crime Impact Team targeted gangs and gun-related crimes. … Since starting last June, the Fresno-based team of eight federal agents, two prosecutors and one deputy U.S. marshal have won kudos from their local colleagues. … 'It has been successful,' bureau spokeswoman Nina Delgadillo said Monday, noting that 'we have firearms that we've been able to take off of the streets.' … A 1 p.m. news conference at Fresno's federal courthouse on Thursday will give officials a chance to elaborate on their success stories." Scripps Howard adds, "The federal agents, though, also confront a perennial problem in public policy: How can they prove they're making a difference? On that, the jury may still be out. … In a new report, Justice Department investigators caution they can't be sure exactly how much credit the various Violent Crime Impact Teams deserve. There are 20 such teams nationwide, initiated as a pilot program now costing a total of $20 million this year. … 'ATF cannot conclusively show that the law enforcement operations it undertook during the ... pilot project were effective at reducing firearms crime in the target areas,' the Office of Inspector General investigators cautioned. … The Washington-based investigators, moreover, hinted at broader shortcomings. Successes may be exaggerated, teamwork hindered and goals missed. The Violent Crime Impact Team concept itself, investigators suggest, may simply be a new brand name for an old product."

Orton Selected As New US Marshal For Nevada. The AP (6/6) reports, "A former state gambling regulator has been named U.S. marshal covering Nevada." The AP continues, "Gary Orton is due to be sworn in June 16 as U.S. Marshal for the District of Nevada after being selected by President Bush. … Orton spent 26 years as an enforcement officer and deputy chief of the Nevada state Gaming Control Board. He previously spent eight years as a North Las Vegas police officer, and served in the United States Army from 1969 to 1972." The AP adds, "As U.S. marshal for Nevada, Orton will oversee security at U.S. District courts in Reno and Las Vegas and the protection of 23 federal judges, direct fugitive apprehension and federal prisoner custody and transport, and oversee federal witness security. … The marshals service also administers a Justice Department asset forfeitures program."

Maryland Man Pleads Guilty To Arson, Will Testify Against Co-Defendant. The Washington Post (6/6, B2, Castaneda) reports, "One of the two remaining defendants in an arson case that strained race relations in Southern Maryland admitted his guilt in federal court yesterday and agreed to testify for the government against the sole man still charged." The Post continues, "Michael M. Everhart, 21, entered his plea as part of an agreement to testify against Roy T. McCann, 23, the only one of five defendants in the case who has not pleaded guilty or been convicted. Everhart entered his plea during an hour-long hearing before U.S. District Judge Roger W. Titus in federal court in Greenbelt." The Post adds, "Everhart and McCann were tried in March in the arson fires that devastated a subdivision under construction in Charles County in the early morning of Dec. 6, 2004. The trial ended with a hung jury March 16, and Titus declared a mistrial. … Everhart, who was charged with 36 separate counts -- one count of arson and 35 counts of conspiracy -- pleaded guilty yesterday to one count of conspiracy to commit arson. His guilty plea and testimony could significantly bolster the government's case against McCann. … According to a statement of facts that was part of Everhart's plea bargain, Everhart joined McCann, Aaron L. Speed, Jeremy D. Parady and Patrick S. Walsh in splashing flammable materials in the entranceways of the houses they targeted. They set the fires using flares, matches, lighters and propane torches, according to the statement. … Titus set Everhart's sentencing for Sept. 8."

Convicted Murderer Still At Large, Leaving Tantalizing Clues For Federal Agents. The Los Angeles Times (6/6, Serrano) reports from Pollock, LA, "Richard Lee McNair's job in the prison factory was mending U.S. mailbags. Thousands of the leather pouches were routinely delivered to the shop at the federal maximum-security penitentiary here, and the middle-aged convict worked quietly each day, helping to stitch them back up. … Once the bags were refurbished, they were stacked on pallets, hundreds in a pile. McNair watched for four months as forklifts scooped up the pallets and hauled them to a warehouse just outside the prison walls. … One morning they carried off McNair — hidden under the bags. … And he was free again." The Times continues, "Twice before, in nearly two decades in custody, McNair has tasted freedom. Once he spread lip balm on his wrist, and slipped out of handcuffs. Another time he crawled to freedom through an air vent. Two other times his breakout attempts were foiled. … His latest escape was the first from a federal maximum security prison in 13 years. McNair, a confessed murderer, had just been moved to Pollock from the Supermax prison in Florence, Colo. — the nation's most secure lockup. … The government concedes it should have known he would again try to escape. … Since his April 5 run, he has crisscrossed the United States and Canada. He has left behind intriguing clues, almost as if daring the police and federal marshals to find him. … When he is caught, if he is caught, McNair is unlikely to go quietly. He was serving two life sentences — for shooting one man from behind and killing another at point-blank range during a 1987 burglary. … 'He has murdered in the past,' warned Deputy U.S. Marshal Richard Sansone Jr., who is based in Louisiana and is helping coordinate the manhunt. 'He will do most anything he can to stay out.' … What makes McNair, 47, tougher to catch and all the more dangerous is that he once worked in law enforcement. He is a stickler for detail and so methodical he used the Freedom of Information Act to obtain the FBI records on his last escape so he could study how they tracked him down."

IMMIGRATION:

Border Patrol Says Apprehensions Up 4%, Denies Recent Surge Of Illegals. USA Today (6/6, Keen) reports the Border Patrol "says apprehensions of illegal immigrants along the Mexican border are up nearly 4% so far this year because of increased enforcement. But advocacy groups say greater numbers are crossing the border because they are confused about conflicting legislation passed by Congress and hope to qualify for legal status." Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar "said Monday there has been no surge in the number of illegal crossings since President Bush announced in May that 6,000 National Guard troops would be sent to the border. Aguilar expects a decrease as more agents and Guard members are deployed." USA Today notes that confusion over Congressional legislation "means some illegal immigrants are being ripped off. Some pay $500-$1,000 to people claiming to be lawyers who promise to expedite applications for a guest-worker program that was passed by the Senate but not the House. Applications don't exist."

Tighter Security Along US-Mexico Border Blamed For Increased Fatalities. The Washington Post (6/6, A1, Pomfret), in a front-page story titled, "An Increasingly Deadly Trail: Tighter Border Has Illegal Immigrants Risking More Perilous Routes," reports that since 1993 "more than 3,500 people have died trying to cross into the United States through desert. And, as officials work to put more patrols and fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border, immigrant advocates fear there will be more deaths among the tens of thousands who attempt the trip." The Post adds, "Border Patrol statistics show that while the death toll mounts annually, the number of those apprehended while crossing the border has not changed significantly since 1993. But because federal agencies have tightened the border in urban areas, smugglers who move the men, women and children seeking to enter the United States illegally have funneled them onto increasingly perilous trails where temperatures are high, water is scarce and danger is abundant."

Contingent Of 6000 National Guard Troops Expected By August 1. USA Today (6/6, Hall) reports the National Guard "will have 800 troops along the U.S.-Mexican border by mid-June, and the 6,000 troops President Bush pledged to send to the southern border will be in place by Aug. 1, Lt. Gen. H. Steven Blum said Monday. … National Guard troops have worked with the Border Patrol…for nearly 20 years along the southern border, mostly helping the Border Patrol catch drug smugglers. There are nearly 500 Guard members there now, including more than 50 from Utah and Connecticut who just arrived in Arizona. None of those are part of Bush's Operation Jump Start plan to make troops available over the next two years to try to stem illegal immigration and tighten security."

The Washington Times (6/6, Seper) reports, "The presence of National Guard troops, who are not expected to perform law-enforcement functions, is aimed at freeing up Border Patrol agents to focus on enforcement along the border. A total of 300 National Guard troops are expected in Arizona by June 15."

The AP (6/6, Rotstein) reports that the troops already at the border "are working to widen the dusty dirt track used by the Border Patrol, compact it and top it with gravel so agents can get to hot spots faster."

Columnist Says US-Mexican Border Was Secure During "Braceros" Era. The New York Times' John Tierney (6/6) writes that President Bush "heads to New Mexico today to visit his new favorite school, the Border Patrol Academy. He wants it to train thousands more federal agents, but they'll make little difference unless Bush can teach Republicans the lesson learned by agents…a half century ago — the last time anyone could seriously claim the border was under control." Tierney adds, "What stopped the farmworkers from sneaking across? It wasn't simply the get-tough measures. … Along with the crackdown, officials encouraged farmers and ranchers to legally hire Mexican temporary workers called braceros. As new rules made it easier to hire braceros, the number of these legal workers doubled to more than 400,000 at the same time illegal immigration was plummeting."

Mexico Expands Environmental Reserve Along US Border. The AP (6/6, Stevenson) reports, "Mexico is creating an environmental reserve about 30 feet wide and 600 miles long on the Texas border, a 'green wall' to protect the Rio Grande from the roads and staging areas that smugglers use to ferry drugs and migrants across the frontier. … It will connect two large protected areas south of the river. When a third nature reserve, known as Ocampo, is created this year, the protected areas in Mexico will form a 'wall' of millions of acres of wilderness, matching Texas' Big Bend parks foot-by-foot along the border."

Immigration Debate Seen As Ignoring Illegals Who Have Overstayed Visas. The AP (6/6, Weissert) reports, "The little-acknowledged reality is that nearly half the estimated 12 million undocumented foreigners in the United States entered on bona fide U.S. visas — and simply never left. Authorities call them 'overstays' who have been largely overlooked in the vitriolic debate on immigration. … A study by the Washington-based Pew Hispanic Center last month indicated that 45 percent of the undocumented migrants in the United States overstayed legal visas." ICE spokesman Dean Boyd is quoted as saying, "The southwestern border gets all the attention, but it's staggering the number of people who come and overstay their visa. … It's a very large-scale problem." According to the AP, "The immigration reforms soon to be hashed out in a Congressional conference committee may crack down on employers who fail to make sure their workers are legal. But it's unclear whether the proposed reforms will send many 'overstayers' home."

Congressional Immigration Bills Blamed For Alleged Upsurge In Racism. The AP (6/6, Texeira) reports, "As the fight over immigration reform drags on, an ominous undercurrent to the debate — racism — is becoming more pronounced. From muttered ethnic slurs to violent attacks, activists say an anti-immigrant backlash seems to be growing in America's neighborhoods and workplaces. A few political leaders have called proposed immigration measures before Congress 'racist.' Some activists say the House of Representatives started it. … Some reacted the same way after the Senate passed an amendment to its immigration bill last month that declared English the national language." The AP notes that Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid "called that 'racist' and 'divisive.'" The Long Island Immigration Alliance, the Southern Poverty Law Center and the Anti-Defamation League are cited as organizations that have denounced congressional legislation as "racist."

High School Teacher Praises Immigrant Students. In an op-ed for the USA Today (6/6) Patrick Welsh, a teacher at T.C. Williams High School in Alexandria, Va., writes, "With all the recent talk of immigration reform, one thing has become clear to me: While Congress still must thrash out its differences on policy, I can put real faces on this issue. Each day, I teach students who are immigrants, probably legal and illegal, and I can tell you that when I look into the eyes of these kids, I do not feel the sort of fear or loathing that some Americans have voiced. Instead, I see on their part a yearning to learn and a motivation to succeed that I don't always see in my American-born students."

TAX:

IRS Laptop Computer Lost. MSNBC.com (6/5, Sullivan) reported, "A laptop computer containing fingerprints of Internal Revenue Service employees is missing, MSNBC.com has learned. The computer was lost during transit on an airline flight in the western United States, IRS spokesman Terry Lemon said. No taxpayer information was on the lost laptop, Lemon said." The IRS "believes the computer contained information on 291 employees and job applicants, including fingerprints, names, Social Security numbers, and dates of birth. … Nothing on the computer would put taxpayer information at risk, Lemon said."

Kyl Says "Death Tax" Should Be Eliminated. Sen. Jon Kyl, chairman of the Senate Finance Subcommittee on Taxation and IRS Oversight, writes in USA Today (6/6) that the "death tax" should be eliminated. Kyl argues, "Ideally, we should repeal the death tax as many of our trading partners, including Canada and Australia, have done. At the very least, we should increase the exemption and reduce the rate to the same level as the tax on capital gains, so that those who pay it can do so without being forced to sell off business assets."

Editorials Oppose Efforts To Repeal Estate Tax. Three major papers oppose efforts to repeal the estate tax in their editorial sections this morning. An editorial accompanying Kyl's op-ed in USA Today (6/6) says, "Estate-tax opponents concede they might not have the votes for outright repeal. But they still hope to reduce the tax rate on inherited wealth to as low as 15% from the current 46%. That was a bad idea last year, and it's still a bad idea. Taxes must be paid by someone, and it is hard to think who they harm less than people who are both very rich and dead. … As they prepare to vote on what would be a huge windfall for the wealthiest Americans, senators should recall the sense of shame that prompted them to hold off last summer. Nothing has changed, except for the weather."

An editorial in the Washington Post (6/6, A14) says the "arguments for repeal are by turns wrong, muddled and internally contradictory." The Post says that "the exotic arguments in favor of abolishing the estate tax don't match the obvious ones for keeping it. The nation faces serious budget deficits, so why abolish a revenue stream? Inequality is rising, so why kill the most progressive federal tax? The competitive and meritocratic basis for the nation's economic success is under threat, so why take action that would encourage hereditary elites to entrench themselves?"

An editorial in the New York Times (6/6) also opposes abolishing the tax as well as Kyl's proposal to "drastically raise the thresholds at which the estate tax kicks in." According to the Times, "There is no moral justification for cutting estate taxes. … Any senator who votes for this bill -- or to end an expected filibuster -- does not care about the budget deficit or tax fairness, no matter what he or she may say to the contrary."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Congress Seen As Pushing Back Against Bush's Expanded Powers. USA Today (6/6, Page) reports after "five years of a concerted White House campaign, there are tentative signs that Congress and the courts are beginning to push back against what has been the greatest expansion of presidential powers in a generation or more." But those "pushing back include some congressional Republicans and conservative jurists who have been among President Bush's chief allies. The efforts surely would intensify if Democrats won control of the House or Senate in November's elections — and with it the power to convene hearings and issue subpoenas." Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., "who has pushed for stronger congressional oversight of intelligence operations," said, "You ask, 'Is the tide shifting?' and I say, 'Maybe, maybe.' If you ask me if I still feel like a lonely voice, I would say that I feel like a member of a small chorus." USA cites as examples GOP and Democratic criticism of the FBI search of Rep. William Jefferson's House office; the Senate Intelligence Committee vote to require notification about intelligence operations; the scrapped Dubai Ports deal; and treatment of terror suspects.

USA Today (6/6) lists several of the ways the Bush Administration has asserted executive power, such as secrecy in deliberation; restricted access to documents; setting aside laws or treaties; narrowly interpret new laws; warrantless domestic surveillance; and limiting judicial oversight.

Bush's "Declaratory Presidency" Seen As Flawed. In a Financial Times op-ed (6/6), Michael Fullilove, program director for global issues at the Lowy Institute for International Policy in Sydney, says that although President George W. Bush is "well known for his verbal awkardness," many of his "speeches – in particular his foreign policy speeches after 9/11 – are beautifully written and more than competently delivered." If "anything, Mr Bush's foreign policy speechifying suffers from the opposite problem: he is too verbal." But a "declaratory presidency also poses dangers. Mr Bush has badly overwritten his foreign policy, in two distinct ways. For most of his first term, Mr Bush pursued a muscular grand strategy aimed at imposing America's will on the world. He was the Charles Atlas of international relations. To reinforce his seriousness he delivered speeches that were strangers to nuance. They drew an explicit link between values and coercion, between freedom and force." It is "hard to avoid the conclusion that the sustained power of Mr Bush's language nudged the administration (and perhaps the president himself) toward risky policies that have proved costly."

Grassley Praises Paulson, Predicts Quick Confirmation. The AP (6/6, Crutsinger) reports Treasury Secretary-designate Henry Paulson Jr. "met Monday with the head of the Senate Finance Committee, who predicted that President Bush's selection…could be confirmed and on the job by early July." Finance Committee Chairman Charles Grassley "said he and Paulson had a productive meeting and that he believed the nomination could win Senate approval before Congress leaves for the July 4 break." Grassley said "the two covered a wide range of issues from the importance of overhauling the nation's complex tax code to the need to apply pressure to China to revalue its currency as a way of dealing with America's soaring trade deficit."

Paulson To Have Opportunity To Make Imprint On China Policy. The Washington Post (6/6, D1, Blustein) reports Paulson "may have little chance to make a mark on many economic issues. The administration's tax policies were pretty much set in Bush's first term, and its more recent big economic initiative, aimed at revamping Social Security, is moribund." But one issue "on which Paulson can surely exert influence is the U.S. relationship with China. The Treasury secretary has formal responsibility for some major decisions to be made in coming months, such as whether to label Beijing a 'currency manipulator.' And when it comes to cutting deals with Beijing, few U.S. business executives can match Paulson's record." To supporters "of warm relations between Washington and Beijing, a Paulson-led Treasury bears the promise of a heightened level of sophistication in dealing with thorny transpacific problems, especially China's policy concerning its currency, the yuan."

Former Official Says State Department Botched WMD Office Reorganization. Knight Ridder (6/6, Strobel) reports veterans weapons expert Dean Rust says the "reorganization of the State Department offices that are leading the fight against weapons of mass destruction was badly managed and politicized, which led to a flight of experts with decades of knowledge." Rust, who "watched the reorganization unfold, charges that its 'botched implementation' led many career officers to leave and 'will hamper the State Department's role at home and abroad for years to come.'" Knight Ridder adds Rust's account "appears in the upcoming issue of Arms Control Today magazine, published by the nonpartisan Arms Control Association. It's scheduled to be posted Tuesday on the group's Web site."

Republicans Voice Opposition To Bush Judicial Nominee. The Washington Post (6/6, A13) reports, "Some retired military officers have served notice that if conservatives keep pressing for a Senate confirmation vote for judicial nominee William J. Haynes II, it won't come without a fight." Democrats "have opposed Haynes since 2003, and now some Republicans are joining them. They object to his role as the Pentagon's top lawyer when controversial policies were adopted regarding harsh treatment of detainees captured in Afghanistan, Iraq and elsewhere."

Supplemental Spending Bill Still At Least $2 Billion Over White House Request. The Wall Street Journal (6/6, Rogers) reports a "$92.2 billion wartime spending bill taking shape in Congress has been cut substantially since passing the Senate last month but still provides at least $2 billion more in Katrina aid than the White House first requested." House-Senate negotiators "will meet tonight in hopes of expediting passage by Congress this week, and Republicans are confident they can avoid a veto fight with President Bush. But the deal rests heavily on borrowing against Federal Emergency Management Agency disaster funds, and that means FEMA will have to come back sooner to Congress for more money, quite possibly this fall."

The AP (6/6, Taylor) reports after "missing a Memorial Day deadline, negotiators hope to seal agreement this week. The White House says a money crunch is threatening military operations and training accounts, especially for the Army, and could slow training and equipping of Iraqi soldiers." The "overall limit has meant dumping or dramatically scaling back Senate initiatives like $4 billion in agriculture disaster assistance to farmers to help them deal with high fuel prices and damage from floods and droughts last year. The move promises to dismay Senate GOP sponsors of the farm aid such as Conrad Burns of Montana, embroiled in a very difficult re-election bid."

House, Senate Republicans At Odds Over Key Legislation. Roll Call (6/6, Billings, Pershing) reports as Congress "gets back to work this week, the Republican majority faces the daunting task of trying to advance several big-ticket legislative items amid a sometimes strained relationship between the two chambers." House and Senate Republicans "will not only wrestle with their Democratic opponents, but in some cases with each other, as they look to complete an emergency supplemental spending bill for Iraq and Hurricane Katrina recovery, as well as a pension bill, immigration reform and a lobby overhaul package." The majority "views passage of these as key to bolstering its chances in the November elections, along with consideration of several other measures important to the GOP base, including an anti-gay-marriage amendment, abolition of the estate tax and energy legislation." But GOP tensions "have risen in both chambers over some of the most hotly contested bills this year, leaving some to wonder whether the party can come together quickly enough to pass them in the time that remains in this Congress. Immigration and the emergency spending bill are the most high-profile measures on which Republicans have faced internal battles over how far to go in this election year."

Private Funds Paid For At Least 23,000 Congressional Trips Since 2000. Knight Ridder (6/6, Kuhnhenn) reports, "Join Congress, see the world. Join a congressman's staff, see more of it. Private groups, corporations or trade associations -- many with legislation that could affect them pending before Congress -- paid nearly $50 million since 2000 to send members of Congress and their staffers on at least 23,000 trips overseas and within the United States, according to a study released Monday." The trips "included at least 200 journeys to Paris and 150 to Hawaii, room rates of up to $500 a night and some high-flying on corporate jets that cost up to $25,000 a trip, according to a report by the Center for Public Integrity, American Public Media and Northwestern University's Medill News Service."

The CBS Evening News (6/5, story 9, 2:50, Mitchell) Attkisson) said members of Congress and their aides have "taken $50 million worth of private paid trips in just over five and a half years. That's according to analysts from The Center for Public Integrity who poured through mounds of congressional travel disclosure forms." The trips are "officially called educational work trips, but they just happen to be to some of the world's best vacation destinations." Wendell Rawls, The Center for Public Integrity: "Hawaii and Antigua and at the Greenbrier and Florence and Paris." Attkisson: "The Center's top watchdog, Wendall Rawls, says the travel is legal but ethically suspect since it can appear congressional influence is for sale." And if "you thought Congress was reforming these types of meetings, they are not. They have repeatedly rejected bans on private travel and nothing in any current proposals would change that."

The New York Times (6/6, Phillips) reports, "The study concluded that about 90 of the trips were paid for by lobbyists, which is an ethical violation, during the five and a half years examined. About 500 trips cost $10,000 or more each, and 16 cost $25,000 or more apiece, the study showed. About $20 million was spent on overseas travel."

The Washington Post (6/6, A1, Birnbaum) reports, "Many congressional offices have voluntarily curtailed their privately funded travel since disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to bribe public officials, in part with lavish overseas trips." But "lawmakers and their aides still may accept travel for official purposes from private interests without limit."

Rangel, Kaptur Singled Out. The Hill (6/6, Allen, Hearn) says the researchers "kept tabs on which offices filed incomplete, incorrect or late reports disclosing details of their travels. They singled out two lawmakers, Reps. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) and Marcy Kaptur (D-Ohio), for failing to disclose until six weeks ago that the Cuban government and a New York grocery mogul paid for their April 2002 trip to Havana to meet President Fidel Castro. Earlier disclosure reports had specified only a Minneapolis-based conservation group, the Sian Ka'an Conservation Foundation, as the sponsor." Rangel also "took fire for allowing the sponsors to pay travel costs for his wife and son, a violation of House rules that allow only one family member to be reimbursed." Rangel's chief of staff, George Dalley, "called the filing an honest mistake."

Conservatives Said To Be Ambivalent Toward Frist. The Hill (6/6, Bolton) reports that conservatives are "scratching their heads over what to make of" Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist. While the Senate will vote this week on constitutional amendment to ban same sex marriage, Frist "has also brought a skunk to what otherwise would be a conservative garden party by also scheduling the Native Hawaiian Government Reorganization Act, sponsored by Democratic Sen. Daniel Akaka (Hawaii). Conservative senators and activists hate that bill, which would allow native Hawaiians to establish their own government entity to "safeguard their welfare," according to a description by the Congressional Research Service."

Patrick Kennedy Returns To Work After Nearly A Month In Rehab. Rep. Patrick Kennedy returned to work Monday after spending almost a month in a drug rehabilitation clinic after an incident in which he crashed his car near the US Capitol. NBC Nightly News (6/5, story 8, 0:50, Williams) reported, "Rhode Island Democratic Congressman Patrick Kennedy made his first public appearance today after a month in a drug rehabilitation program." Kennedy "entered the Mayo Clinic after crashing his car on Capitol Hill, an accident he says he doesn't remember in part because he was taking the sleeping pill Ambien. Kennedy was treated for a long-standing prescription drug dependency and says today though he feels good, he is also grateful." Rep. Patrick Kennedy, Rhode Island: "Every day I'm on my knees thanking God that I didn't hurt somebody and this was a opportunity for me to get my life back on track. Frankly I didn't know how miserable I was until I started feeling better. And so, I'm really happy that I've had that this chance." Williams: "US Capitol Police cited Kennedy for three traffic violations. Today, he said he'll accept whatever consequences he deserves."

USA Today (6/6) reports that Kennedy "said that after struggling for two decades with addiction he knows he can no longer take any 'mood-altering' substances including alcohol."

The New York Times (6/6, Holusha) reports that Kennedy "said yesterday that he felt much better…and that he was looking forward to resuming his duties. But he said that he continued to suffer from bipolar disorder and a tendency toward addiction, and will need help from a support group to avoid a relapse."

Ramstad To Act As Kennedy's Sponsor. Roll Call (6/6, Hocking) reports on the "strong bond" between Kennedy and Rep. Jim Ramstad, who is a recovering alcoholic. Every Saturday for a month, "Ramstad drove an hour and a half from his house in Minnetonka, Minn., to the Mayo Clinic in Rochester to visit Kennedy while he was in rehab. … The Rhode Island Congressman has named Ramstad as a sponsor in his recovery efforts, said Kennedy spokesman Robin Costello."

Snow Jokes Of White House "Love Affair" With Media. In a "Verbatim" column, the Washington Post (6/6, A13) reports, "White House press secretary Tony Snow' s response at yesterday's White House briefing to a question from radio talk show host Lester Kinsolving: Kinsolving : The New York Times has just reported, 'This White House, like all White Houses, is obsessed with the press.' My question: Will you admit to this alleged obsession, or is this just one more New York Times exaggeration? Snow : It's more a love affair than an obsession, Lester."

FAA Imposes New Contract On Air Traffic Controllers. The Washington Post (6/6, D4, Barr) reports in its "Federal Diary" column, "The Federal Aviation Administration imposed a controversial new contract yesterday on the nation's 15,000 air traffic controllers that will slow the rate of pay increases for current workers and cut starting salaries for new hires by 30 percent. Marion C. Blakey , the FAA administrator, said a 60-day period for review by Congress of contract deadlocks at the agency had ended without any action."

Bernanke Warning, Iran Threat Drive Stock Markets Lower. Federal Reserve Board Chairman Ben Bernanke' warning yesterday about inflation prompted a sell off on Wall Street yesterday. USA Today (6/6, Kirchhoff) reports that in a speech to a banking conference, Bernanke "said the economy is entering 'a period of transition' to less robust growth. But he also implied that inflation, pressured by high energy prices, is now the bigger threat." The New York Times (6/6, Andrews) says "investors, increasingly convinced that the central bank will raise rates at its two-day policy meeting at the end of this month, immediately began selling stocks."

ABC World News Tonight (6/5, story 9, :20, Gibson) reported Chairman Bernanke "promised steps to keep surging energy prices from making matters worse. Wall Street took that as an indication that the Fed will raise interest rates again this month and as a result, stock prices plummeted. The Dow Industrials fell 199.15 points to its lowest close in three months [at 11,048.72]. The NASDAQ lost 49 points [to close at 2,169.62]."

The CBS Evening News (6/5, story 3, 1:20, Mason) reported, "So, what's happening? Well, blame it on the two I's -- Iran and inflation. First, Ayatollah Khamenei threatened the United States this weekend saying, 'If you make a wrong move regarding Iran, definitely the energy flow in this region will be seriously endangered.' Now, the markets took this as a sign that Iran, OPEC's second-largest producer, is ready to use oil as a weapon. That sent crude prices surging and stock prices tumbling. Then, new Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke speaking to bankers today said he's very worried about inflation. The market's read that as a signal the Fed intends to raise interest rates again soon."

NBC Nightly News (6/5, story 5, 0:35, Williams) reported, "Iran threatened to disrupt world oil supplies, which then sent oil prices higher and rattled the stock market early today. Then this afternoon, the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Ben Bernanke said he's still concerned about inflation, which then renewed interest rate fears. All that have combined to send the market sharply lower today." The Wall Street Journal (6/6, Browning, Ip), Washington Times (6/6, Hill), Financial Times (6/6, Guha, Beales), Washington Post (6/6, A1, Henderson, Masters) and USA Today (6/6, Shell) run similar reports.

Iranian Threat Pushes Oil Prices Up. USA Today (6/6, Hagenbaugh) reports, "Oil prices climbed to the highest in nearly a month Monday after Iran warned over the weekend that any efforts to punish the major oil producer could lead to a reduction in world supply. Average US retail gasoline prices, meanwhile, edged higher. After jumping more than $1 in trading early in the day, oil ended the day up 27 cents at $72.60 a barrel." That was "the highest since May 11 and marked the second-consecutive trading day of increases. Prices are less than $3 from the all-time high hit in April."

High Fuel Prices Said To Put US Jobs At Risk. USA Today (6/6, Hagenbaugh) reports, "The rising cost of oil has put a squeeze on the companies that use oil as an ingredient for their products. Although they are down from the records seen recently, oil prices are up more than 20% from a year ago and are more than 150% higher than they were five years ago. Natural gas prices have also risen." USA Today adds "manufacturers, faced with strong global competition, are unable to pass along all of the added costs to customers. That means prices for most oil-derived products will likely barely budge as a result of higher energy costs." But "the impact on manufacturers and other companies that use oil-based ingredients could be significant, causing a ripple effect throughout the economy. As firms are faced with rising prices and see their margins cut, they may have to cut back on production, reduce pay increases or maybe even cut jobs or shut down."

California Attorney General Investigating Spike In Gas Prices. The CBS Evening News (6/5, story 4, 2:20, Mitchell) reported, "The Energy Department says gasoline is up two cents in the past week to a nationwide average of $2.89 a gallon. In California it is a whole lot higher $3.27. The chief law enforcement officer in the state wants to know why." CBS (Hughes) added, "California's Attorney General began hauling the CEOs of major oil companies into his office today, demanding in closed door sessions that those executives tell him under oath why gas prices are higher here than almost anywhere else in the nation." Bill Lockyer, California Attorney General: "This is legal thievery in my view. And it's because it's an oligopoly, it's -- when you have a handful of companies, seven exactly, that control almost the entire California market." Hughes: "Those companies insist they're operating within the law and not trying to gouge their customers. Still, California drivers pay an average of $3.31 a gallon, up more than $1 since the start of the year. The Attorney General also wants to know why refiners' profit margins soared 130% at a time when the price of crude oil increased by only 14%." What "is true, according to estimates from the California energy commission, is that profits on each gallon of gas have risen from around 30 cents per gallon at the start of the year to around $1 per gallon now."

CA50 Special Election Seen As Test Of Discontent With GOP. USA Today (6/6, Welch) reports the San Diego special election today for California's 50th CD "has become a test of voter discontent with Republican leadership and frustration over the porous border with Mexico." In the race "to replace disgraced Republican former congressman Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, Republican nominee Brian Bilbray, a former three-term congressman from a neighboring district, would in any other time be a heavy favorite against a Democratic opponent." But the race "between Bilbray and Francine Busby, a relative newcomer to politics, appears to be coming down to a tight finish. Both candidates have said their private polling shows each with a very slight lead." Gary Jacobson, political scientist at the University of California, San Diego, said, "If Republicans lose a district that is this Republican, they ought to be real worried. It's driven by unhappiness with the state of the nation."

The Hill (6/6, Kaplan, O'Connor) reports, "Trying to leave nothing to chance, Republicans sought to ensure victory in today's runoff election to replace imprisoned" former Rep. Cunningham "while Democrats sought to shape the post-election spin by arguing that even losing is winning." Hoping "to push former Rep. Brian Bilbray (R-Calif.) into office, the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) paid for automated phone calls recorded by President Bush, Laura Bush and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and kept up its television advertising campaign." After today's vote, the NRCC "will have spent $5 million on the race. Over the weekend, the Republican National Committee (RNC) paid to send approximately 160 'deployed volunteers' to San Diego to help the Bilbray campaign turn out supporters, an RNC official said. An estimated 65 of those volunteers, working 10- to 12-hour days making phone calls and knocking on doors, are Republican staff members on Capitol Hill." Political observers "expected the race to be close, although they disagreed on whether it would be a harbinger of Democrats' fortunes for winning the House in November's midterm elections."

Roll Call (6/6, Drucker) reports Busby has "pushed" Bilbray "to the limit in the special election runoff that was forced by Cunningham's resignation and subsequent incarceration after he admitted to taking bribes. Republicans acknowledge that she effectively has exploited Bilbray's post-legislative career as a lobbyist in a San Diego-area district that has experienced multiple corruption scandals of late, including at the local government level." But Bilbray, "a longtime, staunch opponent of illegal immigration despite other views considered moderate by Republican standards, successfully has nailed Busby on that subject. His support for the hardline House immigration bill — and his opposition to the Senate bill — has been well-received by voters and the local newspapers."

Busby Comments To Immigrants On Voting Papers Color Final Days Of Race. The AP (6/6, Hoffman) reports Republicans "seized on Democrat Francine Busby's comments that sounded like encouragement for illegal immigrants to help her campaign as the GOP sought an edge in the final hours of a surprisingly close House race." Immigration "looms large in the runoff election," and Busby's remarks, "and her subsequent explanation that she misspoke, has drawn much of the attention in the race's last days." Speaking to "a largely Hispanic audience last Thursday, Busby faced a Spanish-speaking questioner who said he wanted to help her campaign but lacked voting papers. The question was translated into English and she responded, 'Everybody can help. You can all help. You don't need papers for voting, you don't need to be a registered voter to help.'" Bilbray "criticized the Democrat, saying she was encouraging possible illegal immigrants to volunteer for the campaign." But Busby "said she had been trying to encourage underage high school students or people who weren't registered — but are in the country legally — to participate in the political process."

National Discontent Could Fuel Primary Challengers As Eight States Go To Polls. The AP (6/6, Tanner) reports, "The old adage says all politics are local. But challengers this year are convinced that national dissatisfaction with Iraq, immigration and political corruption give them an unusual chance to topple sitting governors, senators and House members." The primaries today "for governor in Alabama and California, a Senate seat in Montana and a handful of House contests, among other races, will put their faith to the test." The CA50 special election is the "most-watched congressional contest," but "in all, eight states are holding primaries, with polls also open in Mississippi, New Jersey, New Mexico, South Dakota and Iowa, where there is an open governor's seat."

Democrats Given Good Chance To Capture One Chamber In November. The Wall Street Journal (6/6, Calmes) reports, "As a bad year for Republicans keeps getting worse, expectations are growing that Democrats could capture at least one house of Congress, ending one-party dominance of the nation's capital and crippling President Bush for his final years." Democrats currently "are in a position to win the 15 seats they need to take control of the House. They have a harder task, however, snagging the six seats needed in the Senate. As the list of vulnerable Republicans grows, all sides are scouting for signs of an electoral wave like that of 1994, which swept away the Democrats' four-decade control of Congress." A recent poll had President Bush's approval rating "at 23% in New York, home to as many as six endangered Republicans. Particularly threatened are Republican moderates in Democratic-leaning areas, including the Northeast, the Ohio River Valley and Florida." Two elections "being held today are being closely watched as potential barometers for the fall: a special election in California to replace former Republican Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, who has pleaded guilty to bribery charges; and a Senate primary in Montana, where scandal-touched Sen. Conrad Burns faces a Republican challenge."

Campaign Already Heating Up With Unexpected Intensity. The New York Times (6/6, Nagourney) reports even for "candidates who will not face the voters for five months, the campaign is shaping up as not only the most contested midterm election in over a decade, but also the most substantive. In a typical election year, intense campaign activity normally does not begin until around Labor Day." Democrats and Republicans "said they were struck by the level of political activity now going on. Television advertisements have been shown by candidates in at least five districts, party officials said, and there are radio and Internet advertisements popping up around the country." Moveon.org, "the liberal advocacy group, began broadcasting hard-hitting advertisements attacking Republican incumbents in four states nearly three months ago and is about to start a second round on Thursday, officials with the organization said." If this "early pattern holds, it could undercut Republican efforts to prevent this election from becoming a national referendum on Mr. Bush and Republican policies."

Democrats Seek To Enhance Communication With Military Families. The Washington Times (6/6, Pfeiffer) reports Democrats are "seeking ways to reach out to military families, hosting a discussion yesterday to help congressional staffers better communicate with men and women serving in the armed forces." Kathy Roth-Douquet and Frank Schaeffer, "authors of 'AWOL: The Unexcused Absence of America's Upper Classes from Military Service -- and How it Hurts Our Country,' spoke in a Capitol basement office filled with Democratic staffers who shared their personal stories of military service and examples of being part of a military family while trying to relate to 'elite' colleagues who 'dismissed' their experiences." Yesterday's discussion "was sponsored by the Truman National Security Project, a Washington think tank that declares its aim is to boost Democrats' 'national security credentials' through an 'innovative, distinctly Democratic approach to national security.'"

Webb's Stance On Affirmative Action Draws Scrutiny. The Washington Post (6/6, B8, Helderman) examines Virginia Democratic Senate candidate James Webb's stance on affirmative action, noting that Webb "said he has been writing and thinking about the issue for years." The Post notes that Webb "comes to an unusual view among candidates in either major party: He supports affirmative action for blacks but otherwise thinks preferential job and education programs should be awarded based on economic conditions or eliminated altogether." His opponent in next Tuesday's primary, Harris Miller, "has characterized Webb's views as out of step with most party members, using affirmative action as a prime example."

Feingold, Warner Address New Hampshire Democrats. The Washington Times (6/6, Bellantoni) reports that potential 2008 Democratic presidential candidates addressed New Hampshire's Democratic convention last weekend. Wisconsin Sen. Russ Feingold "fired up the crowd by urging his party to stand up and fight against the Iraq war." Former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner "gave a broad speech focused mostly on domestic issues, prompting some Democrats to say the Virginian seemed a more likely contender to make it all the way to the White House." While Feingold "threw the audience political red meat," Warner "kept the Bush-bashing to a minimum and instead espoused centrist themes of deficit reduction, better math and science education, and ensuring localities have adequate infrastructure to avoid catastrophes like the flooding during Hurricane Katrina."

Bill Clinton Hopes To Raise $20 Million For Democrats This Year. Former President Bill Clinton is scheduled to appear at more than two dozen Democratic fundraisers this year. The New York Times (6/6, Hernandez) reports that Clinton hopes "to collect at least $20 million for his party's drive to recapture Congress."

Clinton Narrates Audio Tour For Presidential Library. The Washington Post (6/6, A13) reports that former President Bill Clinton's presidential library in Little Rock will son begin offering an audio tour narrated by the former President. The tour "was Clinton's idea and is the first narrated by a former president for a presidential library, said Jordan Johnson, spokesman for the William J. Clinton Foundation. Visitors pay an extra $3 for a device shaped like an oversize cordless phone. For each exhibit, Clinton recounts his thoughts on and memories of the topic."

Republican Turned Democrat Says GOP Broke With Him. DeWayne Wickham writes in USA Today (6/6) reports that former Kansas state GOP chairman Mark Parkinson, who spearheaded the unsuccessful effort to derail the 2002 gubernatorial campaign of Democrat Kathleen Sebelius, has been named by Sebelius to be her running mate in this year's gubernatorial campaign. Republicans "have branded Parkinson a traitor, but he told me he didn't break with the GOP, it broke with him. It became more interested in cultural warfare than improving schools, economic development 'for everyone' and the idea that government should not be involved in people's personal lives."

Brother Of Murderer Turns To Philanthropy. A front page story in the Wall Street Journal (6/6, A1, Davies) reports that Louis Capano, Jr. , who 20 years ago helped his brother cover up a murder, has turned to philanthropy, making two $1 million donations "to put his family's name on buildings at elite Catholic schools he attended." Capano's efforts are "triggering a debate over whether charity can help earn forgiveness."

In "Setback" For US, Islamic Militia Seizes Control Of Mogadishu. ABC World News Tonight (6/5, story 6, :25, Gibson) reported, "In Somalia, an Islamic militia has now seized call of the capital, Mogadishu, after weeks of fighting. That is raising fears that the war-torn nation could fall under the sway of al Qaeda. No one group has controlled Mogadishu since Somalia's government fell in 1991. The militia's victory is a setback for the US, which backed a coalition of warlords." Knight Ridder (6/6, Landay) says the militia's takeover is "a setback to US efforts to contain the spread of militant Islam. US officials and other experts warned that if the militias consolidated their victory they would establish an Islamist state where al-Qaeda could secure bases from which it could spread its violent ideology to other East African and Horn of Africa nations."

The New York Times (6/6, Lacey) quotes Assistant Secretary McCormack saying, "We don't want to see Somalia turn into a safe haven for foreign terrorists. ... We do have very real concerns about that." Bloomberg (6/6, Tighe) notes UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan "yesterday appealed to all groups to stop fighting and begin talks, the UN said on its Web site. Thousands of people have been displaced from their homes in Mogadishu, the UN said." The AP (6/5, Hassan), Financial Times (6/6, England, Dinmore), USA Today (6/6, For), Washington Post (6/6, A10, Hassan) and Washington Times (6/6, Hassan), among others, also reports the story.

Visiting Congolese Leader Pans US Support For Warlords. AFP (6/6) reports, "Congo's president and current African Union head Denis Sassou Nguesso hit out at US support for Somali warlords and expressed hope Washington would work to establish a government in Mogadishu. 'We think, and what we told President Bush, that most important is to establish a government that must help the Somali people to have a real government,' Sassou Nguesso told journalists after meeting Bush and" Secretary Rice. "'We think that if this effort is needed, we have to move in this direction, in order that the Somali government can truly be established in Mogadishu. ... The presence of various groups, the warlords, is not a permanent solution.'"

Solana In Tehran To Pitch Incentives Package.

The New York Times (6/6, Cooper) reports EU foreign policy head Javier Solana "arrived in Tehran on Monday night with incentives intended to resolve the nuclear crisis with Iran, including a proposal to allow Iran to upgrade its aging civilian air fleet through the purchase of aircraft parts from an American company, Boeing." The deal may also include "waiving trade sanctions against Iran to allow the purchase of American agricultural technology, said European diplomats and a senior Bush administration official." Although the exact proposal so far remains private, "several European and American diplomats described parts of the proposal, speaking anonymously because they were not authorized to comment publicly. The offer includes a commitment from the six nations to support Iran's plan for a nuclear energy program for civilian use, including building light-water reactors through joint projects with other countries, the diplomats said. The United States and Europe also agreed to back Iran's membership in the World Trade Organization." That said, "the most compelling item...may be the American offer to end its nearly three-decade policy against direct talks with Iran and to join in the negotiations over Iran's nuclear program."

White House Asks For Patience. AFP (6/6) reports, "The White House pleaded for patience with overtures to Iran, saying 'there is hope' that Tehran will accept an internationally brokered compromise on its nuclear programs. 'I would counsel patience,' spokesman Tony Snow told reporters. 'At this point, as we've said all along, let's give it time. Let's let the Iranians take a look at what the offers are, at the incentives and disincentives.'"

UN Urged To Take Legal Action Against Ahmadinejad For Violating Charter. David B. Rivkin Jr. and Lee A. Casey, lawyers who served in the Justice Department during the administrations of Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush, write in today's Washington Post (6/6, A15), "Speaking last October at a Tehran conference on 'The World Without Zionism,' Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, referred to Israel as a 'disgraceful blot" and called for it to be "wiped off the map.' … Although Ahmadinejad's bellicose statements were condemned by the United States and a number of its European allies, the condemnation was not followed up by a concerted diplomatic and legal effort in the UN Security Council. It ought to be," and " there is a good legal basis for such action. Ahmadinejad's words clearly violate Article 2.4 of the UN Charter. This provision, to which Iran has agreed, requires all UN member states to 'refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state.'"

Washington-Hanoi Military Ties To Expand.

The New York Times (6/6, Gordon) reports Secretary Rumsfeld and senior Vietnamese leaders "agreed Monday to increase their military contacts and to discuss additional ways to broaden their defense cooperation." The Times notes, "Vietnam was an important stop on an Asian swing that has already taken Mr. Rumsfeld to a meeting of defense experts in Singapore." In Hanoi, Rumsfeld "heaped praise on his hosts. He lauded Vietnam's economic development, which he inspected Sunday night with a walk through the city's streets." While "the Vietnam War still casts a long shadow" on bilateral relations, "it is China, a subject that Mr. Rumsfeld said went unmentioned Monday during his talks…, that has added impetus for the new courtship."

The AP (6/6, Baldor) focuses its coverage on Rumsfeld's renewed call for a full accounting of US service members, saying he "is pressing Vietnam for underwater searches and access to aging witnesses in stepped-up efforts.... 'We still have work to do,' Rumsfeld said, though he added that he was pleased Vietnamese military officials had pledged in meetings with him to do more to help recover the remains. 'As we all agree, we don't want to forget the importance of this.' Rumsfeld told reporters U.S. officials will work to see if the U.S. can provide technical assistance with underwater recovery efforts."

Rumsfeld Says US Committed To Engagement In Asia. Secretary Rumsfeld pens an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal Asia (6/6) entitled "A Pacific Nation." The 850-word piece outlines the positions taken by the US at the Singapore Shangri La Dialogue, and the changing culture of US-Asian relations that has permitted new cooperation. Rumsfeld says the US "is -- and always will be -- a Pacific nation," and argues that the US "must, and we will, stay engaged" in Asia "to address a range of traditional, as well as unconventional, security concerns." The op-ed also appears on the website of the domestic Wall Street Journal.

Darfur Tops Agenda Of Bush Meeting With Congolese President. The AP (6/6) reports President Bush "said Monday that it's important for United Nations forces to take over peacekeeping as soon as possible in the Darfur region of Sudan... Bush met at the White House with Denis Sassou-Nguesso, president of the Republic of Congo and head of the 53-nation African Union, to discuss Darfur, AIDS and other issues." Following the meetings, Bush is quoted saying, "We talked about our common commitment to help end the genocide in Darfur. ... I appreciate the president's leadership in helping negotiate a peace agreement, and I appreciate his leadership in working with the United Nations so we can get the AU forces blue-helmeted as quickly as possible." Sassou-Nguesso is quoted saying, "I was happy to see President Bush give his entire support to the development of Africa. ... We discussed a lot of issues that we're all interested in: Peace, security, and not just in Africa, but beyond Africa, in the world."

Bush Hosts Honduran President At White House. The AP (6/6, Pickler) reports President Bush "heard concerns about immigration reform from south-of-the-border ally Honduras on Monday and offered assurances that he was committed to a bill that treats foreigners with respect while upholding U.S. laws. Bush met in the Oval Office with Honduran President Manuel Zelaya," and the two leaders "discussed ways to expand commercial opportunities between their nations and to make sure democracies in Latin America are strong. [Bush] said they also talked about the immigration bill being negotiated on Capitol Hill." Zelaya "thanked Bush for 'the frankness with which he has spoken about the solutions to the common problems we face in the Western Hemisphere.'"

Abbas To Call Referendum On Recognizing Israel. USA Today (6/6) reports, "Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas said Monday that attempts to get the Hamas-led government to implicitly recognize Israel have failed to produce agreement and that he will call a national referendum on the issue." The move "sets Abbas on a collision course with Hamas." The AP (6/5, Daraghmeh) notes Abbas "had set a midnight deadline for agreement. But a participant in late-night talks with Palestinian factions said the president determined they had failed an hour before that."

The New York Times (6/6, Erlanger, Myre) reports the referendum "is expected to be called for July and will be seen as a vote of confidence in Hamas, which won legislative elections in late January but has been isolated internationally and financially because of its refusal to recognize the right of Israel to exist, to forswear violence and to accept previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements."

US, South Korea Hold Free Trade Talks. The AP (6/6, Crutsinger) reports, "The United States and South Korea held their first round of talks Monday aimed at achieving a free trade agreement between the two nations before the end of the year." An agreement with South Korea, "America's seventh-largest trading partner," would be "the most economically significant such pact the United States has reached since it tore down barriers with Mexico and Canada more than a decade ago." Assistant US Trade Representative Wendy Cutler, who is heading the US delegation, "expressed optimism that the talks can be concluded before the end of the year even though the negotiators will have to deal with such tough issues as removing barriers to American farm products, pharmaceuticals and US autos."

Syrian Students Building Nascent Pro-Democracy Movement. The Christian Science Monitor (6/6, Brandon) reports that a "handful" of Syrian student activists are "agitating for reform and struggling to build a pro-democracy student movement in Syria, where martial law imposed in 1963 forbids unofficial political gatherings or groups. … While no organized student movement exists at present, one may be emerging. A small number of students are loosely linked but have no official names, leaders, or organization. They simply come together to organize political debates, spread democratic ideas, and take opinion polls.

Ford Foundation Establishes African Philanthropic Network. The New York Times (6/6, Dugger) reports that the Ford Foundation "will announce today the creation of a new philanthropic venture, led by Africans and based in Dakar, Senegal. The project, Trust Africa, aims to strengthen an expanding network of nonprofit groups across the continent that seek to hold governments accountable, whether elected or dictatorships. Ford has committed $30 million to this new foundation."

Westerners Encouraged To Support Investment In African "Sweatshops." The New York Times' Nicholas Kristof (6/6) writes that while westerners "mostly despise sweatshops as exploiters of the poor," the poor "tend to see sweatshops as opportunities. … Sure, sweatshop work is tedious, grueling and sometimes dangerous. But over all, sewing clothes is considerably less dangerous or arduous — or sweaty — than most alternatives in poor countries. Well-meaning American university students regularly campaign against sweatshops. But instead, anyone who cares about fighting poverty should campaign in favor of sweatshops, demanding that companies set up factories in Africa. If Africa could establish a clothing export industry, that would fight poverty far more effectively than any foreign aid program."

China Acknowledges Role Played By Private Environmental Groups. The New York Times/AP (6/6, Press) reports Zhu Guangyao, deputy chief of the China's Environmental Protection Agency, said pollution costs China more than $200 billion a year" and "called for better legal protection for grass-roots groups so they could help clean up the environment." Zhu "said that the importance of private environmental groups in China had lagged behind their role in other countries, and that his agency wanted to play a more important role in developing 'legislation to secure their interests and existence in China.'"

EU Resists Acceptance Of Genetically Modified Crops. The New York Times (6/6, Rosenthal) reports that the few EU countries "that have banned genetically modified organisms are on the front lines of a war over the future of modified food in Europe, the only large swath of the world that does not already grow or buy the crops. Facing international pressure and a lawsuit brought by the United States, Canada and Argentina at the World Trade Organization, the union said this year that all member states must open their doors to genetically engineered crops and prepare practical and legal regulations to ensure safety for health and the environment. But five countries have imposed eight different types of bans. Many others use their votes in Europe's Council of Ministers to block the crops from entering."

State Department Criticizes Germany Over Sex Traffic. The New York Times (6/6, Cooper) reports, "On the eve of the World Cup in Germany, the State Department's big concern is not over whether the American soccer team has a prayer of getting past the Czech Republic and Italy, but rather over the flood of prostitutes expected into Germany from Eastern Europe, Asia and Africa. The United States, in its annual report on forced labor and trafficking in persons, called Germany, which has legalized prostitution, 'a source, transit and destination country' for sex workers, the more so during the soccer tournament." According to the Times, "The warning to Germany was a rare slap at a close American ally."

Natural Disasters Undermine Indonesian Province's Tourism Industry. The New York Times (6/6, Gelling) reports that Indonesia's Yogyakarta Province, which was devastated by the recent earthquake, "is the second most popular tourist destination in Indonesia, Bali being the first. … Tourism accounts for about 20 percent of the province's income and is second only to agriculture as a source of revenue." But, "Even before the quake, tourism here was threatened by fears of an eruption at Mount Merapi, just north of Yogyakarta. A marketing campaign to show tourists that Yogyakarta, 20 miles south of the volcano, is out of Merapi's reach began several weeks ago and included organized visits to the mountain's slopes."

Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood Said To Be Less Radical Than Often Portrayed. In his column for the Wall Street Journal (6/6) Bret Stephens writes, "For years, the only group outside [the Egyptian] government that has reliably provided broad-based social services has been the Muslim Brotherhood, which, although officially banned, exists as a kind of parallel state within Egyptian society. … Were a free and fair election held tomorrow, the Brotherhood would probably win about 40% of the vote according to Gamal al-Banna, the leading scholarly authority on the group. This is all the more true because the Brotherhood isn't quite the jihadist, Khomeini-type movement frequently portrayed in the West."

WSJournal Sees Peruvian Election As Evidence Of Anti-Chavez Backlash. The Wall Street Journal (6/6), in an editorial, writes, "Governments that produce hyperinflation and unchecked terrorism have a way of ending political careers. So how then to explain the victory in Sunday's Peruvian presidential elections of Alan Garcia, whose 1985-1990 term included all that and more? The answer is that Mr. Garcia's opponent was Ollanta Humala, a protégé of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez. By electing Mr. Garcia, Peruvian voters sent a message that they don't want to follow Venezuela over the cliff."

TERRORISM NEWS:

U.S. Links To Canadian Plot Probed (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

U.S. and Canadian officials are investigating links between Canadian terror suspects accused of plotting to bomb government buildings and Islamic militants in the United States and other countries.

Investigators are looking at links between two Atlanta men arrested in March after they videotaped the U.S. Capitol and at least three other Washington locations and two Canadians identified as part of a terrorist ring. The Canadians were arrested last year trying to smuggle weapons into Canada.

Ehsanul Islam Sadequee, 19, and Syed Haris Ahmed, 21, both U.S. citizens and Georgia residents, were arrested and later indicted after they traveled to Canada to meet with at least three other targets of an ongoing FBI terrorism investigation in March 2005.

An FBI affidavit said they discussed "strategic locations in the United States suitable for a terrorist strike."

The affidavit said Ahmed, charged with giving material support of terrorism, and Sadequee, accused of making materially false statements in connection with an ongoing federal terrorism investigation, talked about attacks on oil refineries and military bases and planned to travel to Pakistan to get military training at a terrorist camp, which authorities said Ahmed then tried to do.

U.S. authorities have established that the two men also had been in contact via computer with some of the 17 terror suspects arrested Saturday in Canada.

During a hearing in their case, Assistant U.S. Attorney Colleen Kavanagh said Sadequee and Ahmed made videos in Washington of the U.S. Capitol, the Masonic Temple, the World Bank and a fuel storage facility and were preparing to send them to "overseas brothers." She said Sadequee gave Ahmed information on how to receive military-style training in Pakistan.

FBI spokesman Richard Kolko acknowledged over the weekend that some of the Canadian suspects had been in "contact" with the two Georgia men but said there was "no current outstanding threat to any targets on U.S. soil emanating from this case."

"There is preliminary indication that some of the Canadian subjects may have had limited contact with the two people recently arrested from Georgia," Mr. Kolko said.

Yesterday, he noted that the bureau had been working with Canadian authorities on the suspected terrorist cell for "some time" and had established "a working relationship with the Canadians in the prevention of terrorism."

Authorities said Canadian investigators have focused on Mohammed Dirie, 22, and Yasin Abdi Mohamed, 24, both Somali immigrants living in Kingston, Ontario, who were taken into custody Aug. 13 on weapons charges at the Peace Bridge between Canada and Buffalo, N.Y. Stopped by Canadian Border Services inspectors, they later were convicted on weapons violations and are serving two-year prison sentences in Canada.

Listed among the 17 charged with being members of the Canadian terrorist organization, Dirie and Mohamed attempted to smuggle three handguns and 200 rounds of ammunition into Canada from the United States.

"This investigation is not over," Royal Canadian Mounted Police Assistant Commissioner Mike McDonell told the Canadian Broadcasting Corp. "We will be following every investigative lead we have to its conclusion, and anybody that aided, facilitated or participated in this terrorist event will be arrested."

The Canadians are accused in a scheme to buy 3,000 pounds of ammonium nitrate for bombs, which were to be used against buildings and landmarks in that country. The amount is three times what was used in the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing, which killed 168 persons.

Twelve of those charged are accused of participating in a terrorist group, including Dirie and Mohamed, who were also named on charges of importing weapons and ammunition for the purpose of terrorist activity. Another man, Fahim Ahmad, 21, an

Afghan national living in Canada, also was named on weapons charges. Dirie and Mohamed reportedly were driving a car rented by Ahmad at the time of their arrest last year.

Nine of the men are facing charges of receiving training from a terrorist group, and four others are accused of providing training. Six are also charged with intending to cause an explosion causing serious bodily harm or death.

Five youths have also been charged in connection with the plot, but details of their charges were not released.

U.S. authorities have been concerned for some time about the possibility of terrorists coming into the United States from Canada.

The Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) first reported in December 2002 that al Qaeda terrorists had established "sleeper cells" in Canada whose members had the "capability and conviction" to support terrorist activities all a cross North America. The agency called the cells secretive, operational and loyal to Osama bin Laden, named as the mastermind of the September 11 attacks.

More Vigilance Seen On U.S.-Canada Border (AP)

By David Crary

U.S. authorities tightened their checks of traffic from Canada on Monday as debate over the long and hard-to-police border intensified following the weekend arrests of 17 Muslim Canadians in a suspected Ontario terror plot.

Calls for tougher security measures were countered by pleas from business and civic leaders on both sides to keep border crossings as quick and simple as possible.

"Terrorism is clearly part of the North American environment whether we like it or not, but closing down the border is not going to eliminate it," said Arlene White, a Canadian who is executive director of the Binational Tourism Alliance in the Niagara Falls-Buffalo area.

In Washington, U.S. Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar said patrol stations along the 4,000-mile border — especially those adjoining Ontario — are on high alert because of the arrests, although investigators say the suspects' alleged plot apparently involved only targets in Canada.

U.S. agents already deployed to the Canadian border will work overtime and some will be moved closer to the areas where the arrests occurred, Aguilar said.

U.S. Customs and Border Protection official Kristi Clemens said some traffic headed into the United States would under go tougher procedures at the 89 ports of entry along the border.

"The current events may result in some additional questions of commuters and travels," Clemens said. She also said, without elaborating, that her agency has added some "enforcement capabilities" following the arrests.

Security along the border has been increasing ever since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001: new surveillance camera systems, new scanning devices to check on trucks' cargo, and many more agents on duty.

But concerns remain high among some politicians and experts, such as David Harris, former chief of strategic planning for the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. He contends that Canada's immigration policies are too lax, enabling more than 50 terrorist organizations to have a presence in the country.

"Canadians are determined to keep the border open at almost any cost, because so much of Canada's economy relies on U.S. trade," said Harris, who now is a private security consultant in Ottawa. "The general theory of the trade devotees is the border should be open all the time, at virtually any cost — but you can only enjoy your prosperity if you're alive to do so."

Harris has urged Canada to tighten its immigration policies — it welcomes some 250,000 new immigrants and refugees each year — and work with the United States on bolstering border controls with such high-tech devices as such as sensors and infrared cameras.

Prior to the weekend arrests, the U.S. debate over immigration and border security been focused on border with Mexico. Said Harris: "A sole American preoccupation with the southern border is living in the past."

About 1,000 U.S. Border Patrol agents work along the U.S.-Canada border, roughly triple the 2001 force but a fraction of the 9,600 agents who patrol the Mexican border, about half as long at 1,900 miles.

Though often depicted as porous, controls along the U.S.-Canada border have entrapped some terrorist suspects, such as Ahmed Ressam, who was arrested as he drove off a ferry in Port Angeles, Wash., in 1999 and was later convicted of plotting to bomb the Los Angeles airport.

Last summer, two men believed to be part of a terrorist ring in Canada were arrested in Buffalo while trying to smuggle guns and ammunition from the United States. The men are serving two-year jail sentences.

One initiative to change border procedures has been mired in controversy — the Western Hemisphere Travel Initiative. It would require Americans re-entering the United States after short visits to Canada and Mexico to show passports or other high-tech ID cards — a change from the current practice in which a driver's license usually suffices.

The Senate — concerned about border-crossing snarls — recently voted to delay implementation of the measure from January 2008 until June 2009.

Arlene White, the binational tourism official, said confusion about the passport requirement already had reduced cross-border visits.

"I recognize the immigration issue is huge in the states," White said. "But the northern border is very, very different, and we must continue to appreciate those differences."

White acknowledged, however, that some of the security measures implemented since the Sept. 11 attacks have actually speeded border crossings. These include the use of high-tech x-ray scanners to screen vehicles and a binational program that allows speedier crossings for people accepted into a special program for low-risk frequent travelers.

"The border's definitely safer — and more efficient," said Kevin Corsaro, a spokesman for U.S. Customs and Border Protection in Buffalo.

Arrests Raise Questions About U.S.-Canada Border Security (KRT)

By Dave Montgomery

Knight Ridder, June 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - The breakup of an alleged terrorist bomb plot in Canada late last week has raised new fears that the next terrorist attack could come from the north.

The 4,000-mile border between the United States and Canada is twice as long as the one with Mexico, but it's guarded by fewer than 1,000 Border Patrol agents - one-tenth of the force in the Southwest. Vast stretches of unpatrolled terrain offer potential terrorists an easily accessible gateway into the United States.

"Do the math," said T.J. Bonner, a San Diego agent who serves as the president of the National Border Patrol Council, a 10,500-member union that represents nonsupervisory Border Patrol agents. "We're very vulnerable out there."

While boosting border enforcement and national security have emerged as central elements of the immigration legislation that's moving through Congress, attention has centered on the porous Southwest border, where more than 1 million illegal immigrants are arrested annually.

But some lawmakers are calling for a harder look at the northern border after Friday's arrests of 12 men and five juveniles who allegedly had stockpiled three tons of ammonium nitrate fertilizer to carry out terrorist bombing attacks in Canada. Timothy McVeigh used two tons of the highly destructive chemical substance in the 1995 attack that demolished the Oklahoma City federal building, killing 168 people.

Although the suspects appeared to be targeting sites in Canada, including the Parliament building in Ottawa, investigators fear they'd established a U.S. link with two terrorism suspects in Georgia who may have been plotting attacks in the United States, but that remains unconfirmed.

The Canadian Security Intelligence Service, the government's chief national-security agency, has estimated that as many as 50 terrorist organizations and 300 individual terrorism suspects have bases of operations in Canada. Active groups, the agency said, include Shiite and Sunni Islamic extremists, the Irish Republican Army and all major Sikh terrorist organizations.

"We're aware that there is a terrorist infrastructure within Canada, no different than within the United States and other countries, that contains a variety of elements ranging from fundraisers, ideological support, to direct membership," said Ben Venzke, who heads the IntelCenter, a private contractor that does counterterrorism support work for the U.S. government.

"Despite all of the security measures and procedures put in place to stop terrorists" from crossing the border, Venzke said, "it is extremely difficult. Even if you do the best possible effort, there are still going to be a fair number to get through."

Even before the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the northern border had a reputation as a potential open door for extremists who'd settled in Canada to take advantage of its liberal immigration policies. One Canadian officer was quoted as describing the country as "Club Med for terrorists."

In December 1999, authorities arrested Ahmed Ressam after he drove from Canada to Washington state in a rental car packed with bomb-making material, which he'd planned to use to bomb Los Angeles International Airport on New Year's Eve. He later was sentenced to 22 years in prison.

In 1997, Ghazi Ibrahim Abu Maizar, a would-be suicide bomber who planned to detonate a pipe bomb in a New York subway station, crossed illegally into the United States three times, once by bus and twice by hiking across, according to news accounts. Several of the Sept. 11 hijackers also crossed into the United States from Canada.

The scramble to toughen national security after Sept. 11 prompted a nearly threefold increase in Border Patrol agents at the U.S.-Canada border, from 340 in 2001 to 980 by this year, according to U.S. Customs and Border Protection.

U.S. officials also doubled inspectors at the 89 ports of entry, from 1,615 to 3,391, expanded cooperative law-enforcement operations with Canada and have increasingly employed sensors, cameras, aircraft and marine patrols.

Even so, law enforcement authorities acknowledge the immense challenges of patrolling a 3,987-mile stretch that cuts along 12 states, traversing waterways, mountainous terrain and dense forests.

Some illegal crossers have been known to enter the United States on snowmobiles. Others fly across unpatrolled airspace or simply walk down deserted farm roads.

Smugglers also exploit the remote terrain, transporting drugs and human cargo. In recent months, agents with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement have smashed smuggling rings that transported Asians, Pakistanis and Eastern Europeans.

"I don't care how much technology you have up there, you'll still have trouble getting agents to respond in a timely fashion," Bonner said. "There's vast stretches that make it very difficult, depending on the season. For the well-trained, determined crosser, it's actually an advantage for them."

Charges In Canadian Bomb Plot Isolate 6 Ringleaders (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

TORONTO, June 5 -- Six men arrested in a broad police sweep last weekend have been charged with hatching the alleged plot to set off a powerful bomb somewhere in Ontario, according to charges made public Monday.

A total of 17 people were arrested -- 12 adults and five juveniles -- and all have been charged under Canada's post-Sept. 11, 2001, terrorism laws. But details made public Monday suggest that some members of the group may have had more limited knowledge of the alleged plot than others.

All 12 adults are charged with "knowingly participating, directly or indirectly, in the activity of a terrorist group." The terrorism-related charges against the juveniles, all of them males, have not been disclosed.

A report in the Toronto Star said police had intercepted the fertilizer to be used in the bomb and substituted a harmless powder before the arrests were made. Police officials said Monday they stood by their statement that three tons of the fertilizer, which is highly explosive when mixed with fuel oil, was "delivered" to the bombers.

Mike McDonell, assistant commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, said on Saturday that police had swooped in as the danger increased and that the detained men had the "intent and capability" to carry out the bombing.

The RCMP and intelligence agents said they had been closely watching the activities of at least some of the men for an extended period before Friday's arrests. According to their statements and reports here, several members of the group came under scrutiny as a result of political conversations on the Internet that were monitored by authorities.

The investigators' interest was heightened after the visit to Toronto in March 2005 of two men from Georgia, Syed Ahmed, 21, and Ehsanul Sadequee, 19, who were later charged under anti-terrorism laws. The men allegedly met with at least three Canadians to discuss potential bombing targets, the FBI has said. The charges revealed Monday said the terrorism activity in Canada began on March 1, 2005.

According to those charges, 10 of the men gathered in a vacant wooded area north of Toronto for what authorities call "terrorism-related training." Residents of the rural area say they heard the sounds of automatic weapons and saw men in camouflage uniforms in the woods near Washago, about 90 miles north of Toronto, several times last year.

Police swept the area for evidence after the men had left, according to reports here.

Several of the men attended a storefront mosque in Mississauga, an incorporated suburb west of Toronto that is home to many immigrant groups. A key and, to some, troubling figure in that mosque was Qayyum Abdul Jamal, 43, the oldest of those arrested. Some people who heard Jamal discuss politics at the mosque objected that he was trying to teach younger men that Western countries are at war with Muslims.

It is unclear how far their complaints went, but Wajid Khan, a member of Parliament and one of those who confronted Jamal at the mosque last year, said Sunday that "many people in the community were cooperating" with authorities.

The charged men, all of them said by authorities to be Canadian citizens or longtime residents, are from areas around Toronto and Kingston, Ontario. Two of those charged, Yasim Abdi Mohamed, 24, and Mohammed Dirie, 22, both of whom moved from Somalia to Kingston, are already in jail, having been caught at the U.S. border last August attempting to bring handguns into Canada.

Plot Puts Focus On Security, Immigration Agencies (WT)

By Fawzia Sheikh

TORONTO -- Canadian security and immigration practices came under scrutiny yesterday after the weekend arrests of 17 persons suspected of plotting to blow up southern Ontario landmarks.

About 90 percent of immigration applicants from Pakistan and Afghanistan in the past five years have not been sufficiently screened for security concerns, Jack Hooper, deputy director of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), told a Senate committee last month.

Security analysts, meanwhile, warned that past cuts in staffing and funding for the nation's security services have left them short of manpower to search for terrorist cells.

Seventeen Canadian residents, many of them regular attendees at a Toronto mosque, were arrested Friday and Saturday after members of the group purchased 3 tons of ammonium nitrate, a fertilizer that can be used to make bombs.

Authorities said the suspects had been monitored by security agencies since 2004, but few details of the plot were offered ahead of a court hearing today. News reports said investigators had been eavesdropping on Internet chat rooms espousing anti-Western sentiment that are frequented by some of the accused.

John Thompson, president of the MacKenzie Institute think tank, said he thinks at least one other terrorist cell and "probably more" were still operating.

"Most of them would be in the Toronto area. It's the largest concentration of Muslims," he said.

If he is correct, finding such groups will be a challenge for the CSIS, which worked with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and local and federal agencies in the weekend roundup.

The budget of CSIS was cut by about 20 percent in the 10 years before the September 11 attacks in the United States, and staff levels went from about 2,700 to 2,200, said Dwight Hamilton, lead author and editor of a recently released book on terrorism and Canadian intelligence.

DOJ_NMG_0031767

The federal government boosted the CSIS budget by 30 percent a few months after the attacks, funding "a recruiting drive to expand on their linguistic and cultural skills," Mr. Thompson said. CSIS also integrated with other Canadian law-enforcement agencies to better track terrorism.

Even so, Mr. Hamilton said, "CSIS doesn't have the manpower to deal with the threat. They've been gutted. And just because [staff] numbers went up after 9/11 doesn't mean that all is well.

"The head of the standing [government] committee on national defense and security, Colin Kenny, has said that training an intelligence analyst takes about as long as training a neurosurgeon. You do the math."

Mr. Hooper, the CSIS deputy director, acknowledged to a parliamentary committee last month that most immigration applicants from Pakistan and Afghanistan are not adequately screened.

CSIS spokeswoman Barbara Campion said that everyone who applies for immigration or refugee status in Canada is screened but that security checks are completed on only the 10 percent of overseas applicants who are deemed worrisome by Citizenship and Immigration Canada.

Mr. Thompson said that as well as monitoring jihadist groups, CSIS is struggling to monitor threats from non-Muslim organizations in Canada, such as Sri Lanka's Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam and the Sikh group Babbar Khalsa.

CSIS said it plans to complete a review of "operational resources" this summer.

Canada Confronts Its Shadows Within (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, June 6, 2006

MISSISSAUGA, Canada — In a country that celebrates cultural diversity, a suspected terrorist plot has shattered the image that many Canadians have of themselves as more secure, more generous and more likable than their U.S. neighbors.

From Muslim shopkeepers in multicultural neighborhoods such as this one to intellectuals debating social policy in Toronto and Ottawa, Canadians have been forced into a disturbing confrontation with the idea that global terrorism may have found fertile soil within their own boundaries.

"I thought this was a very safe country. That's why we came here from Pakistan," said Anjun Ahmed, a 54-year-old convenience store owner who moved to this thriving Toronto suburb, the fastest-growing in Canada, nearly two years ago from Rawalpindi. "This is very bad. If they [the suspects] were really going to do these things, people will be afraid and won't come here."

The 17 men and youths arrested over the weekend for allegedly plotting to blow up Canadian national landmarks were to be arraigned today on charges including participation in a terrorist group. Three also face weapons-smuggling charges, six have been charged with intent to carry out a bombing on an undisclosed target, and nine stand accused of taking part in a terrorist training course, according to documents filed with the Ontario Court of Justice.

Like the homegrown British extremists who bombed London's transit system in July, Canada's alleged perpetrators of immigrant origin were mostly long-settled citizens whose families had fled poverty and oppression in Somalia, the Middle East, the Indian subcontinent and the Caribbean.

Like the Al Qaeda and Taliban extremists who practiced bomb-making and firearms use at secret camps in Afghanistan before Sept. 11, the Canadian suspects allegedly trained at a clandestine base north of here near remote Lake Simcoe, covering their tracks by dismantling the facility after the sessions in November and December.

And like Timothy McVeigh, whose 1995 bombing in Oklahoma City killed 168 people, the Canadian suspects allegedly had amassed ammonium nitrate — three times as much as McVeigh used in the worst act of domestic terrorism on U.S. soil.

Though the men, means and methods prompted comparison to past attacks, Canadian analysts and observers were saddened and offended that the accused plotters would want to harm their nation.

"Terrorists always try to target peaceful places because it's easier to hit a place where people don't think such things can happen," said Mohsin Ali, a 20-year-old Ryerson University engineering student who came here with his family two years ago from Karachi, Pakistan.

"My children go to college and school here. They don't have problems," said shop owner Ahmed, who invested his life savings in the shop adjacent to the strip-mall mosque where most of the arrested terrorism suspects worshipped. "I'm disappointed."

The attacks have quickly led to acts of anti-Muslim retaliation.

Thirty windows were smashed by vandals early Sunday at the huge International Muslims Organization of Toronto mosque in the Rexdale neighborhood just north of here, an incident its Guyanese founder, Omar Farouk, said Muslims were "hoping and praying was an isolated incident."

"The Canadian people are very loving and kind — equally are the Muslims," said Farouk, whose mosque is attended by nearly 20,000 people and serves as a gathering place for interfaith community events.

The view of Canada as removed from the immigrant frictions and diplomatic strains suffered by its superpower neighbor may be outdated, said Audrey Macklin, a University of Toronto law professor who specializes in immigration, refugee and citizenship affairs.

"There is a desire in Canada to see ourselves as very different from the United States. Whatever we are, we are not the United States," she said, citing the nation's more liberal immigration policy and rejection of go-it-alone military actions. Canada has declined to be part of the U.S.-led forces involved in the war in Iraq.

"We're not a priority target the way the United States is, but that doesn't mean we are protected," she said, adding that Canadians "picture themselves as being thought of as nicer than the United States."

Yet even the best justice system in the world could not eradicate crime, and neither can all acts of extremism be prevented, she said, warning that "no country should be smug enough to think it's immune."

Toronto Mayor David Miller gave voice to his country's collective reluctant realization that vulnerability to extremist violence might be a price paid by an open society unwilling to rein in its rights and freedoms.

"We didn't, as Canadians, expect this, but obviously it is part of modern reality," he told CBC Radio.

David Rudd, president of the Canadian Institute of Strategic Studies, said Canada's liberal immigration policy and generous social spending were laudable. And he brooks no argument from those looking for justification in any disaffection among the alleged would-be bombers, only two of whom are older than 25.

"Certainly the political landscape of this country is very, very amenable to people from foreign countries and non-Anglo-Saxon cultures coming here and living in peace and getting ahead in their lives," said Rudd, applauding the government's emphasis on accepting the cultural individualities of newcomers rather than seeking homogenization.

Unlike the suburban ghettos that have sprung up around major European cities, Canada's nearly 6 million immigrants live scattered throughout the country of 32 million people. They reside primarily in leafy bedroom communities such as Mississauga, a largely immigrant venue but one where Jamaican jerk shops, Arab kebab stands, sushi bars and Indian restaurants stand side by side with burger stands and doughnut shops in suburbs and strip malls.

One school of thought gaining traction in explaining why Canada could become a terrorism target for Muslim extremists is its very liberal, consumer-oriented and socially permissive nature, Rudd said.

"To some people, that situation is offensive or degenerate, that women should be allowed to walk down the street wearing a halter top," he said.

Some who espouse radical or ultraconservative views on the practice of Islam come to Canada for its generous welfare and professional opportunities, often quietly harboring resentment of their environment but at times acting on what they see as blasphemous, he said.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper offered a similar explanation to Canadians the day after the country's largest anti-terrorism sweep since the aftermath of Sept. 11.

Canada's focus on Muslim extremism intensified after the 1999 arrest of Algerian national Ahmed Ressam as he attempted to cross from British Columbia into Washington state. Ressam was caught with a carload of explosives and convicted of planning to use them to bomb Los Angeles International Airport on New Year's Eve. He was identified as a member of a Montreal-based terrorist cell with links to Al Qaeda camps in Afghanistan.

Harper, speaking of the new suspected plot, said in a national address: "Their alleged target was Canada, Canadian institutions, the Canadian economy, the Canadian people.

"We are a target because of who we are and how we live, our society, our diversity and our values — values such as freedom, democracy and the rule of law," he said. "The values that make Canada great, values that Canadians cherish."

Padilla Lawyer Wants Key Evidence Tossed (AP)

By Curt Anderson

AP, June 5, 2006

A lawyer for alleged al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla is asking a judge to throw out key evidence, saying the warrant for his arrest was based on statements from one source who claims he was tortured and another who was heavily medicated.

The statements were cited in an FBI affidavit "that distorted the facts in an apparent disregard for the truth," attorney Andrew Patel said in court papers filed late last week.

Padilla was arrested in 2002 at Chicago's O'Hare Airport. Initially accused of plotting to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a major U.S. city, Padilla was designated an enemy combatant and held without charge by the military for 3 1/2 years.

President Bush dropped the combatant label in November and Padilla was indicted in Miami along with four others on charges of being part of a support cell for Islamic extremists. Padilla's trial is set for this fall.

The evidence being challenged includes a cell phone allegedly provided to Padilla by another al-Qaida operative, an address book containing names of his alleged al-Qaida recruiter and sponsor, and more than $10,000 in cash.

In court papers, Patel does not accuse the FBI or other U.S. interrogators of engaging in torture. But he argued that U.S. failure to detail the torture allegations before Padilla's arrest invalidate the evidence seized from him.

A spokesman for U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta had no comment Monday.

According to Patel, the sources cited in the FBI affidavit were Binyam Ahmed Muhammad — being held at the Guantanamo Bay detention camp — and Abu Zubayda, a top al-Qaida leader held at an undisclosed location. They were arrested in Pakistan in 2002.

Patel said Muhammad has told his own lawyer that he was whipped, hung from the ceiling of his cell with leather straps and later taken to Morocco where he was tortured with a razor.

Patel said Zubayda was treated after his arrest for gunshot wounds, raising questions about "the effect the medications may have had on Abu Zubayda's ability to provide accurate information."

Maryland Teacher's Terror Trial Goes To Jury (WT/AP)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press

A third-grade teacher at a Muslim school in Maryland traveled to Pakistan shortly after the 2001 terrorist attacks, trained with a terrorist group there and later served as chauffeur for one of that group's leaders during his U.S. travels, federal prosecutors said yesterday.

Prosecutors and defense attorneys made their closing arguments yesterday in the trial of Ali Asad Chandia, 29, who is charged with providing material support to Lashkar-e-Taiba, a group that supports Muslim control of the disputed Kashmir territory on the India-Pakistan border. The jury began its deliberations yesterday afternoon.

The U.S. government declared Lashkar a terrorist group in December 2001.

Prosecutors have said Lashkar served as a potential gateway for Americans and others who wanted to join the Taliban in neighboring Afghanistan in its fight against U.S. troops in late 2001.

The charges against Mr. Chandia stem from a government investigation of what prosecutors called a "Virginia jihad network," a group of young Muslim men who used paint-ball games in 2000 and 2001 as paramilitary training for holy war around the globe.

Ten persons have been convicted in that investigation, including the group's spiritual leader, Ali al-Timimi, who was sentenced to life in prison for soliciting treason and urging group members to fight U.S. troops in Afghanistan.

Prosecutors do not say that Mr. Chandia intended to take up arms against U.S. troops, but they do say he received jihad training at a Lashkar camp in late 2001.

Then, after returning to the United States in 2002, they say he helped Lashkar by assisting one of its officers, Mohammed Ajmal Khan, in his U.S. travels.

Specifically, Mr. Chandia served as a driver for Khan and picked him up at various airports. He also helped Khan obtain and ship equipment from the United States to Pakistan, including a remote-controlled aircraft and 50,000 paint balls, according to the government.

Prosecutor John Gibbs said the defense sought to portray Khan as an eccentric, largely innocuous character.

"He is not cute. He is a terrorist," Mr. Gibbs said of Khan, who was convicted in Great Britain of supporting Lashkar and sentenced earlier this year to nine years in prison.

Defense lawyer Marvin Miller said prosecutors had no evidence that Mr. Chandia attended a Lashkar camp, only testimony from an eyewitness who saw Mr. Chandia at a Lashkar office in Lahore.

Mr. Miller said Mr. Chandia traveled to Pakistan to help arrange his brother's wedding there in January 2002.

As for the assistance Mr. Chandia lent to Khan, Mr. Miller argued that Mr. Chandia didn't know of Khan's connections to Lashkar.

Mr. Chandia is on leave from a teaching job the al-Huda school in College Park.

Counterterror Exemption Proposed For Privacy Act (WT/UPI)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

A little-noticed proposal from the Senate intelligence committee would exempt federal agencies from important provisions of the Privacy Act in the name of the war on terrorism.

The committee's annual authorization bill, which was sent to the Senate last month after a unanimous vote, would initiate a three-year pilot program, during which U.S. intelligence agencies would be able to access personal information about Americans held by other federal departments or agencies if it is thought to be relevant to counterterrorism or counterproliferation.

In the wake of revelations about the administration's use of data mining and warrantless surveillance of telephone and Internet communications in pursuit of the nation's terrorist enemies, the provision could cause a furor.

"If this is enacted, the Privacy Act will look like Swiss cheese," American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) legislative counsel Tim Sparapani said.

Mr. Sparapani said he was not reassured by the role that the law envisages for the president's Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board, which would monitor the program and report to Congress as the three-year sunset approached.

"The board is stacked four [Republicans] to one [Democrat]," he said.

"It is not truly independent" because it is inside the president's own office, which puts it "under the thumb of the president and his advisers."

The board's chairwoman, Texas lawyer Carol Dinkins, did not respond to a request for comment yesterday afternoon.

A Democratic committee staffer defended the proposal, saying the exemptions were "narrowly drawn to address the kinds of problems we found during our September 11 inquiry" when U.S. agencies failed to pool information about known al Qaeda militants, who were, thus, able to slip into the country.

At the moment, the 1974 Privacy Act broadly prohibits a federal government entity that has collected information about Americans from using it for any purpose other than that for which it was collected. Information typically cannot be passed on to other agencies or departments without the person's permission.

These restrictions "could prevent the sharing of intelligence information within the executive branch," said the committee report accompanying the intelligence authorization bill, designated S. 3237.

The report goes on to say that an "Information Sharing Working Group," made up of representatives from U.S. intelligence and law-enforcement agencies and from the Departments of Defense and Homeland Security, had recommended changes to the Privacy Act restrictions on personal-information sharing in 2004.

The committee included similar provisions in its authorization bill last year, but that legislation died after an anonymous hold -- apparently from at least one Republican senator angered by Democrat-authored provisions on detention and interrogation -- prevented it from reaching the Senate floor.

Though the Privacy Act created 12 exceptions to the restriction on data sharing -- including for information used "to support a civil or criminal law-enforcement activity under certain proscribed circumstances" -- the committee report says there is no such exemption for intelligence activities.

Section 310 of the committee's new bill creates one, exempting all U.S. intelligence agencies from data-sharing restrictions in cases in which the information "is relevant to a lawful and authorized foreign intelligence or counterintelligence activity." If the information does not "pertain to an identifiable individual," then the director of national intelligence or one his deputies has to approve the sharing.

Under the provision, intelligence agencies also can ask for Privacy Act-covered records from nonintelligence agencies -- and be entitled to them -- if the information relates to international terrorism or proliferation.

No Defense For Degrading Prisoners (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 6, 2006

IN AN UNUSUAL MOMENT OF public introspection, President Bush told a recent news conference that "the biggest mistake that's happened so far, at least from our country's involvement in Iraq, is Abu Ghraib. We've been paying for that for a long period of time."

Apparently, planners in the Pentagon weren't listening to the president's remarks, or failed to understand their larger import: This country harms its own image — and puts its troops in harm's way — when it humiliates and degrades prisoners.

On Monday, The Times' Julian E. Barnes reported that the Defense Department, over the objection of the State Department, has decided to omit from a new Army Field Manual on interrogation a prohibition against "humiliating and degrading treatment" contained in Common Article 3 of the Geneva Convention.

Unfortunately, there is a precedent for this deletion. In a 2002 order, President Bush wrote that because Article 3 was designed to deal with conflicts that were not "international" in scope but rather civil conflicts, it didn't apply to Al Qaeda or Taliban detainees.

More recently, Pentagon officials — supported by Vice President Dick Cheney's office — apparently have come to believe that including the prohibition in the manual would cramp the style of interrogators and create an "unintentional sanctuary" for Al Qaeda fighters. For example, one official complained, adherence to Article 3 might make it difficult to "punch the buttons of a Muslim male" by questioning his manhood.

Even if this were true — and we doubt whether verbal insults constitute "humiliating and degrading treatment" — the alternative is worse. Omitting Article 3 from the interrogation manual not only would be handing the enemies of the United States a propaganda victory, but by giving interrogators an inch of discretion, it would be encouraging some of them to take a mile. Such slippage isn't just a matter of speculation. It's what happened at Abu Ghraib.

We have been here before. In 2002, Justice Department lawyers produced a now-infamous memo espousing a ridiculously narrow definition of torture, limiting it to the pain accompanying "death, organ failure or the permanent impairment of a significant body function." The administration repudiated the memo, just as it had second thoughts about a directive from Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld allowing interrogators to subject detainees to "mild, noninjurious physical conduct" to induce them to talk.

Any plan to omit Article 3 from the interrogation manual justifies the same sort of serious second thoughts. If Rumsfeld can't see that, his newly reflective boss should set him straight.

Degrading America's Image (NYT)

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

For more than seven decades, civilized nations have adhered to minimum standards of decent behavior toward prisoners of war — agreed to in the Geneva Conventions. They were respected by 12 presidents and generations of military leaders because they reflected this nation's principles and gave Americans some protection if they were captured in wartime.

It took the Bush administration to make the world doubt Washington's fidelity to the rules. And The Los Angeles Times, reporting yesterday on a dispute over updating the Army rulebook known as the Field Manual, reminded us that there is good reason to worry.

At issue is Directive 2310 on the treatment and questioning of prisoners, an annex to the Field Manual. It has long contained a reference to Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which covers all prisoners, whether they meet the common definition of prisoners of war or are the sort of prisoners the administration classifies as "unlawful enemy combatants," like suspected members of the Taliban or Al Qaeda.

Article 3 prohibits the use of torture and other overt acts of violence. But Mr. Bush's civilian lawyers removed it from the military rulebook over the objections of diplomats and military lawyers. Mr. Bush has said he does not condone torture, but he has also said he would decide for himself when to follow the ban on torture imposed by Congress last year. Removing the Geneva Conventions from Army regulations gives the world more cause for doubt.

Article 3 also prohibits "outrages on personal dignity, in particular, humiliating and degrading treatment." (Remember the hooded man, the pyramids of naked prisoners?) The Pentagon says the new rules require humane treatment, but that is not much comfort, since the Bush team has shown that it does not define humane treatment the way most people do.

There are other aspects of Article 3 that this administration probably finds inconvenient, like its requirement that governments holding prisoners subject them to actual courts "affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples." The hearings at Guantánamo Bay hardly meet that description.

It defies belief that this administration is still clinging to its benighted policies on prisoners after the horrors of Abu Ghraib, the killings at American camps in Afghanistan and the world's fresh outrage over what appears to have been the massacre of Iraqi men, women and children in the village of Haditha.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Intel Chief Gives Vt. Commencement Talk (AP-Y2)

By David Gram

National Intelligence Director John Negroponte urged graduates of a private high school Monday to appreciate and take full advantage of the human ability to communicate.

In a brief speech, Negroponte said words had profoundly shaped human history, giving people "the ability to express feelings, to record events, to plan ahead, to resolve differences and to share a common identity."

"You have been empowered to express yourselves, to get to know one another, to define your aspirations and to understand and respect your differences," he said.

Negroponte, a former U.S. ambassador, is the first director of National Intelligence, a position designed to oversee the country's different intelligence agencies.

He made no reference to foreign policy or the controversy over the government's domestic eavesdropping program during his speech at St. Johnsbury Academy, where his son John was one of the graduates.

About 75 peace activists stood outside in the drizzle holding signs and giving speeches, alleging that Negroponte was a key player in abusive U.S. foreign policies from Central America in the 1980s to Iraq today.

"It's outrageous that he's being given a position of honor in our community," said Brian Tokar of East Montpelier.

Police arrested four protesters, two who were removed from the hall while heckling during Negroponte's speech and two who ventured onto what police said was the academy's private property.

After the second heckler was hustled out by security, Negroponte drew a laugh when he said, "I think you'll all be very grateful that I have a very short speech."

Groundbreaking For 9/11 Memorial At Pentagon Set (WP)

By Timothy Dwyer

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

The president of the Pentagon Memorial Fund announced yesterday that a groundbreaking ceremony will occur June 15, a huge milestone in the nearly five-year fundraising effort for the 9/11 monument.

About 150 family members and other guests, including Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, are expected to attend the invitation-only ceremony, which will be held at the memorial site on the west lawn of the Pentagon, James J. Laychak said.

"It is one step toward completion of the memorial," said Laychak, who lost a brother in the attack on the Pentagon on Sept. 11, 2001. "It gets us closer to the vision that I have of all of us family members sitting in a quiet corner at the completed memorial watching everyone enjoying what we helped create."

Laychak said about $10.8 million has been raised for memorial construction. He said the goal is to raise $22 million for construction, which is expected to be completed in September 2008, as well as another $10 million that will be used to maintain the memorial.

The majority of the money to build the memorial has come from private donations, Laychak said. He said the memorial fund got a grant of nearly $1 million from the federal government recently and has asked for $100,000 from the state of Virginia, but that has yet to be approved.

Among those who will attend the groundbreaking are architects Julie Beckman and Keith Kaseman, who won a worldwide competition to design the memorial.

"It is a huge milestone, and I am very excited about it," Beckman said. "It is something that we have been waiting for, and it is timed to go along with real construction that is beginning on the site. We are just thrilled."

The memorial will have 184 cantilevered benches, one in memory of each victim of the terrorist attack on the Pentagon. Occupying 1.93 acres, the memorial will be 165 feet from where American Airlines Flight 77 hit the building.

After the groundbreaking, construction crews will begin removing underground utilities and work on the installation of a system that will supply water for reflecting pools beneath each of the 184 memorial benches.

Laychak said about $3.3 million has been spent for research and development on components and materials.

One challenge has been to come up with a mold for the memorial benches, which will be composed of one piece of super duplex stainless steel, the same material used in the reconstruction of the Statue of Liberty and in catapults on aircraft carriers because of its high resistance to corrosion.

"We have been continuing the prototyping process for the memorial unit, and that has been going very well," Beckman said. "We were back out at the foundry in St. Louis to see five more prototypes that they have been working on . . . to make sure that 184 of them can be made exactly the same."

About 80 paperbark maple trees will shade the memorial. "They were chosen because they have year-round interest," Beckman said. "They are late-turning maples. The leaves change color a little later than the rest of the maples. So when most of the trees in Arlington have lost their leaves, these will still be a brilliant red." She said the trees have cinnamon brown bark, which would contrast with a gray winter.

Kaseman and Beckman, now engaged, were young and unknown New York architects when their design won a competition that had more than 1,000 entries. They moved out of their closet-size studio apartment on the Upper West Side nearly three years ago to an apartment in Old Town Alexandria to work on the memorial.

"For Keith and I, it has been absolutely amazing to work on this with all the people who have been involved so far," Beckman said. "I know this place will help all of the people for whom the healing process is still going on."

Ground Zero (WSJ)

By Debra Burlingame

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

I am an ironworker. I held you in my hands.

I did not know who you were and now I am showered clean . . . yet I still feel dirty. I don't know why, but I feel ashamed. WHO WERE YOU?

-- Anonymous message, left at Ground Zero.

They came and would not leave, an army of ironworkers and heavy-equipment operators, stopping only when the scent-trained dogs barked out a signal. They cut and moved twisted steel and steaming concrete, clearing an astonishing 1.8 million tons in a continuous convoy of trucks and a 20,000-barge armada. The last steel beam, covered from top to bottom with handwritten prayers and messages of hope from those who worked the site, was hauled away in a solemn site-closing ceremony that left grown men weeping quietly. "The Pile" was cleared in eight-and-a-half months. Only then did they go home, different men. Who will tell their story?

The answer depends on whether we believe we have a stake in a future we will not live to see. Today, a handful of people are considering how the history of 9/11 will be preserved for future generations. Will it be scattered all over the globe, eroded by small museums, cannibalized by private collectors, or simply lost forever?

From the giant steel façades that broke but did not fall to the thousands of "Missing" flyers that speak of humanity as no granite monument can; from the harrowing digital footage to the oral histories that provide a mosaic of facts as detailed and compelling as a thousand handmade quilts; these are the pieces that make up our generation's "Day of Infamy." Preserving that history is both the mission and the moral imperative of the World Trade Center Memorial Museum -- if we build it.

The decision lies in one man's hands: New York Gov. George E. Pataki. It is that simple. Advisory councils, stakeholder meetings and a public comment period notwithstanding, if Gov. Pataki agrees with 87% of the respondents in last year's Zogby poll, stating that 9/11 was "the most historic event of their lifetime" that "changed the way Americans live and view the world," then he will step up and mark that history -- or answer to those same people. And he will have one tough time doing it. * * *

The American people, watching the horrific scenes in New York, Virginia and Pennsylvania, voiced nary a peep of dissent when the federal government handed over $21 billion in disaster relief -- $18 billion in rebuilding bonds and tax credits, and $2.8 billion in immediate cash grants -- to the state and city of New York. The desire to raise buildings and bring back neighborhoods and businesses far from their own communities is powerful proof of the generosity of a people whose hearts were broken but whose resolve was not.

The public has heard plenty about the "empty pit of Ground Zero," but most do not know that the $2.8 billion allocated to Lower Manhattan in cash grants has virtually all been spent. It is difficult to trace where all the money went while being routed through the Department of Housing and Urban Development and six different city and state entities. Now, after four-and-a-half years of press conferences, ribbon-cuttings and groundbreakings (the Freedom Tower has had two), at which the lost 343 firefighters were invoked and the memorial and museum was touted as the "centerpiece" around which hundreds of millions of dollars in spending projects would turn, Gov. Pataki and Mayor Michael Bloomberg have teamed up to tell the public that it's time to "rethink" the project where the history of those valiant firefighters will be secured. Not only does this undermine Daniel Libeskind's master plan, which always included a museum of "memory and hope," it also manifests a standard of fiscal responsibility that the governor and the mayor have refrained from imposing anywhere else at Ground Zero.

The Port Authority's massive new transportation hub, designed by superstar architect Santiago Calatrava, will cost an estimated $2.2 billion. Some $2 billion of that is federal money, which means that the entire country is supporting the "awe-inspiring" makeover of a terminal that will serve a mere 40,000 commuters (a number so embarrassing the Port Authority upped it to 80,000 by including round trips). The chief executive of a construction firm involved in the building illustrates the absurdity of what insiders call a "vanity project" by pointing out that $2.2 billion is enough to build a metropolitan airport.

The governor has also handed out hundreds of millions in relief money to corporate powerhouses, ostensibly to get them to relocate to Lower Manhattan or to prevent them from leaving. He signed off on $25 million worth of recovery funds for American Express, which expressly announced it hadn't intended to leave Lower Manhattan and posted doubled profits less than a year after 9/11. Goldman Sachs, which made $4.55 billion dollars in net profits in 2004, received a $2 billion "assistance" package consisting of triple-tax-free Liberty Bonds, tax credits and cash the following year.

Mr. Bloomberg talks about a "sensible" approach to Ground Zero rebuilding, but has declined to fully explain his allocation of $650 million dollars worth of Liberty Bonds to construct the Bank of America tower in midtown, an allocation that competes with downtown redevelopment; or why he awarded $114 million in Liberty Bonds to the Ratner office tower -- in Brooklyn.

The mayor has suggested locating the World Trade Center Museum in the controversial Freedom Tower, declaring it "a good use of that lobby." To put the story of that day in another commercial office tower is an insult to the memory of the 3,000 who died and to the thousands who barely escaped. Would the Holocaust Museum be treated as an afterthought and crammed into such a space? Moreover, why would any commercial tenant be attracted to a building that will be the destination of as many as 20,000 to 30,000 tourists per day?

The mayor's proposal was promptly embraced by New York's cultural elite -- the same folks who were despondent over the loss, last fall, of the International Freedom Center and its slavery exhibits. The New York Times editorial page went so far as to suggest that the 9/11 museum is not really necessary since "most of us remember that day very clearly." The same paper, in contrast, published six hyperventilating editorials last year, telling us that the Freedom Center must be built on sacred ground to provide the memorial with "historical context," albeit one that didn't include a word about terrorism.

Interestingly, the no-museum proponents have uniformly invoked the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington as an example of a simple and appropriate remembrance. While it eventually became accepted as a locus of healing, "The Wall" was controversial when it opened in 1982 in no small part because of its failure to tell the story of the war. Jan Scruggs, founder of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Foundation, recognizes that when the contemporaries of that war are gone, the 58,000 names carved in granite will not resonate with future generations. To remedy this, he sought and won congressional approval to build a museum that will tell the story of the war and those who fought it.

Ironically, the designer of the Vietnam memorial, Maya Lin, was a member of the World Trade Center Memorial jury and the most vocal advocate of the design that was eventually chosen, Michael Arad's "Reflecting Absence." Like Ms. Lin's Wall, Mr. Arad's design, consisting of reflecting pools and waterfalls with a random listing of 3,000 victims' names, says nothing about how they died or the historic event it is memorializing. Without the museum there will be nothing on the plaza, not even the iconic artifacts, to tell future visitors what actually happened on 9/11.

But let us not get too carried away with comparisons to other memorials. The Vietnam War did not take place on that grassy mall in Washington. Ground Zero is an historic battleground; and of the 2,755 who died there, 1,157 were vaporized without a trace.

The American people intuitively understand what the New York intelligentsia does not. They already stream to Ground Zero in the tens of thousands, signing up for tours to stand and look at the iron fence of St. Paul's Church across the street, now stripped of the faded flags, the personal tokens of remembrance and the hand-lettered messages of sympathy that poured in from all over the world. They shell out countless thousands of dollars for picture books and postcards bearing the images of the twin towers from the ragtag vendors who line the site's perimeter.

It is this humble assortment of Ground Zero entrepreneurs who have shown City Hall's economic development experts that it is possible to blend commerce and commemoration. And the Memorial Museum will help restore a standard of dignity, which will be more about providing a lasting remembrance than making a quick buck. * * *

Yes, the $500 million price tag for the memorial and museum is steep, but the reality is that it was the terrorists who chose the most expensive building site in all the world for the location of their attack. That is where our people died and that is where we must build it -- especially as the cost of not doing so is even higher.

This is an investment in the future that will allow visitors from all over the world the opportunity to see the contrast between those who died to take the lives of strangers, and those who gave their lives to save them. The millions who will make a pilgrimage to Ground Zero will surely enjoy the fine boulevards and piers that their own generosity provided, but the experience they most anticipate is not a frozen latte in Hudson River Park. They want to confront the reality of the day that changed their lives, and the world they once knew.

The World Trade Center Memorial and Museum will commemorate, educate and inspire. It will convey to future generations that we as a people are more than sleek neighborhoods and buildings. That is something our enemies did not understand and should be reflected in everything we do on that much-hallowed ground.

Governor, we're ready.

Ms. Burlingame, a director of the World Trade Center Memorial Foundation, is the sister of Charles F. "Chic" Burlingame III, the pilot of AA flight 77, which was crashed into the Pentagon on Sept. 11, 2001.

Hurricane Mary Still Storms Over Katrina (HILL)

DOJ_NMG_0031776

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, June 6, 2006

In the nine months since Hurricane Katrina bore a hole through the Gulf Coast and triggered cataclysmic flooding in New Orleans, Sen. Mary Landrieu has been battling for more than just cash to rebuild.

"I'm still in a fight to explain," the Louisiana Democrat said during an interview in her seventh-floor Hart Building office suite.

In endless meetings with lawmakers, aides, interest groups and even singer Placido Domingo, she uses color-coded charts, sweeping gestures and Cajun charm to explain the difference between the hurricane and the flood, the biblical-scale damage to her home city, coastal restoration plans, why New Orleans should be rebuilt and why further assistance should not be routed through the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"It's important for people to understand what really happened, who is responsible, why it happened, so that we can actually fix it," she said.

For Landrieu, villains are easy to identify: President Bush and top White House officials, the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) and House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). Early on, Hastert suggested New Orleans should not be rebuilt.

"That kind of set us off in a defensive posture when we should have been in an offensive posture," Landrieu said.

Since then, the 50-year-old senator has been the one taking swings. Last year she said on national television that she would punch the president or anyone else who berated local officials. In April, she threatened to hold up Bush's executive-branch nominees until he delivered funding for the Gulf Coast.

But her pugnacity has not stopped her from forming alliances. In March she became the first Democrat in either chamber to support a Republican-written budget since 2004 after securing a promise for more levee money.

Landrieu, now in her second term, met with Senate Republican bulls Ted Stevens (Alaska) and Pete Domenici (N.M.) in the office of Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) to hammer out a deal for her vote.

She says top Senate appropriators Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) and Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) have come to Louisiana's rescue. She also notes the names of senators who dispatched aides to help her staff in Katrina's aftermath, and she singles out Education Secretary Margaret Spellings and Housing Secretary Alphonso Jackson for praise.

'AROUND THE WHITE HOUSE'

Landrieu has not let up a bit in her condemnations of the White House, but she is careful to draw a distinction between the president's inner circle and other parts of the administration, where she has found some of her staunchest allies.

"I just sort of went around the White House and just went directly to their Cabinet people, and some of the Cabinet people really understand what happened and they're really trying to help," Landrieu said. "Margaret Spellings was one of the first to grasp it."

Landrieu and Spellings have found common ground in their support for charter schools, facilitating a strong alliance. Spellings did "everything she could" to put kids in classrooms, a Landrieu aide said.

But other agencies remain in Landrieu's crosshairs, particularly FEMA, which she says should not be the vehicle for federal assistance because it is "dysfunctional."

Landrieu is among those who argue that aid should move directly through other departments and agencies — the Education Department, Housing and Urban Development, the Commerce Department and the Small Business Administration, to name a few — rather than FEMA, which has become a symbol of the federal government's difficulties in handling the problems of the Gulf Coast region.

"They kept thinking FEMA could do it, FEMA could do it," Landrieu said. "But even on FEMA's best day they couldn't have done it, and FEMA didn't have too many good days."

A SINGULAR FOCUS

Landrieu has other responsibilities in the Senate; she is the ranking Democrat on the District of Columbia Appropriations Subcommittee and a member of the bipartisan Gang of 14 that has played a decisive role in the judicial confirmation process, and her brother just lost a hotly contested Democratic mayoral primary.

But the names of the hurricanes, Katrina and Rita, are seldom far from her lips.

When Placido Domingo visited Landrieu to discuss money for the arts, the opera star instead got a lesson on Louisiana's infrastructure.

"We had spent 30 minutes with this guy, and we had not talked about arts funding," a Landrieu aide said.

The next day, with the Senate out of session, Landrieu and Democratic Policy Committee Chairman Byron Dorgan (N.D.) spent more than an hour interviewing local business owners at a poorly attended hearing titled "An Oversight Hearing on Gulf Coast Reconstruction: Has the Federal Government Left Small Businesses Behind?"

Republican and Democratic aides say Landrieu has been somewhat less involved with issues unrelated to the hurricanes since they hit.

NO APOLOGIES

"If one person criticizes them or says one more thing, including the president of the United States, he will hear from me," Landrieu told ABC's George Stehanopoulos in September. "One more word about it after this show airs and I might likely have to punch him. Literally."

Landrieu maintains that radio talk-show host Rush Limbaugh and others took her line about punching the president out of context, but she says she stands by it.

"I don't regret it at all, and I'd say it again exactly that way," she said. "As a leader, I think you should defend your people, not gloss over their faults. But I'm not going to let anybody talk about the first responders of New Orleans."

The most recent twist in Louisiana's battle for federal aid is a threat by Gov. Kathleen Blanco to delay drilling leases if the federal government does not give the Pelican State a share of the revenue.

Landrieu, who has said she will block energy legislation that does not include a share of federal receipts for Louisiana, supports Blanco's approach but would prefer a legislative fix, according to spokesman Adam Sharp.

"The entire state leadership supports getting our fair share, and each of us does what is within our ability to drive that result," Sharp said in an e-mail.

Clamoring To Come Home To New Orleans Projects (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

NEW ORLEANS, June 5 — Hundreds of displaced residents of public housing have for several days been returning here for the first time since Hurricane Katrina.

They are armed with little more than cleaning supplies and frustration, in an effort to force the city to reopen their storm-damaged apartments.

The city, saying the projects are not ready, has refused.

Outside the largest complex, the St. Bernard Housing Development in the Seventh Ward, tenant groups have organized evacuees into a tent city called Survivors Village. At the C. J. Peete Development in Central City, older residents, mostly women, broke into their old apartments and carted away plastic bags of refuse and ruined furniture.

At the Florida housing complex in the Ninth Ward, residents slipped through fences topped with razor wire to reach their old units. They piled up heaps of debris that lined Bartholomew Street in the shadow of Interstate 10.

In bone-baking heat under a cloudless sky, evacuees traveling from Atlanta, Baton Rouge, Houston and elsewhere fumed at the city and federal housing officials who have opened fewer than 1,000 of more than 8,000 public housing units in a city suffering from a housing crisis and a shortage of workers.

The residents promised on Sunday to gut and rebuild their own units, and they said they planned to be back permanently — with or without the city's permission — as soon as their work was done.

"They're not giving us any help, and we're tired of waiting," a resident, Nickole Banks, said of the Housing Authority. "People want to come home."

Damage to the projects ranged from very little to severe. The Housing Authority says that as many as 90 percent of the apartments are unsafe and uninhabitable and that time-consuming environmental evaluations remain unfinished. To the residents, these are excuses. They fear that city officials are really trying to redevelop the projects to bring in other residents with more money.

That is a move that some city and federal officials say would be desirable. Private developers have openly discussed the possibility of rebuilding some projects to house a much wider range of tenants.

Because private homeowners are being encouraged to return to the same areas, the public housing question has become part of a larger debate about the future of the city's poor population. Does New Orleans intend to make itself a home for them again?

After the storm, many of the most important institutions and services for the poor broke down and were never repaired. Charity Hospital, a historic institution for the poor, remains closed.

The public defender system has been unable to provide lawyers to poor defendants, and public transportation is essentially broke and is providing far fewer rides.

"They're trying to steal New Orleans from us," Phyllis Jenkins, who has been living in Fort Worth, said Sunday outside what used to be her home in the sprawling St. Bernard development. "Well, I will not be displaced anymore. I'll take my home any way they give it to me. It's been 10 months. They've got to know we're serious. We're going to stand here until they let us in our homes."

Local officials have been clear that they do not want to return to the way things were before the storm, when 10 traditional public housing developments concentrated low-income residents in some of the worst conditions in the city, leading to intense crime and drug use.

"We don't need to recreate pockets of poverty," the president of the City Council, Oliver M. Thomas Jr., said. "They don't work. We want more mixed-income, working communities. I think that's really the only way."

Some officials have made remarkably unveiled comments suggesting that the storm did the city a favor in terms sweeping away the poor.

Representative Richard H. Baker, a Republican from Baton Rouge, said just after the hurricane: "We finally cleaned up public housing in New Orleans. We couldn't do it. But God did."

A spokesman for the Housing Authority, Adonis Exposé, said the authority was encouraging private and public partnerships to redevelop the projects, a move that began in limited form before the hurricane.

"We find it has worked out, and we're looking into doing it at a lot of other sites," Mr. Exposé said.

Before the storm, 2,000 public housing units had been demolished to make way for newer, better complexes. That stoked fears among residents of public housing that they were being scattered to nowhere in particular.

That turned out to be the case in the redevelopment of the St. Thomas Project, the largest and most controversial to date. It is now a mixed-income development called River Garden, with a small fraction of the original public housing tenants.

Residents who have been protesting fear more of the same could be in store for them. Some of the poor and their advocates see the lack of action as a delay tactic to diminish the chances that many would return.

The Federal Department of Housing and Urban Development, which took control of the bankrupt local housing authority years ago, says it is continuing to assess the storm damage to the buildings.

"I wish I could say everything's great, come on home," an assistant secretary, Orlando J. Cabrera, said in an interview. "But it's not great. We've got entire parts of the city that have very few services, that have questionable ability in terms of infrastructure. We have to ask the hard question: 'What would these folks do? Can we put people in there?' "

Mr. Cabrera said considerable federal money was available to allow private builders to redevelop public housing in such situations. The Housing Authority has begun to apply for those funds.

Developers have been seeking permission to rebuild the crown jewel of the projects, the Iberville Housing Development, on a coveted location next to the French Quarter. It is a gem of Depression-era buildings, a sturdy assemblage of small-scale town houses with wrought-iron balconies that overlook courtyards and oak trees. The project, barely damaged by the hurricane, continues to house hundreds of families.

Michael Valentino, the managing partner of a hotel group here, and some tenants have proposed knocking down walls to make the apartments bigger, adding public art and fountains, and bringing in some tenants who would pay market-rate rent.

So far, no deal has been made.

"The magic of Iberville is that the architecture is magnificent; it could be beautiful and vibrant again," Mr. Valentino said about the development, which replaced the Storyville red-light district in an early example of slum clearance. "It's a linchpin piece of the redevelopment of Canal Street and the Quarter."

Mr. Valentino and other developers have the support of some tenants like Kim Paul, president of the residents' council. But they have also drawn the ire of another group, Hands Off Iberville, made up of housing advocates and tenants.

Even though she wants to help remake Iberville into something it never was, Ms. Paul complained about how slowly housing officials were letting residents return to the development, the least damaged in the city. She is in the unusual position of standing up for tenants and developers at the same time.

"I can show you that the apartments don't have mold or mildew," she said Sunday as she joined the other protesters at St. Bernard who were eating jambalaya out of plastic cups. "Before we do anything, we're trying to get all the pre-Katrina residents home."

Passers-by on St. Bernard Avenue, a main thoroughfare, generally supported the peaceful protest outside the fenced-in project. A woman from the Uptown section, Cliffie Pettigrew, stopped her truck and said, "I don't know if you folks are supposed to be here or not, but I want to help because I remember how sad I was when I couldn't get home."

"What ya'll need?" she asked.

"Everything," they answered.

Hurricane Season Brings Urgency To Fixing FEMA (HILL)

By Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.)

The Hill (opinion), June 6, 2006

When Max Mayfield of the National Hurricane Center talks, the people in my district listen.

Mayfield has predicted another volatile year, with this hurricane season delivering up to eight to 10 hurricanes, according to the latest predictions of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

While we prepare for the season, which began Wednesday, structural problems remain that plague the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), the federal agency that delivers aid in the wake of a hurricane and ensures localities are prepared with disaster plans.

There is no doubt in my mind that FEMA's response to the storms of the past two years was hampered greatly — and will continue to be hampered for the coming hurricane season — by the top-heavy government bureaucracy of the Department of Homeland Security.

FEMA does some of its most important work during the initial hours before a storm, when first responders prepare, federal authorities are placed at the ready and residents are given instructions. While local and state governments are the first line of response, much of the planning and work is done by FEMA, which is charged with coordinating federal efforts while complementing the local response. In fact, in years past,

FEMA's role was considered important enough to make its director, until recently, a Cabinet-level position.

But as the federal government reacted to Sept. 11 and viewed most federal services through the prism of terrorism, placing FEMA within the security clearinghouse of the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) seemed to be the right move. Unfortunately, Katrina, Wilma, Frances, Rita, Jeanne, Ivan and Charley have proved that wrong.

By folding FEMA into DHS, we have, in effect, tried fitting a square into a circle. FEMA is charged with responding to natural disasters and emergency situations, while its overseers are more focused, and rightly so, on terrorism.

By placing FEMA in the labyrinth of government agencies housed in DHS, we have put FEMA's priorities in direct competition for attention with our efforts to protect our cities from al Qaeda and to protect our borders. In the process, decisions that once were made quickly and efficiently at FEMA now have to go through a web of paperwork, authorizations and releases before they can be made — adding further risk to people who wait for relief.

We also have diminished FEMA's ability to act autonomously and take charge of a disaster. By making the agency just another department in a huge bureaucracy, we have neutered its ability to take the reins of federal response and handed them off to undersecretaries and assistant secretaries of the Department of Homeland Security.

From our own experience in Florida, we know the importance of strong leadership in dealing with hurricanes. Before and after Hurricanes Charley, Frances, Ivan and Jeanne hit Florida two years ago, Gov. Jeb Bush was in constant contact with local authorities and was swift in his decisionmaking. Law enforcement and first responders were kept informed and knew their roles.

Unfortunately, there was no Jeb Bush in Louisiana, and there were no Rudy Giulianis in New Orleans.

Instead, the buck was passed from local to state and then to federal authorities, many times with the assumption that FEMA had the experience to know what to do. But the sluggish bureaucracy at DHS produced no leaders and left people across the country to wonder who was in charge.

Last year I introduced legislation to sever FEMA from the DHS bureaucracy, returning it to an independent agency. My goal is to allow FEMA to break free from the Washington-style adherence to paperwork and memos in order to make it the nimble, quick-response team that it wants to be.

Saddled with the bureaucracy of DHS, FEMA's priorities have gotten lost, and we need to place them back at the forefront. I have been encouraged by the support of the idea by Subcommittee Chairman Bill Shuster (R-Pa.), and I have been working to convince others of its merit.

I first called for this before 2004's hurricane season wreaked havoc on our state, but nearly two years of recovery efforts that have been delayed and a frustrating effort to find accountability at FEMA — culminating with its slowed response to Katrina — made me realize we cannot wait.

Unfortunately, I fear these frustrations will only grow for the people of the Gulf Coast area making the transition into the long-term recovery process as the tasks of FEMA remain a source of competing interests within DHS.

Blame for the slow response to Katrina does not rest solely at one level of government. Local officials failed. State officials, especially the governor, failed. The federal government failed. In Congress, we must take these lessons to heart and recognize that change has to happen — and we have to make it happen now, not later.

A Foxx In The Luxury World (HILL)

By Jeff Dufour

The Hill, June 6, 2006

One of the most egregious examples of abuse that came to light last year during the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina was displaced people and other victims spending their government-issued debit cards on Louis Vuitton purses and other luxury goods.

And Rep. Virginia Foxx, the grandmotherly freshman Republican from North Carolina, has had enough. Foxx has introduced an amendment, known as the "Louis Vuitton Amendment," to the homeland-security appropriations bill that would specifically restrict that type of misuse of funds.

It reads, quite simply, "None of the funds made available to the Federal Emergency Management Agency in this act may be used to purchase a Louis Vuitton handbag."

Foxx spokeswoman Amy Auth explained that the language is designed to "highlight the abuse that occurred with the debit cards last year so that it doesn't happen again."

A spokeswoman for Louis Vuitton did not return phone calls. Perhaps she's offended that anyone would pay for one of their bags with a debit card. How déclassé!

Image of Bob Casey as Kevin Smith persists

The National Republican Senatorial Committee last week went after Pennsylvania Senate candidate Bob Casey (D) for failing to appear at the annual convention of a group of activist gay Democrats in Pittsburgh.

Howard Dean, Democratic Party chairman, appeared at the Stonewall National Convention on Saturday.

"As the Senate prepares to vote on the Federal Marriage Amendment, Silent Bob is ducking an appearance before a gay-rights group," NRSC spokesman Dan Ronayne said in a statement. "The fact that Casey Jr. is having Howard Dean stand in for him speaks volumes about his political courage. When given a chance to stand up for something, Casey Jr. comes up empty again."

It's by no means the first time that Republicans have tagged Casey, who's challenging Sen. Rick Santorum (R), with the "Silent Bob" moniker, reminiscent of the recurring character Kevin Smith plays in his films.

The name began to stick during the confirmation hearings for Justice Samuel Alito, when Republicans pressed Casey to say whether he supported the judge.

After Casey won the Democratic primary, even NRSC Chairwoman Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.) got in on the act, saying, "Now that the general election is under way, maybe it's time for 'Silent Bob' to articulate his positions."

Casey spokesman Larry Smar said the nickname is childish.

"Santorum's allies are resorting to childish name calling because they have no accomplishments to talk about and rather focus on divisive issues."

Obama turns tables on Colbert

After Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) gave the keynote address at the 2004 Democratic National Convention and won election to the Senate, he was asked to give the next year's commencement address at tiny Knox College in Galesburg, Ill.

This year the college invited Comedy Central's mock newsman Stephen Colbert. So Obama decided to have a little bit of fun with him.

In a statement released late last week, Obama told Colbert, "I'd like to welcome you to our state. As you know, I was invited to speak at Knox after my keynote address at the 2004 Democratic National Convention and subsequent election to the United States Senate. Your convention speech must also have gone really well to have been invited. It's weird that I didn't read about it somewhere.

"Before you deliver your remarks in front of literally millions fewer people than you would at say, a nationally televised political convention, I'd like to offer you a few words of advice. First, I know you're fond of your Peabody Awards, whatever those are, but I'd recommend not bringing them. The students at Knox are down to earth and not impressed by material possessions like my Grammy Award for best spoken-word album."

At the close of the release, Obama's staff assures readers that it was intended "completely tongue-in-cheek. … Colbert has had so much fun with members of Congress on his show that we decided it was our turn."

By most accounts, Colbert's speech went over well. His advice for graduates? Get a TV show. "It pays well," he said. "The hours are great, and you have fans. Eventually, some nice people will give you an honorary degree for doing jack squat."

Colbert also used his speech to come out against slavery. "I just hope the mainstream media gives me credit for the stand I've taken today," he said.

Beer, wine take center stage tonight

It's going to be a boozy night on the House floor, with two resolutions celebrating the nectar of the gods.

First, Rep. Sherwood Boehlert (R-N.Y.) brings forth a resolution commending American craft brewers.

A bit late for American Craft Beer Week, which ended May 21, the bill nevertheless recognizes that "American craft brewers promote the nation's spirit of independence through a renaissance in hand-crafted beers … for the enjoyment of the citizenry." Indeed.

Boehlert represents the Matt Brewing Co. in Utica, N.Y., which brews Saranac beers.

Then it's on to H. Con. Res. 399 by Rep. Mike Thompson (D-Calif.) recognizing the 30th anniversary of the victory of United States winemakers at the 1976 Paris wine tasting. That event, known as the "Tasting Heard Round the World," put American wine on the map, as California red and white wines bested the best French wines in a blind test by wine experts.

It should be noted that the anniversary tastings, held in Napa Valley and France on May 24, yielded the same result. So take that, Monsieur Chirac.

Coble wakes up to 'Idol'-atry

In surely the most controversial elimination of the season, Chris Daughtry of McLeansville, N.C., was voted off "American Idol" in the third-to-last round. Now his congressman, Rep. Howard Coble (R-N.C.), apparently goaded by his staff and constituents, is finally crying foul over the results.

"Most people know that my musical tastes run more towards bluegrass," said Coble, "but we were proud of Chris for finishing so strong on 'American Idol.' I was told by many people, including some of my own staff, that he should have won the doggone thing."

Late last month, Coble placed a statement in the Congressional Record in which he argued that "with no disrespect intended toward this year's winner, Taylor Hicks, most people think this year's American Idol should have been Chris Daughtry. … While I will not call for Congress to investigate this Idol election process, those of us who reside in the 6th District of North Carolina will always be convinced that our guy really won — sort of like fans of Al Gore in 2000."

Then this past Saturday, at a rally and mini-performance before 1,200 supporters Daughtry received a copy of the statement.

Coble isn't a total "Idol" neophyte — he noted that Fantasia Barrino, the winner of the show's third season, is also a native of the 6th District of North Carolina.

Daughtry recently turned down an offer to become lead singer of the band Fuel.

Issa: No love lost for Gonzalez

"We have the power to impeach the attorney general," Rep. Darrell Issa (R-Calif.) said last week as the House Judiciary Committee held a hearing on the FBI's search of Rep. William Jefferson's (D-La.) Rayburn office.

A member of Congress musing on the impeachment of a Cabinet member of his own party would be inflammatory enough, but Issa wasn't done.

When asked by a radio reporter for Capitol News Connection what he made of Alberto Gonzales's threat to resign over the Jefferson imbroglio, Issa was nothing if not direct. "Don't let the door hit you in the ass," he said.

Hard Lesson Learned At Red Cross (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, June 6, 2006

PRENTISS, Miss. — In the torrid temperatures that mark the start of the steamy Mississippi summer, the biggest safety threat to the parched landscape of Jefferson Davis County at the moment is fire.

But on a recent morning under a cloudless blue sky, several dozen people gather to hear Charlie Conerly, the county emergency management coordinator, talk about hurricanes and how this county needs the Red Cross to help it prepare for a new season of storms.

"Were any of you ready when Katrina came?" Conerly asks the room in general. No hands go up. "That's what I thought," he says. "That's why we're here."

The efforts in Prentiss to be better prepared as hurricane season gets underway present a telling microcosm of lessons learned by the national Red Cross after its much-criticized performance in the onslaught of Hurricane Katrina last year.

The charity was stung by complaints, including in a congressional report, of supply shortages, poorly run shelters, inadequate phone and computer systems and a lack of outreach to rural areas. But interim President and CEO Jack McGuire says the American Red Cross now has far-reaching reforms in place.

McGuire says the Red Cross will have more resources, a streamlined process to get aid to victims, a vastly expanded communications network and a new effort to reach out to Prentiss and communities like it. Prentiss has no Red Cross chapter and waited days for help when hundreds of evacuees arrived after Katrina.

He acknowledges that the response to Katrina sullied the image of the Red Cross. "Our surveys indicate that our image is not as good as we were before Katrina and not as bad as we were in January," McGuire says.

"We would prefer to be back to where we were pre-Katrina, but we have to earn that. We'll earn that by showing what happens in the next hurricane season."

At the South Central Mississippi Red Cross chapter, which is headquartered in nearby Hattiesburg, Executive Director Janice Vannatta is working long hours to translate McGuire's rhetoric into results.

A “spontaneous volunteer” during Katrina who has since been hired to run the chapter, Vannatta attended the preparations meeting in Prentiss and hopes to have at least two Red Cross shelters ready in coming weeks. Prentiss had no shelters when Katrina hit.

During Katrina, conditions in Prentiss “were horrible,” says Spencena Hinton, the new Red Cross liaison with county and city officials in Prentiss. Hinton says Jefferson Davis County was swarming with evacuees from the Gulf Coast while it tried to deal with serious damage from the storm.

Charles Reid, president of the county Board of Supervisors, says a common complaint was that once the Red Cross got teams to the county, its aid programs had few controls.

Vannatta, whose staff of five covers nine counties, listens to the complaints while keeping a nervous eye on the calendar.

As hurricane season begins, 40,000 Federal Emergency Management Agency trailers remain on the Mississippi Gulf Coast. Vannatta's fear: Even a mild storm will force people living in those trailers to evacuate. And key roads north from Mobile, Ala., New Orleans and the Mississippi Gulf coast all lead straight through Hattiesburg.

Some of Vannatta's efforts to be ready for this storm season:

She's also following Washington's lead in trying to partner with churches, schools and community organizations to open shelters that can give residents of poorer and more remote areas faster help.

•Pre-positioned supplies. The South Central Mississippi chapter gave out 553,000 snacks or meals last year. Vannatta is lining up vendors to get more supplies earlier.

•Communications. The chapter plans to use handheld radios so shelters can communicate with one another and headquarters. Virtually all communication was cut off during Katrina.

•Volunteers. The chapter has more than doubled its volunteer base since Katrina. More than 100 volunteers were trained in a single event on April 1.

•Preparations. Vannatta has sent basic information home with schoolchildren to emphasize the message that residents need to be ready to survive on their own for 72 hours after any disaster.

And there's a special outreach program to the thousands of new Hispanic residents in Hattiesburg — most of them storm-repair workers — says the Rev. Tommy Conway of St. Thomas Catholic Church.

For the first time, hurricane warnings on local TV will be in both English and Spanish, Conway says.

In Prentiss, Conerly and Vannatta promise residents that as hurricane season begins, this year things will be better.

“We're going to make this easier than it was last time,” Conerly says. “But it's not going to be perfect. We're human beings.”

GAO Urges Better Tsunami Warnings (WP)

By Matthew Daly

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

The federal and state governments need to improve warning systems before a deadly tsunami strikes the West Coast, a new study says.

Modern technology is able to detect the formation of a tsunami fairly quickly, but the United States lacks a robust warning system and detailed knowledge on the impact a tidal wave could have on coastal areas, the Government Accountability Office says.

In a report issued yesterday, the GAO, the investigative arm of Congress, warns that false alarms may have lulled West Coast residents into an inaccurate sense of security. Sixteen tsunami warnings issued since 1982 were not followed by destructive waves on U.S. shores, the report says, "potentially causing citizens to ignore future warnings."

The report urges that the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration develop "loss estimation" software for tsunamis similar to those available for hurricanes or floods so officials can predict how severe a potential storm would be.

The stakes are high, the report notes. While the United States has not been hit by a severe tsunami in more than four decades, experts say a destructive Pacific-wide tsunami is all but inevitable.

DOJ_NMG_0031784

The report was issued 18 months after the 2004 South Asian tsunami, which killed more than 216,000 people in 17 countries. Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who requested the report, said it indicates that California and other states are at risk of a catastrophic tsunami, "and we are ill-equipped to deal with the threat."

The United States needs a warning system that can protect its most vulnerable communities, as well as software to determine where a tsunami is most likely to hit and do the most damage, Feinstein said.

"We've seen the danger. Now is the time to respond," she said.

Rep. David Wu (D-Ore.) said the GAO report confirms his belief that programs focused on local warning systems and educating the public are key to protecting against a tsunami.

"We cannot prevent earthquakes and tsunamis, but we can prepare for them and ensure the citizens of our coastal communities are safe and secure," Wu said.

"After witnessing the devastation following the Indonesian tsunami, there is no excuse for the federal government to be this far behind on coastal preparedness and making sure Americans have enough time to get to safety," Sen. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) said. She called for the House to approve a Senate-backed bill aimed at improving tsunami detection and warning systems, providing tsunami preparedness tools, and developing "inundation maps" for affected areas.

Congress appropriated more than $17.2 million last year to enhance tsunami warnings and protection, including repair of malfunctioning tsunami-detection buoys.

GAO Deems U.S. Unprepared For Tsunami Disaster (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

Tsunami warning systems for West Coast states are ineffective and several local agencies are not prepared for such a disaster, the Government Accountability Office said in a report released yesterday.

Although the National Weather Service issues timely warnings, alert systems cannot transmit to some coastal areas, the report said.

"This shortcoming was highlighted in June 2005, when an actual tsunami warning for the west coast was issued but signal problems prevented the warning from reaching portions of the coasts of Washington and Oregon," the report said.

In addition, the report said, all 16 warnings issued since 1982 have been false, which has created an apathetic public.

Parts of Northern California, Washington, Oregon, Alaska, Hawaii and the territories of the U.S. Virgin Islands and Puerto Rico "face the greatest tsunami hazard," while the Gulf Coast is "relatively low-hazard," the report said.

The GAO recommends updated maps and more community participation in the National Weather Service's TsunamiReady program. Participation is low "because of community perceptions of a low tsunami threat and perceived high cost versus benefit."

The Indian Ocean tsunami of December 2004 killed nearly 250,000 people in 13 countries. The disaster raised concerns about U.S. vulnerability and the ability of communities to detect and warn of an approaching killer wave.

The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA), which oversees the National Weather Service, has agreed to GAO recommendations such as reducing the number of false alarms, periodic testing of the warning system, encouraging high-risk communities to participate in TsunamiReady, and developing mapping software with the Federal Emergency Management Agency and other government organizations.

Homeland Security Department officials, however, say FEMA does not have the "funding or the staff resources" to assist NOAA.

The West Coast has suffered the most destruction from tsunamis because of Pacific earthquakes in the South America and Aleutian regions. In 1960, an earthquake in Chile generated a tsunami that caused more than $1 million in damage in California. A 1964 earthquake in Alaska created a tsunami that killed 12 in the San Francisco Bay area and caused $15 million in destruction. Within two minutes of that earthquake, more than 100 Alaskans were killed.

Distant earthquakes have created tsunamis that have hit Oregon and Washington, but it is the 750-mile-long Cascadia subduction zone 50 to 100 miles off the coast of these states that has scientists worried.

"Geologic and other records from a Cascadia earthquake in 1700 suggest that the fault could generate a tsunami wave of up to 30 feet that would likely reach the Oregon coast in 15 to 30 minutes, raising concerns of a catastrophic future event," the report said.

WAR NEWS:

U.S. Commander To Review Haditha Report (AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer

AP, June 5, 2006

The No. 2 American general in Iraq will soon review a preliminary criminal report into the alleged massacre by Marines of Iraqi citizens in Haditha, a congressman just back from Iraq said Monday.

Rep. John Kline (news, bio, voting record), R-Minn., one of four House members who traveled to Iraq over the weekend, said the lawmakers discussed the investigations with Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the second-ranking U.S. general in Iraq. Kline said it was unclear when the report would be released.

"General Chiarelli expressed some concern in that he did not want to sign off an investigation until he felt like he had all of the information that he needed" from the Naval Criminal Investigative Service, said Kline, a former Marine. The investigative service is probing whether crimes were committed in the killing of two dozen Iraqis last November.

A senior defense official told the Associated Press last month that evidence points to unprovoked killings by the Marines involved. A separate probe is examining whether there has been a coverup of the incident by the U.S. military.

The four House members who visited Iraq took issue with comments made by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who complained that coalition forces have shown "no respect for citizens, smashing civilian cars and killing on a suspicion or a hunch."

"The prime minister has a platform and a pulpit now that he may not have had in the past," said Rep. Mike Conaway, R-Texas. Conaway said with that platform comes "responsibility to be very careful and to choose your words very carefully."

Kline said his group was told that U.S. military officials and embassy staff had told al-Maliki that his comments were not helpful.

Kline also said Iraqi generals told the U.S. lawmakers that they were frustrated about the slow pace in filling the new Iraqi government's security posts, saying it was hindering the training of the Iraqi military.

"The generals were very candid with us," he said. "There's no question that they understand that until you get a functioning ministry of defense, until you get a functioning Pentagon — Iraqi Pentagon — they're not going to be able to reach their full potential."

On Sunday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice expressed confidence that Iraqi leaders will be able to fill key security posts in the next few days while downplaying recent sectarian violence.

Rice, who appeared on three television news shows, said of the vacant security posts, "Of course, they need to get this settled, but they will get it settled. When they get it right, and they will get it right, everybody will forget how long it took them."

An Iraqi parliament session was postponed earlier Sunday after al-Maliki again failed to reach consensus on candidates to head ministries that run Iraq's military and police.

Also Sunday, the top U.S. military officer pledged a thorough investigation in the alleged massacre at Haditha, acknowledging that the charges have raised concerns among Iraqi officials and in the United States.

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said it is not clear exactly what happened last November when as many as two dozen Iraqis were killed during a U.S. attack in Haditha. Still, he said it was important not to rush to judgment.

"You don't want to have the emotions of the day weigh into the process," Pace told The Associated Press in an interview Sunday. "We need to stick with our judicial process. We want to be sure that it moves forward without any influence."

Rice appeared on "Fox News Sunday," CBS's "Face the Nation" and CNN's "Late Edition."

For U.S. Troops, It's Hard To Know Who Is Friend And Who Is Foe (KRT)

DOJ_NMG_0031786

By Tom Lasseter

Knight Ridder, June 5, 2006

MUSAYYIB, Iraq - Air Force Staff Sgt. Justin Cremer listened carefully as Army Capt. Irvin Oliver described the upcoming mission. They'd raid a compound of houses the next morning; a map was sketched on the ground in chalk lines of yellow, blue and white.

Oliver looked at the soldiers bunched around him and reminded them that aerial photographs had showed at least 17 people in the compound the night before, and that they were looking for just one - an insurgent cell leader suspected of orchestrating roadside bombs that'd killed American soldiers.

Be careful, Oliver told his men, not to get shot. And be careful, the company commander said, not to shoot any unarmed civilians.

Despite those warnings, last Thursday's mission would serve as a reminder that counterinsurgency is among the most complex forms of warfare, and sometimes the wrong people are killed.

While outrage gathers over the reported killings of 24 civilians by U.S. Marines in the western Iraqi town of Haditha, U.S. military units such as Oliver's Delta Company quietly go about the daily task of patrolling a very complicated battlefield.

As part of the 2nd Brigade Combat Team of the U.S. Army's 4th Infantry Division, Oliver's soldiers are responsible for an area south of Baghdad where there are Sunni Muslim insurgents who kill U.S. soldiers, Shiite militiamen who kill Sunni families, Sunni insurgents who kill Shiite Muslim families, and an assortment of smugglers and criminals.

Most Iraqis are caught in between, just trying to make it to the next day.

Cremer's job on this mission was to make sure that Oliver, 31, from Sierra Vista, Ariz., and his men had the clearest possible picture of the line between friend and foe. He is, in military jargon, a Joint Terminal Attack controller - the front line of the U.S. Air Force. Cremer (pronounce CRAY-mer) rides into missions with Army soldiers and, by watching real-time video streamed down from F-15 and F-16 fighter jets, looks for insurgents on the run and signs of civilians caught in the crossfire.

The 29-year-old from Modesto, Calif., can call for a barrage of 500-pound bombs, and he can call for illumination rockets to be sure innocents aren't killed.

It's often a gray line, said Staff Sgt. Francis Lott, who works with Cremer.

"They (the jets) look for anything suspicious, but everything's suspicious around here," said Lott, 25, of Clarkesville, Tenn. "It's a big game of hide and seek. You're fighting people where you can't tell who's who. You can't tell the good guys from the bad guys in Iraq."

The convoy rolled out of its forward operating base just after 1 a.m., a line of tanks, Bradley Fighting Vehicles and Humvees.

As the tires and tracks crunched across the ground, dirt flew in the night air, making it hard, for a moment, to see the headlights. The air was cooler than the afternoon had been - around 110 degrees - but it was still hot.

Cremer was talking with a pair of F-16 pilots and a surveillance plane higher up. He cradled a receiver in each ear, going over the final details of the mission.

As they got closer to Musayyib, a small group of Humvees, including Cremer's, peeled off and rode into town. They were going to pick up a truckload of Iraqi police who hadn't been told about the operation in advance because of fears of insurgent sympathizers in the police force.

Insurgents have left their mark in the town: A suicide bomber blew himself up next to a fuel tanker last July, killing almost 100 people in a shower of fire and shrapnel.

Less than five minutes after arriving at the police station, Cremer got a call on his radio: "Be advised, the lights just went off in that area."

The pilot, watching the insurgent leader's compound, had seen every light in the group of houses get turned off.

Cremer shook his head. "These (expletive) - someone made a phone call," he said, motioning toward the police station.

The convoy left, a pickup truck of police now with it.

A few minutes later, the tanks blocked the road in and out of the compound. A sniper team set up in the distance. The Bradleys began to rumble toward the houses.

The buildings, separated by a couple of courtyards, were in a thick grove of palm trees, where a series of dirt roads ran parallel to canals fed from the Euphrates River. The dirt roads would make it easy for insurgents to dig a hole and plant a roadside bomb. The palm trees would provide better cover for insurgents trying to escape.

The Bradleys stopped and soldiers began to pour out.

The light of Cremer's computer flickered in the darkness, and he stared at the video feed, in which dark spots - soldiers - circled and entered the buildings.

It looked, he said, "like a video game."

The radio crackled with a report of one shot fired, then a second, third and finally a fourth. Soldiers called in as they cleared rooms of the seven houses. They'd come in expecting about 17 people; there were 27.

Time passed. Cremer kept watching the screen. The radio squawked: Two men and a woman were dead. The details were vague. A soldier had seen the woman and said he thought she had a rocket-propelled grenade launcher on her shoulder.

A sergeant's voice boomed on the radio: "I need to know what the (expletive) that rocket (expletive) ended up being."

Cremer called in for illumination rockets, and the white balls bounced in the air, turning night to day. The soldiers didn't find a rocket-propelled grenade or its launcher. They scoured the compound and found only two AK-47 assault rifles, common in Iraq.

The insurgent leader wasn't there. The soldiers detained a man who intelligence reports suggested was an associate.

Cremer and the rest of the convoy didn't get back to the base until after 5 a.m. They ate breakfast, did some paperwork and then passed out in their bunks.

At the mess hall later that day, Oliver said he would have to return to the compound to give the family compensation payments for the woman and probably for the two men as well, depending on whether intelligence officers determined they were insurgents.

Oliver wasn't looking forward to the trip.

Cremer's boss, Capt. Jason Earley, said there would be plenty more missions to come - bringing the chance to stop insurgents who've killed and maimed innocents, but also bringing the risk of killing the innocents themselves.

"We're trying to give these people freedom, which I think is an incredibly noble thing," said Earley, 32, of New Buffalo, Mich. But, he added, "it's complicated."

Photographs Show a War Beyond Investigations

The Iraq war is the first major conflict fought in what might be called the age of the new Panopticon. The English philosopher Jeremy Bentham coined the term in the late 18th century to describe a prison in which the guard tower was in the center of concentric rings of cells, allowing authorities to exercise an "invisible omniscience." Although the word emerged in the context of prison reform, it has become more suggestive over the years, capturing something essential about power and authority, from Big Brother's pervasive surveillance to the more benign notion that government is always "looking into" things. But the new Panopticon is a digital phenomenon, a world of instant cameras, cellphone snapshots, e-mailed photographs, a world that produces a nonstop, immediate and ubiquitous visual record of itself -- and it is breaking the government's monopoly on omniscience.

Again and again throughout this war, amateur photographs have exposed the flaws of the military's carefully constructed image of discipline. Photographs made Abu Ghraib a symbol of shame throughout the world. And photographs and video images are again undermining the military's cherished reputation for calm under fire and heroic self-restraint.

The most horrifying images are not published or shown on TV, though they're easy to find on the Web. But the ones we are confronted with are bad enough: A small child, a victim of a devastating and controversial U.S. airstrike in Ishaqi, is dressed in baby-blue, his eyes are closed, and his tiny, gently clenched hand rests by his side. He might be asleep, except that the photograph, which ran in Newsweek, shows a mangled, bloody arm next to him. The unidentified, shredded limb (does it belong to yet another child?) reaching into the center of the image might well stand for all the rest of these photographs that prick the conscience: They seem to come from the margins of our attention, they reach in and put their bloody imprint on a war that we wish had more innocence and calm to it.

The military has concluded that there was no U.S. wrongdoing in the March 15 Ishaqi attack that left the child dead.

They are not so certain about two other incidents, the killing of a disabled Iraqi man in Hamdaniyah on April 26 and the deaths of 24 Iraqis in Haditha on Nov. 19. Both are under investigation, and photographs and video from both have begun to circulate. In the Hamdaniyah case, we know there are graphic images of a man wrapped in plastic sheeting -- a see-through shroud that has become a grisly visual marker of the ongoing conflict. Neighbors and family say the man, who has four bullet holes in his face, was dragged from his house and shot by U.S. soldiers. Eight American servicemen are under investigation.

In Haditha, the range of images is wider: bodies wrapped in rugs; bodies bundled in white cloth and tied into neat, ghostly packages; and bloody, bloated faces emerging from stiff folds of transparent plastic, rather like Rodin's deathly Balzac looks out from his small cave of draping metal.

Hands and feet of the living -- bystanders, onlookers, witnesses to the silence of the dead -- often frame the images. These strange, anonymous additions to the picture -- disembodied appendages -- suggest humanity at a standstill. They suggest an impotence among Iraqi civilians that is heartbreaking.

The U.S. military is still looking into the Haditha killings. It's also looking into the possibility of a military coverup, which kept the killings under wraps for half a year.

Photographs are immediate. Investigations are by necessity methodical and often slow. These two different senses of time -- the immediate and the methodical -- are now in troubling conflict. A dead child cries out for immediate response; the military investigates. We see photographs of men doubled over with grief, tear-stained faces, mouths contorted in pain, and the pang is instant; the military investigates. A boy standing next to the bodies of his family or friends looks up at his elders with a blank stare on his face, an image that puts death and childhood in excruciating proximity; the military investigates.

Photographs may play an important role in some of these investigations. But it is the degree to which the photographs exist in a world of their own, apart from the military's cautiously worded statements, that is increasingly perplexing. Throughout the war, the notion of two realities has dogged the warmakers. Is the president living in a world of good news and progress and missions accomplished, while our soldiers and the Iraqi population live in a world of chaos and death and uncertainty? Are the media presenting a world of antiseptic images, bloodless and vague, mere suggestions of a carnage they know all too well but dare not make explicit to the public?

Investigations are meant to create closure. But photographs, which can circulate forever, keep death and destruction open. Investigations are also meant to assure us that the war waged in our name is being fought with some measure of precision and dignity, but as photographs (and incidents) accumulate, and as investigations linger and overlap one another, they begin to lose their moral force. Investigation, a word meant to reassure us that the government is always "looking into" itself, is itself now subject to the blur that makes the nightly news coverage of Iraq seem like a tape loop.

And the only image that fades, as the war grinds on, is the one with which we prepared for battle: the fantasy, so beloved of Americans, of a clean, surgical, decent war.

Marines In Iraq: The Warriors' Way (LAT)

By David J. Danelo

The Los Angeles Times, June 6, 2006

ON APRIL 6, 2004, Cpl. Jason Howell, a Marine squad leader who had arrived in Iraq three weeks before, was enduring his baptism of fire in what later became known as the "first battle of Fallouja." Howell, who had not eaten in 18 hours or slept in 36, was running on nothing but adrenaline. His dehydrated spittle, caked around the side of his mouth, was dirty white. Kneeling on a roof, he saw a flash of movement. An Iraqi child put his face out the window.

Exhausted, Howell found himself unable to process the Arabic word he had learned for "stop." Without thinking, he screamed. The child pulled the curtains as Howell automatically raised his weapon to shoot. Then Howell blinked. An instant later, clarity returned to his thoughts. The corporal, who was in his first of what would become many days of combat, had almost shot an innocent.

"I don't know exactly why I didn't pull the trigger," said Howell, who now serves with the L.A. County Sheriff's Department. "It all happened so fast. It was a combination of training, instinct and luck."

As the furor grows over allegations that Marines killed 24 Iraqi civilians last November — including women and children — the origins of Howell's discipline are worth examining.

The Corps is the smallest of the United States' military services, and it also has the highest enlisted-to-officer ratio (about 10 to 1). Because of this, a much higher level of responsibility is placed on corporals and sergeants, or noncommissioned officers. In each Marine infantry battalion, which is the primary combat element, an average of 60 noncommissioned officers lead squads or a unit of similar size. As squad leaders, they assume responsibility for the lives — and split-second decisions — of about a dozen men.

Marines are legendary for their monastic devotion to the warrior ideal. The mottos inked on their bodies — Death Before Dishonor, Make Peace or Die, Always Faithful — function as physical scriptures for their choice of religion, like scapulars, phylacteries or "What Would Jesus Do?" bracelets. The ancient Spartans, who sacrificed at the battle of Thermopylae to defend the Greeks from the Persian onslaught, are venerated as saints within the Corps. The Spartan Way is a stoic faith.

SINCE THE FALL of 2001, 26 active duty and nine Marine Reserve infantry battalions have rotated into and out of Afghanistan and Iraq as units for seven-month tours of duty. As new recruits join a battalion, seasoned noncommissioned officers either gain rank toward senior billets or leave the Corps for civilian life. Although the exact numbers remain classified information, unit casualty reports suggest that about 50 separate rotations of Marine infantry battalions have been tested in combat over the last four years.

Using those statistics as a bare minimum, at least 3,000 corporals and sergeants have served combat tours as infantry squad leaders. Not to mention hundreds more who cut their teeth as combat replacements, convoy security escorts, translators, intelligence collectors or instructors for the new Iraqi army. When the histories are written, we will learn that the exact number of young Marines thrust into positions of leadership — amid an international media spotlight — is actually much higher.

Several Marines have already been convicted in the court of public opinion in the Haditha case. As military investigators evaluate these allegations, those on the sidelines should avoid castigation of an entire system because of the errors of a few. Consider the rush to judgment of 2nd Lt. Ilario G. Pantano, who was charged with murder at an April 2004 checkpoint shooting, or the nameless Marine in a Fallouja mosque who was seen on video killing an insurgent thought to have been booby-trapped. Both were eventually exonerated of all charges.

Responsible critics of the Iraq war say that we misappropriated U.S. military resources in making an unnecessary choice to topple Saddam Hussein's regime, a choice that has plunged young soldiers and Marines into the amorality of a protracted counterinsurgency. But placing too close an association on the Haditha massacre with the war's politics ignores the thousands of troops who have navigated the chaos and still made the right decisions.

Accuracy in the application of deadly force is the foundational creed for any who protect and defend their society. Discerning combatant from innocent is the greatest challenge for all who have engaged in this kind of war. Like spiritual perfection, the warrior ideal is often an impossible thing to fully achieve. But as we condemn the handful who have backslid in their pursuit of the Spartan Way, we should not forget to esteem the thousands who, like Cpl. Jason Howell, have kept their honor clean amid Iraq's insanity.

Uniformed Gunmen Kidnap 50 In Baghdad (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, June 6, 2006

BAGHDAD — Gunmen wearing police uniforms kidnapped at least 50 people Monday during a brazen daylight raid on bus stations in central Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0031790

Lt. Col. Falah al-Mohamedawi, an Interior Ministry spokesman, said the gunmen arrived at midmorning in the Salihiya business district, where several transportation companies are based and where buses pick up passengers bound mostly for Jordan, Syria and Lebanon.

Witnesses said the attackers blocked roads leading into the area before grabbing people seemingly at random. The gunmen beat the captives before putting bags over their heads and herding them into more than a dozen vehicles.

"They took all the workers from the companies and nearby shops," said Haidar Mohammed Eleibi, who works for Swan Transportation. He said his brother and a cousin were among those taken, along with merchants, travelers, passersby and even street vendors selling tea and sandwiches.

"They did not give any reason for it," he said. "Police came afterward and did nothing."

Another transportation worker, Amjad Hameed, said that as the attackers began seizing people, "we asked them why, but nobody replied."

The Shiite Muslim-dominated Interior Ministry, which oversees the police, has been accused of backing militias in sectarian violence. It denied that its officers were behind Monday's attack. Most of the workers in the area that was raided are Shiites.

Al-Mohamedawi said at least 50 people were abducted.

In other Iraq news:

•Mustafa Salman, a 30-year-old Iraqi, was sentenced to life in prison for his role in the kidnapping and killing of aid worker Margaret Hassan, Iraq's criminal court said. Two other defendants were acquitted.

Hassan, 59, a citizen of Ireland, Britain and Iraq, had headed CARE International's operations in Iraq since 1991. She was abducted in October 2004 and killed a month later. Her body has not been found.

•In southern Iraq, a bomb went off near an Italian patrol Monday night, killing one Italian soldier and wounding four, Adm. Gianpaolo Di Paolo announced in Rome.

•The chief judge in the trial of Saddam Hussein said Monday that four defense witnesses have been jailed on suspicion of perjury. That drew accusations from defense lawyers that the court was trying to intimidate witnesses.

Three of the witnesses testified last week that some of the 148 Shiites that Saddam and his seven co-defendants are accused of killing are still alive, defense lawyer Najib al-Nueimi told the Associated Press. The fourth told the court that chief prosecutor Jaafar al-Moussawi tried to bribe him to provide false testimony against Saddam.

In Brazen Roundup, 56 Vanish From Baghdad (WP)

By Nelson Hernandez And Salih Saif Aldin

BAGHDAD, June 5 -- "Turn back," a friend told Haji Abu Shamaa as he walked Monday morning toward his money-changing shop in the Karkh neighborhood of central Baghdad, a mile north of the heavily guarded Green Zone. "The Interior Ministry police are rounding up people."

But Shamaa walked on, right into a swift, coordinated operation unfolding within sight of Iraq's Ministry of Justice. Gunmen in police uniforms and ski masks had cordoned off the street and were swiftly shoving captives, four or five at a time, into a dozen waiting pickup trucks. Fifteen minutes later, the trucks were gone, and so were 56 people.

The roundup displayed all the signs of an unrelenting kidnapping epidemic in Baghdad. Since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, more than 400 foreigners have been abducted in Iraq, but thousands more Iraqis have been snatched from the streets, often by people wearing knockoff police uniforms that are easily purchased at local markets.

Many people, like Shamaa's friend, believe the kidnappers are actually police. Usually the hostages are held for ransom. Sometimes they are killed because of their faith or ethnicity.

The fate of the 56 people was unknown Monday night. But the scale and audacity of the operation were unusual even by the capital's lawless standards.

The gunmen seized workers from several bus companies that offer transport to Syria and Jordan, witnesses and police said. Others of those taken were passengers aboard the buses: Syrian businessmen going home, a handful of Palestinians,

DOJ_NMG_0031791

Iraqis. Many Iraqis are leaving their own country precisely because it is the sort of place where a trip to the bus stop can end with being led away at gunpoint.

Shamaa said he was intent on returning to his office, to rejoin his son, Alaa, and thought the police wouldn't arrest him -- he hadn't done anything wrong, he reasoned. Then he saw a dozen pickup trucks, two of them with machine guns mounted in their beds, and none with any license plates.

A man in a camouflage police uniform and a ski mask -- an article commonly worn by police in Baghdad-- stopped Shamaa, saying he would shoot him if he didn't turn back.

"I haven't done anything," Shamaa recounted explaining to him. "I just want to go to the bank to get some money, and I'll be gone."

The man let him pass. Shamaa went into the bank, and watched the scene unfolding through the window. He said he saw gunmen entering the Mohammed Ugaili Transportation Co. across the street. He saw the owner, Jasim Ugaili, and his son being forced into one of the pickup trucks with the butts of rifles. Shamaa saw his own son, Alaa, with them, his hands tied behind his back.

Shamaa rushed outside to save his son. Another man with a rifle blocked his way.

"What, do you want to join him?" the man threatened. Shamaa turned back. And the trucks drove off.

Police Col. Adel Younis said guards at the Ministry of Justice shot at the kidnappers, but couldn't stop them. Another witness, Hussein Ali, said he had seen a police car drive up to the scene, only to be driven off by gunfire and shouted warnings from the kidnappers that they were from the Interior Ministry's intelligence section.

Younis said the incident is under investigation. A police major who came on the scene after the attack said the men were not with the Interior Ministry, a witness said.

Raids like this one only increase popular mistrust of the police. Sunni Arabs often accuse the Interior Ministry police, dominated by Shiites, of conducting a terror campaign against them, or at least looking the other way as Shiite militias associated with political parties do so. But police say the attacks are carried out by criminals wearing police uniforms. At the same time, they counter that Iraq's major insurgent organizations are led by Sunnis and that a tough response is required.

Monday's kidnappings did not appear to be motivated by sectarian rivalry, a witness said. "Among the passengers were Syrian businessmen, about five or six of them," Hasan Falah said. "There were also some passengers from Diwaniyah" -- a predominantly Shiite city south of Baghdad-- "and other parts of Iraq. There was no question of Shiite or Sunni because it was a whole mixture."

That suggested that the people were simply taken for ransom, a lucrative business that has grown rapidly since U.S. forces overthrew Saddam Hussein's government in 2003.

A group of Shiite students in a neighborhood of southern Baghdad, kidnapped in another roundup on Monday, did not have the option of paying their way out.

In Abu Dashir, a Shiite neighborhood south of Dora, the volatile southern section of Baghdad, gunmen posing as drivers lined up a set of minibuses as if to offer rides to central Baghdad, a police officer said. Fifteen students from Abu Dashir got aboard.

The drivers and their accomplices killed them -- where the murders happened is unclear -- and threw their bodies off the side of the Dora highway.

Abduction statistics are unreliable because many families do not report crimes, fearing the police as much as they do the kidnapping gangs.

But every so often, kidnappers are brought to justice. On Monday, an Iraqi court sentenced an Iraqi man to life imprisonment in connection with the killing of Margaret Hassan, an Iraqi-British aid worker kidnapped in 2004. It is believed to be Iraq's first trial of a suspect accused of the abduction or murder of a foreign-born civilian since the U.S.-led invasion.

Hassan, originally from Ireland, married an Iraqi engineer and lived in Iraq for more than three decades before becoming an Iraqi citizen. At the time of her kidnapping in October 2004, she headed Iraqi operations for the CARE International charity.

She was abducted on her way to work in Baghdad. She was presumed murdered about a month later, after her captors released video messages of her appealing for the withdrawal of British forces from Iraq. Her body has not been found.

Also in Baghdad on Monday, the defense team in the trial of Saddam Hussein protested the arrest of four of its witnesses. Defense attorneys charged that some of them were beaten by Iraqi guards.

The chief judge said they were jailed on suspicion of perjury last week after testifying that they had seen the chief prosecutor offering money and unspecified fake documents in exchange for testimony. One of the witnesses also claimed that some of the 148 Shiites from the town of Dujail who were allegedly killed on Hussein's orders were still alive.

As Iraq Violence Worsens, Security Remains Elusive (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack And Saif Rasheed

The Los Angeles Times, June 6, 2006

BAGHDAD — Clad in camouflage uniforms, the gunmen came peeling through the thick morning heat in police trucks. They stopped at a downtown strip of travel companies where Iraqis gather each morning to board buses bound for the safer lands of Syria and Jordan.

The gunmen leaped to the ground, witnesses said, and they worked fast. They seized more than 50 bystanders, pulling men away from their families and hauling drivers from behind the wheels of the buses. They handcuffed the men, blindfolded them and stuffed them into the backs of the trucks like human loot. They covered some of their captives with sheets.

And then they were gone, slamming doors and speeding off into the brilliant morning sunlight. It was only 9 o'clock in a city where security has come unraveled, just another mundane scene that splintered suddenly into violence.

"Those are criminals going after the ransom," said Saad Tawil, a 42-year-old manager of one of the travel companies clustered on the street in downtown Baghdad. "They will see who is important or rich, and who is not, after interrogating them."

But other mass kidnappings that have struck the capital this year remain unsolved. In some cases, the victims have never turned up, living or dead.

The mass kidnapping came one day after Prime Minister Nouri Maliki was forced to concede that Iraq's warring factions were too mutually distrustful to agree on who should run the security services. Having suspended indefinitely a parliament vote on those key ministries, Maliki has left the army and police leadership dangling in a vacuum at a time when bloodshed in Baghdad, and across Iraq, has spiraled upward.

In Baghdad, leaving home to work, shop or visit family has become an increasingly dangerous proposition. Violence rears up without warning; residents navigate a citywide obstacle course of roadside bombs, shootouts and security checkpoints.

The city just had its most murderous month since U.S.-led forces invaded the country in 2003, new Iraqi government documents indicate. More people were shot, stabbed or otherwise violently killed in May than in any other month since the invasion, according to Health Ministry statistics. The figure does not include slain soldiers or civilians killed in bombings, on whom autopsies are not usually performed.

Last month alone, 1,398 bodies were brought to Baghdad's central morgue, the ministry said. All over the city and out into the provinces, corpses surface on a daily basis in garbage dumps, in abandoned cars or along roadsides. They often bear marks of bondage and torture.

The attacks are frequently characterized by their brazen nature. Gunmen climbed onto a Baghdad bus Monday and killed at least two Shiite students, an Interior Ministry source said.

Over the weekend, masked gunmen set up a roadblock north of Baghdad, stopped a passing bus and ordered the men to disembark. Dividing the Sunnis from the Shiites, they told the Shiites they were "traitors" who would be killed on religious principle, a witness told the Associated Press.

The assailants shot their victims execution-style. When they were done, 24 passengers were dead. Most of them were teenage university students and elderly men.

Although much of Iraq's bloodshed is carried out for sectarian reasons, there are plenty of criminals simply angling for cash in a lawless land. Kidnapping fellow Iraqis has bloomed into a popular moneymaking scheme.

Monday's mass kidnapping took place in a bustling, shabby commercial district in downtown Baghdad. The site is relatively fortified: It stands just a stone's throw from the Justice Ministry, amid a network of Iraqi police checkpoints.

The gunmen's vehicles roared to a stop on a road lined with the offices of travel agencies and bus line operators. Salihiya is a neighborhood of transit and escape, the last stop many Iraqis make in their flight from a war-ravaged homeland.

The buses leave Baghdad in the morning — the crushing heat of day is deemed preferable to the perils of riding through the desert at night. The roads to the border run through Sunni-dominated Al Anbar province. Buses are periodically stopped and looted, their passengers killed. For many Iraqis, boarding the bus is yet another gamble — they've grown used to weighing out a certain amount of risk in their daily lives.

Some of the Iraqis who bought tickets Monday didn't get out soon enough. Along with passengers — who presumably carried money and could afford to leave the country — office workers from the transit companies and bus drivers, some of them Syrian, were also grabbed by the assailants. At least one boy who eked out tips for toting suitcases was snatched up and carted off, witnesses said.

Transit worker Hamza Mohammed, 34, said he took off running when the gunmen arrived. They fired at him but missed, he said.

"They shouted at me and they tried to take me," he said between puffs of cigarette smoke and telephone calls from Iraqis eager to book a seat on a future bus. "But I fled."

Witnesses said the kidnappers were outfitted in the uniforms and vehicles used by some of the special forces of the Iraqi police, overseen by the long-troubled Interior Ministry. Police units under the ministry have been accused of working as Shiite death squads on a campaign to eliminate Sunni Arab men. Police have also been accused of kidnapping civilians for ransom.

On Monday afternoon, a special forces commander issued a statement denouncing the kidnapping and insisting his men were innocent. But in a city where the highway patrol is accused of forming death squads and paramilitary fighters are believed to have infiltrated state security organs, witnesses were not convinced.

"I accuse the police," said a travel office owner who would give only his last name, Ghanem. "The cars were definitely police cars."

Minor Figure In Iraqi Kidnapping Gets A Life Sentence (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 5 — A judge imposed a life sentence on Monday on a man who apparently played a minor role in the kidnapping of Margaret Hassan, a British-Iraqi aid worker whose disappearance and death showed that no one was immune from insurgent viciousness.

The verdict, the first in a kidnapping of a foreigner in Iraq, brought an inconclusive end to the case of Ms. Hassan, 59, who was abducted on her way to work in Baghdad in October 2004. Two other men were acquitted and a sheik suspected of having played an important role in the kidnapping has eluded arrest.

The kidnapping of Ms. Hassan, the director of CARE International in Iraq who had dedicated her life to helping the country's poor, stunned Iraqis and opened a more dangerous era for foreign nationals working here. In one enduring image from a grainy video broadcast on television, she was seen crumpled and pleading. Her body was never found.

Judge Saab Khorshid of the Central Criminal Court sentenced Mustafa Muhammad Salman al-Jibouri, a man associated with a Sunni mosque in central Baghdad, to life in prison, a British Embassy official said. The charge, according to an Iraqi lawyer who watched the trial, was aiding and abetting: Mr. Jibouri held Ms. Hassan's purse after she was abducted, though he said he did not know whose it was at first.

The spasm of violence in the capital continued Monday, with armed men dressed as police commandos seizing 24 people in Salheya, a bustling commercial district in the heart of the city that is dotted with bus companies that take travelers to Syria and Jordan. Families of those who were seized, including bus owners, riders and a kebob seller, formed an impromptu demonstration and demanded their release.

"What happened today is a catastrophe, something unnatural," said one of the relatives on the Iraqi evening news here.

Security in the capital has deteriorated precipitously in recent months. Increasingly brazen assassinations torment neighborhoods and no longer seem to follow any obvious patterns. In May, the Baghdad morgue recorded the highest number of bodies received since the beginning of the war: 1,375, approximately double the toll of May 2005.

The surge in killings comes as Iraqi political leaders remained deadlocked for a seventh week over the most important positions in the Iraqi cabinet, the ministers of defense and interior. The stalemate has left Iraq rudderless when it most needs a full government.

"It's a real problem," said Mowaffak al-Rubaie, the national security adviser, who said a new security plan for Baghdad cannot begin until the ministers are in place.

The trial in Ms. Hassan's killing, which was completed in only two and a half hours, went virtually unnoticed by Iraqi television outlets, and raised more questions than it answered. The testimony connected Ms. Hassan's kidnapping to a mosque in Jadriya, a leafy neighborhood of university professors in central Baghdad, and the sheik who presided there, identified by defendants as Hussein Ahmed Salman al-Zobai.

The sheik had given Mr. Jibouri, a resident of Madaen, an angry Sunni Arab town south of Baghdad, Ms. Hassan's purse and identification cards in a plastic bag for safekeeping, according to Shawkat al-Samarrai, an Iraqi lawyer who watched the trial.

Mr. Jibouri, who denied he played a part in the kidnapping, said he looked inside the purse two months later and discovered it belonged to Ms. Hassan. The sheik, who had moved to Jamiya in western Baghdad, an area dominated by insurgents, said he would come to collect it, but never did, Mr. Samarrai said.

Two other men, Mohsin Ahmed and Qasim Muhammad, identified by The Associated Press as a guard and a worshiper from the mosque that figured in the case, were acquitted. It was not clear from the testimony what happened to the sheik, but some participants in the trial said that he had fled, according to Mr. Samarrai. Court officials were not available for comment on Monday afternoon.

In a frustrating tale of missed opportunities and painful waiting, Ms. Hassan's husband, Tahseen Hassan, took the stand on Monday. In a calm voice, he spoke of the ordeal of losing his wife, beginning from the morning of her disappearance on Oct. 19, 2004.

She left the house at 7:30 a.m., he said, according to Mr. Samarrai, riding with her driver and bodyguard in her Toyota Camry to her office in Quthat, a neighborhood on the edge of Jadriya. Two hours later, her secretary called Mr. Hassan and told him his wife was missing. The driver, an Iraqi, and the guard, an Egyptian, had been badly beaten.

In the days after his wife was abducted, Mr. Hassan received several telephone calls — her relatives said on Monday that four were made from her cellphone — from people he did not know, asking for the numbers of the British Embassy in Baghdad, and of Ms. Hassan's office.

Shortly after that, a caller who identified himself as Abu Mustafa reassured him that his wife was doing well, and proposed a meeting in the Shiite neighborhood of Kadhimiya. Mr. Hassan said he went there with the Iraqi police, but that the caller never showed up. Abu Mustafa later called back, according to Mr. Samarrai, and asked Mr. Hassan why he had come with the police.

In a statement released in England on Sunday, Ms. Hassan's family accused the British government of contributing to her death by refusing to negotiate with her kidnappers.

"The hostage-takers demanded to speak to a member of the British Embassy, but Tahseen had been told by the British that they would not speak to the kidnappers," said Ms. Hassan's siblings — Deirdre, Geraldine, Kathryn and Michael Fitzsimmons. "We believe that the refusal by the British government to open a dialogue with the kidnappers cost our sister her life."

In an interview with the BBC on Monday, Deirdre Fitzsimmons said that the last phone calls were made on Nov. 7, and that Mr. Hassan was essentially left on his own by an unhelpful British government.

"I don't think he knew what to do," she said. "He did the best he could. After all, this was a man in a house on his own, his wife had been taken hostage, he had seen terrible videos of her. He was really left on his own with this advice."

A spokeswoman for the British Embassy in Baghdad said: "Our thoughts are with her family."

Typical of the breakdown in the capital, confusion prevailed late into the evening in Salheya, where the 24 people were taken Monday. The head of the commandos said his forces had not been in the area, but an official in the Interior Ministry said that a special police unit, possibly from the Ministry of Transportation, might have conducted the raid.

One witness, who runs the Tiger Bus Company, said the armed men blindfolded the people they were leading away and fastened their hands with plastic ties.

"I knew that if they will take me, that means I am dead," said the man who asked that his name not be used out of safety concerns. "We knew this was the end. We ran out the back."

In other violence, Iraqi television reported that one Italian soldier had been killed and three others wounded by a bomb in southern Iraq. Two students were killed in the southern neighborhood of Dawra, part of a spate of recent killings of students, an Interior Ministry official said.

Iraqis Believe Violence Will Abate, New Report Says (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

Attacks and casualty levels against civilians and military personnel in Iraq have risen "substantially" since the December elections, but Iraqis have confidence the new Baghdad government will improve the situation, according to the Defense Department's quarterly report to Congress.

"The formation of the new, permanent Iraqi government that addresses key sectarian and political concerns could help reverse the attack trend," states the report, which measured progress in Iraq through May.

Although the report states that since the bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra, attacks have increased against rival sectarian groups and populations, it says that al-Qaeda "has been unsuccessful in driving Iraq to civil war [although] Sunni and Shia Arab reprisals elevated the level of violence throughout this period."

Anthony H. Cordesman, who holds the Arleigh Burke chair in strategy at Washington's Center for Strategic and International Studies and has closely studied the Iraq insurgency, yesterday criticized the new Pentagon report as presenting "a fundamentally false picture of the political situation in Iraq, and of the difficulties ahead." He said it "does not prepare the Congress or the American people for the years of effort that will be needed even under 'best case' conditions and the risk of far more serious forms of civil conflict."

Saying "only the U.S. government has the resources and access to information that provide a comprehensive overview of the situation," Cordesman added, "The American people and the U.S. Congress need an honest portrayal of what is happening, not lies by omission and 'spin.' "

For example, he notes the poll of Iraqis' confidence in their new government's ability to improve the situation is described as a "nationwide survey" with no explanation of who was polled and how. He also points out that despite the increase in sectarian killings and the failure to form a government after the elections, the number of Iraqis with doubts hardly changed.

Cordesman said the report "highlights real problems with crime and militias and the importance of sectarian, tribal and ethnic violence," but he took issue with the Pentagon assertion that 90 percent of the suicide bombings in Iraq are carried out by al-Qaeda terrorists, saying, "This may be what some want to believe, but there is no validation."

Afghanistan Under Siege (WT)

By Tulin Dalogl

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan. -- The pictures of the anti-U.S. riots last week in Kabul show the immense contradictions of Afghanistan. Monday's riot, triggered by a traffic accident involving an American military truck, was the worst since the fall of the Taliban. The next day, however, was absolutely calm, illustrating how impossible it is to predict anything that will happen in Afghanistan. Hikmet Cetin, NATO's senior civilian representative, says the riots did not accurately express either the level of anti-American sentiment or the people's attitude toward foreign influences.

"There were different elements in that demonstration," Mr. Cetin said in an interview. "They were angry against their government, too." He said it is clear to him that the Taliban knows it is militarily overmatched by the NATO forces preparing to take control in Afghanistan.

"The Taliban [leaders] understand they cannot fight with our military face to face, so they started to use roadside bombs, IEDs and suicide bombers," Mr. Cetin said. "They are trying to give the impression that there are two powers in this country: the government and the Taliban. They are sending [a] message [to NATO]: don't come, we will kill you."

A native of Turkey, the only Muslim country in NATO, his service in Afghanistan is crucial. Afghans remember the days of Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, the founder of modern-day Turkey, and Emanullah Han, and how Ataturk helped them build numerous Afghan state institutions. Dr. Rifki Kamil Urga, who Ataturk sent to Afghanistan, built the first medical school.

Mr. Cetin's personality is also crucial. He's a Muslim representing NATO, but to preserve relations he needs to appeal to the Afghan people. He's not only an official; he is also very popular even among ordinary Afghanis. On days of upheaval like Monday, people ask him what to do, and they learn from him the lessons of how to govern their country.

What's more, when a former warlord told Mr. Cetin that his community needed a mosque, he replied, "No, you need schools." He is exactly right to try to show Afghanis what their priorities should be as they learn how to navigate governing and their established religious institutions. Alas, the literacy rate in this country is less than 40 percent -- needless to say that the female literacy rate is around 14 percent.

The day after the riot, Mr. Cetin hosted a dinner at his residence for more than a dozen members of the Afghan Parliament. "The day two Canadians were killed in Kandahar, [Canada's] Parliament decided to extend its stay for another two years," he told the assembled group of parliamentarians on Tuesday. He noted that Canadian, Dutch and British forces will be doubling the number of troops in the Taliban's stronghold in the south. The move will change the rules of engagement for NATO forces. And it also proves, Mr. Cetin says, "[w]hen NATO commits itself, it acts decisively."

Mr. Cetin says he is sure that NATO will defeat the Taliban. But he believes it requires more than military effort. The world should help Afghanistan to stand on its own as a sovereign, independent country, he says.

Some at the dinner raised some thought-provoking points. M. Daoud Sultanzoy, the head of a parliamentary committee on the economy, said that because the West had defeated the Soviet Union, Western powers should be well-versed in valuable psychological warfare tactics, and he questioned why that knowledge is not being employed against the Taliban. Obviously, the answer is not an easy one until security conditions have been improved and economy driven infrastructure and industries start to show a presence in the country.

"Any country could have problems. Any country may lack some institutions. And they may take steps to correct it," Mr. Cetin told me during the interview. "But in Afghanistan, in the beginning of 2001, there were no state institutions. There was no government, no governance, no military, no police, no public administration." Because that infrastructure is only beginning to be conceived, much less implemented, "NATO can not fail in Afghanistan," he said. "That will be the end of NATO. Then we can't succeed anywhere." He also reminded the group of what NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said: "If we don't go to Afghanistan, Afghanistan will come to us -- as a terror, as a drug trafficker."

Even with the monumental challenges, everyone accepts that Afghanistan has changed remarkably for the good since 2001. "It reminds me the place where I grow up," said Mr. Cetin, referring to his birthplace of Lice, Turkey -- an area where the Kurdish citizens make up the majority and little infrastructure or mechanisms for governing exist.

He acknowledges that putting together the institutions of government and statehood, along with educating the people, will take a long time. But he refused to compare Afghanistan and Iraq. "There is no deep ethnic and religous division in Afghanistan like there is in Iraq," he said.

Many Afghans Lost To Hazards Of Childbirth (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

SHEIKHABAD, Afghanistan -- According to Afghan tradition, children are the fruit of heaven. The more each couple produces, the greater the blessing; hence the country has one of the world's highest birthrates. If an infant dies, village tradition says, another will come along soon. If a mother dies giving birth, it is the will of God.

But according to international studies, Afghanistan is also one of the most dangerous places in the world to be born or to deliver a child. In a recent report, the U.S. charity Save the Children found that Afghanistan has the world's second-highest rate of newborn deaths, 60 per 1,000 births, just below Liberia. It also found that one in six Afghan mothers -- 20,000 a year -- die during or after childbirth.

Safia, an illiterate villager of about 30, has survived several pregnancies, but just barely. Last month, she arrived at physician Roshanak Wardak's clinic in this town 50 miles west of the capital carrying a 3-week-old baby.

The child was thin and weak, because Safia could neither produce milk nor afford to buy formula.

Her previous child, a boy, had nearly died at birth. Safia was in labor for two days and nights, she said, with no way to travel from her village. By the time she finally reached a hospital two hours away, she had to have an emergency Caesarean section, and both she and the baby were hospitalized for a week.

"My husband was away working. I couldn't reach him, and no one else would help me," she said. "I was having terrible pains, but the baby would not come. Later the doctors told me it was because I worked so hard during my pregnancy, lifting water buckets and other heavy things. They told me not to have any more children for three years, but now I have this new one."

Although Afghanistan has had a stable, Western-backed government since late 2001 and foreign donors have since spent tens of millions of dollars to improve health care, conditions still conspire to sabotage the chances of healthy and normal births.

"It's really as bad as it can get and still sustain a population," said Linda Bartlett, a physician and maternal and child health officer for UNICEF in Kabul, the capital.

Many parts of Afghanistan are harsh and remote, with bad roads, few clinics and little ability to attract skilled health workers. Village girls are often married by 15 and urged to produce a child each year. About 85 percent of Afghan infants are born at home, without even a trained midwife in attendance.

If complications arise, families may not recognize the danger signals and end up wasting precious time deciding what to do. The mother, in protracted labor or losing blood, may have to be carried or put on a donkey for several hours to reach a road leading to a hospital. By then, it may be too late to save her or the child.

"The worst problem is lack of skilled staff. In some provinces, there are no female health workers at all," said Nadra Hayat, director of maternal and infant health at the Public Health Ministry in Kabul. Delivering babies is traditionally done in Afghanistan by women, and many families do not want male doctors to treat their wives or daughters.

Even when foreign donors offered to increase the government's monthly salary for doctors from $40 to $1,000 for those willing to work in arid, isolated southern provinces, Hayat said, "the living conditions were so bad that no one wanted to go."

According to Bartlett, health care has improved significantly in some provinces, with new clinics built and staffed in large towns. The problem, she said, is at two extremes: remote regions where medical help is dangerously scarce, and urban areas where hospitals can barely keep up with the population boom.

In Kabul, the main maternity hospital, Malalai, is hard-pressed to keep pace with the crush of deliveries resulting from a wave of returning refugees that has tripled the city's population since the U.S.-led invasion in late 2001. The staff delivers 80 to 100 babies every 24 hours, and most new mothers are discharged the same day to keep enough beds open.

Doctors and nurse-midwives said that since the end of Taliban rule and the influx of foreign aid, the hospital has made major improvements. Infection rates have fallen sharply, and new diagnostic equipment has been donated. In the past 15 months, fewer than 10 patients have died.

"Some things are much better. We used to do 10 deliveries with one pair of gloves," said Safia, a nurse-midwife who has worked there for 35 years.

Still, conditions are far from ideal. Basic supplies often run out. Patients may be asked to privately purchase such items as intravenous drips. When patients arrive with severe bleeding, doctors often take up a collection to buy plasma from other hospitals.

With doctors in short supply, Afghan and foreign aid agencies have focused on increasing the quantity and quality of midwives. Until recently, many were unskilled women who did little more than cut the umbilical cord. If the mother started hemorrhaging or the birth was obstructed -- the two leading causes of maternal mortality here -- there was little they could do.

In the past three years, a U.S.-funded program has trained hundreds of community midwives, and a national midwives association has been formed. The number of trained midwives has increased from about 500 to 1,500, and many are working in remote regions with high rates of infant and maternal deaths.

"It is a real revolution," said Pashtun Afzer, the association's president. "These women are so committed. They want to be competent. They know the danger signs and the causes of bleeding. Some rural people were afraid to go to strange clinics, but these are women from their own areas, so the people trust them."

Bibi Ashrafi, a midwife in her fifties, has delivered more than 1,000 babies in Wardak province. She said most village families still prefer home births because they don't want to expose their wives or daughters to unfamiliar doctors.

"I only carry a bag with a scalpel, soap, gloves and clean cloths," she said. "I am very careful. I wash my hands eight times before and after the birth, I sterilize my scissors, and I make sure the placenta is not left inside. If the mother is doing well, I feed her a soup of sugar and oil and flour, and then I leave."

In the past, Ashrafi said, many women died giving birth, and their families would say it was "God's decision that her time had come." But three years ago a clinic opened in the area and she received some training. Now, when a mother is bleeding heavily after the birth, she has a place to send them.

"It's great we have a clinic now, but the problem is with the people," she said. "They are so concerned about privacy that they don't call me until a woman has been bleeding for three days. I tell them to space out the births, but they want to have as many children as possible. I tell them that is bad for the mother's health, but they don't want to change."

A few miles away, outside Wardak's clinic in Sheikhabad, several dozen women huddled on the ground, their swollen bellies hidden under billowing burqas . All were illiterate. Many had histories of multiple miscarriages, problem deliveries or babies born early and weak.

Wardak said she opened her clinic after the winter of 1996, when 40 women died giving birth in the district. Even now, she said, many pregnant women live so far up in the barren brown hills that they can barely get to her door, let alone endure another two-hour ride to the hospital in Kabul if they have labor complications.

"Some villages are eight or nine hours away, and the cars charge extra because the roads are so bad," she said. "I haven't lost a patient in nine years, but we have women traveling from one district to another with labor pains, trying to find help. Sometimes, on the way, the babies die inside them."

Senators Seek Better Defense Imagery (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

The Senate Select Committee on Intelligence wants to expand the mission of the nation's imagery intelligence agency so that it can provide U.S. forces on the ground with laptop computers that display still pictures and video of what may lie over the next hill.

"New products including full-motion video and ground-based photography should be included with available positional data [such as maps] in National Geospatial-Intelligence libraries for retrieval on Defense Department and intelligence community networks," the Senate panel said in its report on the fiscal 2007 intelligence authorization bill.

"The committee wants troops to be able to dial up what the route ahead will look like and where potential ambush points may be," said John Pike of GlobalSecurity.org, an expert in satellite- and ground-based intelligence. He said digital still photos taken by military attachÃ©s and Special Forces teams that have slipped in and out of potential target countries such as Iran and North Korea as well as video footage taken by unmanned aerial vehicles (UAVs) have been collected for years, but have not been integrated into the main data libraries maintained by the National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency (NGA).

"The NGA's current library of geospatial products reflects its heritage -- predominantly overhead imagery and mapping products," the committee wrote in its report. "While the NGA is beginning to incorporate more airborne and commercial imagery, its products are nearly devoid of FMV [full-motion video] and ground-based photography," it added.

The panel's solution is to give the director of national intelligence authority to direct the NGA to "analyze, disseminate and incorporate" into its national system "likenesses, videos, or presentations produced by ground-based platforms including handheld or clandestine photography taken by or on behalf of human intelligence collection organizations."

The new visual materials would be available along with traditional mapping data for retrieval by mission planners and troops in the field. "The route to and from a facility or photographs of what a facility would look like to a foot soldier -- rather than from an aircraft -- would be of immense value to our military personnel and intelligence officers," the report said.

Sensitive to the unique roles played by human collectors, including Special Forces teams and clandestine CIA operatives, the report made clear that the NGA's new mission would not give the agency authority to "manage or direct" the collection or set the technical requirements for "handheld or clandestine photography." The human collection agencies would also control the classification of their photography as well as how and to whom it is distributed.

Instead, the panel encouraged the NGA, whose database includes the exact location of where images are taken and the timing, to work with the other collection agencies so their data can easily be retrievable from the National Geospatial data libraries.

Pike said, however, that technical difficulties exist in finding ways to integrate the new collection into the NGA data libraries. "Lots of still-camera imagery does not have time and place stamped into it as do the satellites," he said. He also noted that full-motion videos, where a UAV can be traveling 100 mph, creates a problem in stamping locations so viewers know the start and finish of the target.

An NGA spokesman said the agency does not comment on pending legislation such as the Senate intelligence committee's version of the authorization bill. But the NGA has been making changes in its databases over the past few years. More commercial imagery has been purchased and some video from UAVs such at the Predator and Global Hawk have gone into the system.

Last December, Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte gave the NGA responsibility for overhead, non-imagery infrared and space-borne collectors of measurement and signature intelligence, which involves sensors that, among other things, gather signs of chemical, electronic, nuclear or other radiations emitters.

The NGA also has linked elements of its group with the National Security Agency, whose satellites and ground-based facilities collect electronic messages. Negroponte recently praised this step as "linking our nation's 'eyes and ears.' "

In a presentation last September, retired Lt. Gen. James R. Clapper Jr., the head of the NGA, described his view of "geointellingence" as seeking to answer such questions as "Where am I? Where are the friendlies? Where are the enemies? Where are the noncombatants? Where are the obstacles, natural and manmade, and how do I navigate among them? And what is the environment?"

Clapper, who became director of the NGA in 2001 when it was still the National Imagery and Mapping Agency, plans to retire this month.

DOJ:

Ex-Ashcroft Aide Blasts AG Gonzales (LAW)

By Jason McLure, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 5, 2006

It's not often you see one of former Attorney General John Ashcroft's aides publicly criticize the current Justice Department. But that's exactly what former Ashcroft spokesman Mark Corallo did last week when he submitted an affidavit bashing the DOJ for issuing subpoenas to two San Francisco Chronicle reporters who wrote articles about the BALCO steroid investigation based on leaked grand jury testimony.

In supporting the reporters' motion to quash, Corallo accused Justice's leadership of violating long-standing departmental policies that discourage subpoenaing reporters except in certain circumstances "where immediate action is required to avoid the loss of life or the compromise of a security interest."

"I just saw an egregious abuse of power," says Corallo. "There seems to be this attitude at [the DOJ] that just because the law says we can, we will."

Corallo, who now runs his own public relations company, has some clients who likely didn't mind him taking a swat at his old employer. He's been retained by Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, the securities class action firm indicted by the Justice Department last month. He's also served as spokesman for Karl Rove, the presidential aide under scrutiny by DOJ Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald in the investigation into the leak of CIA agent Valerie Plame's identity. That case, of course, may hinge on the degree to which reporters are compelled to cooperate with prosecutors and defense lawyers.

Corallo, however, says his client list didn't affect his decision to jump into the BALCO matter. "None of my clients had any idea that I was doing this," he says. Regardless, his move will likely burn bridges with some fellow Republicans at the DOJ.

His affidavit offers implicit criticism of not only Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, but to others with authority over the decision, including Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, Criminal Division chief Alice Fisher, and Public Affairs Director Tasia Scolinos. Firing back, DOJ spokesman Brian Roehrkasse says Corallo "may not have been aware of all of the facts" of the BALCO case.

Pentagon IG Nominee Goes To Senate (AP)

WASHINGTON (AP) - Assistant U.S. Attorney David Laufman is President Bush's pick to be the Pentagon's chief overseer of internal investigations.

The White House on Monday sent the Senate Laufman's nomination for inspector general at the Defense Department.

If confirmed, Laufman would replace Joseph E. Schmitz, who resigned last September to become chief operating officer for the Prince Group, a division of Blackwater USA, which provides security services to troops in Iraq and around the globe.

The inspector general is the principal adviser to the secretary of defense for matters relating to the prevention of fraud, waste and abuse in the Defense Department.

Laufman, who received a bachelor's degree from the University of Pennsylvania and a law degree from Georgetown University, is assistant U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia.

Before that, he was chief of staff for the office of the deputy attorney general at the Justice Department. Earlier in his career, he was investigative counsel for the House Ethics Committee.

Does DOJ's Privacy Advocate Have Enough Tools For The Job? (LAW)

By Jason Mclure, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 6, 2006

From spying on domestic-based international phone calls without a court warrant to reportedly obtaining the phone records of tens of millions of customers of AT&T, BellSouth and Verizon, the federal government appears to have made safeguarding Americans' privacy a low priority.

So it may come as a surprise to learn that the Justice Department -- the agency responsible for defending such programs -- has a top official charged with making sure the agency doesn't violate Americans' rights while pursuing terrorists. Jane Horvath became the department's first full-time chief privacy and civil liberties officer in February.

But her powers are limited and, in the view of a number of privacy advocacy groups, negligible. Unlike privacy officers in Europe and Canada, she has no power to subpoena federal law enforcement officials with knowledge of alleged privacy or civil liberties violations. Nor can she report independently to Congress.

"I tend to think it is window dressing," says David Sobel, general counsel of the Electronic Privacy Information Center. "The creation of a position like this within DOJ is a matter of [the department] paying lip service to the very real privacy problems that arise from their activities."

And, in fact, Horvath herself says she has no intention of taking a confrontational approach or acting independently of Justice's leadership in defending privacy rights at an agency that has vigorously defended the National Security Agency's domestic spying and whose own investigators are increasingly circumventing federal courts to collect personal information on American citizens.

In an interview with Legal Times, Horvath says she sees herself as an adviser who can work behind the scenes to ensure privacy concerns are heard by top officials. "People have to see you as someone helping to structure a program to be effective," she says. "Me, by myself, screaming and yelling, I'll get nowhere."

Horvath's job was created in January under a provision of a Justice appropriations bill to help counterbalance sweeping new investigative and data-collection powers granted to the FBI and federal prosecutors since the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks. The position was modeled on the Department of Homeland Security's privacy officer, a four-year-old post that privacy advocates have also criticized as being insufficiently independent.

"A privacy officer fundamentally is operating with values inconsistent to the department. ... It takes a unique and combative personality to do well in a job like that," says James Harper, a privacy law expert at the Cato Institute. "In the end, I think it will be the role of the chief privacy officer to apologize for their agencies, rather than act as a privacy advocate internally."

GRAPPLING WITH BIG BROTHER

Horvath disagrees and says she and her four-lawyer office will be able to effectively steer policy at the 110,000-employee Justice Department. "I don't view myself as an apologist," she says. Nor does she want the authority to subpoena witnesses or compel testimony from Justice officials, as some Democrats on Capitol Hill have proposed. Such powers would isolate her from DOJ decision makers, Horvath says, adding that any investigative responsibilities are best left to the department's inspector general.

"I think it would be such a mistake," she says. "If you give me subpoena power, you're going to pigeonhole me off into another room."

Horvath, 42, comes to the job from the consulting firm Privacy Laws & Business, a U.K.-based company that advises U.S. companies on complying with Europe's more stringent privacy laws. From 1995 to 2001 she worked as an assistant general counsel at AOL and wrote the company's first privacy policy.

At Justice, Horvath will be close to the center of the department's power structure. She works under Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, the No. 2 official who handles the department's day-to-day management, and her ability to overcome institutional resistance will be dependent on her ability to invoke his authority. "Jane plays a significant role in ensuring that the department's policies and initiatives are fully compliant with privacy and civil liberties," McNulty said in a statement.

"Just by virtue of being in [McNulty's] office, she'll have the ability to put issues on the agenda that she thinks are important," says one former high-ranking Justice official. "She'll have the ability to pick up the phone and get people in the attorney general's office."

Working under her are three privacy attorneys transferred from Justice's Office of Information and Privacy, a departmental subunit that handles mainly Freedom of Information Act requests. She also expects to hire a deputy soon.

Whether Horvath and her small staff will be able to actually shape policy is a different matter. With no independence from Justice leadership, her authority is limited to the power of persuasion, says Peter Swire, a former privacy counselor in the Clinton administration. "It's a tough job because you're pushing against the wind most of the time," he says.

Horvath says she can best defend privacy rights by vetting new programs for privacy issues before they are implemented. She points to the Defense Department's Total Information Awareness program as an example of a government data-gathering program that would have benefited from the advice of an in-house privacy adviser. Among other goals, that program, undertaken soon after the Sept. 11 attacks, sought to develop technology that would allow computers to identify and track people remotely. But its disclosure led to a public firestorm, and in 2003 it was abandoned.

"No one thought how the advocacy community or the American people would view it," Horvath says. "It's much better for me to be in at the inception of these programs."

Though Horvath says she hopes to focus on influencing new initiatives, there are plenty of existing Justice policies that raise privacy concerns. One area that has drawn Horvath's attention is the FBI's expanded use of National Security Letters. NSLs allow the FBI to secretly gather personal information from banks and telephone companies without having to first obtain court approval. After fighting to keep statistics of their use secret, in late April, the Justice Department reported to Congress that it issued 9,200 such letters in 2005. "It's a program that got to the top of my list," Horvath says. "The department as a whole needs to look at whether there were relevant law enforcement uses for those."

She also expresses an understanding of the privacy concerns raised by the Justice Department's attempts to gather Internet search data from Google and other search engines in its efforts to combat online pornography. "It's the slippery slope," Horvath says, noting that she's expressing a personal, rather than an official, opinion. "Google takes data and they save their data. Once they start producing data for the government, at what point does it stop?"

But Horvath is undisturbed by the growth in DNA profiles retained by state and federal law enforcement in a computer network known as the Combined DNA Index System (CODIS). That database, which initially was used to store genetic information of convicted felons, has been expanded to include thousands of arrestees who have not been convicted of a crime. "If people have a problem with what CODIS is taking in, they need to talk to Congress," she says. "The FBI is not going outside of the law to take DNA."

On perhaps the most controversial privacy and civil liberties issue handled by the Justice Department -- its vigorous defense of the NSA's warrantless surveillance program -- Horvath says she has no role to play and has not been briefed on the matter. "That's [DOJ's] litigation posture," she says. "It's done by NSA. It's not my area."

LOBBYING, NOT ENFORCING

Horvath's job description says she's responsible for coordinating the work of Justice related to the protection of privacy and civil liberties. Fred Cate, a professor at the Indiana University-Bloomington School of Law, says the fact that Horvath hasn't been consulted on the NSA issue reveals much about the limits of her authority. "The attorney general has to sign off on every other agency's surveillance programs," says Cate. "How effective can the chief privacy officer be if she's not involved in advice [Justice] gives to other agencies?"

And without the power to compel testimony from Justice officials, it's unclear how often she'll be consulted by DOJ's leadership or what real power she'll be able to wield should she see privacy concerns being ignored. "At best it's internal lobbying," says Barry Steinhardt, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's technology and liberty program.

Horvath says that so far she hasn't felt left out of the loop. She says she meets with McNulty twice a week in the deputy attorney general's staff meetings and has already been able to influence two significant policy decisions, though she declines to name them. "I've been able to have my voice heard a great deal," she says. "I see changes that I suggest integrated."

But even those privacy advocates who say the Justice Department would be better off with a European-style privacy watchdog express optimism that her appointment is a step in the right direction. "Somebody with limited powers is far better than none," says Robert Ellis Smith, a Rhode Island lawyer who publishes a journal on privacy law. "What's important is to have somebody who is a focal point."

Serving as a sounding board for public dissent will be an important part of Horvath's job. As the attacks of Sept. 11 recede, the public is growing increasingly wary of government monitoring. An ABC News-Washington Post poll in January found that 30 percent of Americans felt the government was unjustly violating privacy rights in investigating terrorism. Though that number remains relatively small, it's a significant rise over the 17 percent who felt that way in September 2003.

Horvath has met with critics of the DOJ's privacy and civil rights policies, including the ACLU and the Center for Democracy and Technology, and spoke at a meeting of privacy groups hosted by the Electronic Privacy Information Center (EPIC) in May.

"The department has a real credibility problem in terms of assuring the public that laws designed to protect privacy are being scrupulously observed," says EPIC general counsel Sobel. "It's clear the security and intelligence interests overpower the privacy interests."

That critique isn't unfamiliar to the new chief privacy officer.

"I think that a great part of my role is to re-establish trust," Horvath says. "Trust is a huge thing for the FBI and Department of Justice. ... They can't do their jobs if they don't have it."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Bawag To Pay $675M To Settle Refco Charges (AP)

AP, June 6, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) — Austria's Bawag PSK bank will pay at least $675 million to avoid prosecution and to settle bankruptcy claims after admitting its role in the collapse of commodities brokerage Refco Inc., U.S. authorities announced Monday.

The bank, together with the Austrian Trade Unions Association, which owns Bawag, will forfeit $337.5 million to the United States to be distributed to victims of the fraud at Refco, according to prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

In return, U.S. authorities have agreed not to prosecute Bawag, U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said.

The government will distribute half of the $337.5 million in forfeited funds to the Refco bankruptcy estate and half to other victims of the Refco fraud, he said.

In a statement, the bank said it will initially pay $158 million, with $150 million being divided equally between the Refco creditors and the U.S. Department of Justice and another $8 million being paid to a class-action settlement fund.

The bank said the Justice Department will distribute its money to the Refco estates and the securities claimants, among others.

As much as a year later, the bank will pay the remainder, to be split equally between the Justice Department and Refco creditors, the bank said.

The non-prosecution deal included a statement from Bawag, in which the bank acknowledged it assisted former Refco Chief Executive Phillip R. Bennett in hiding hundreds of millions of dollars of Refco losses from Refco investors and creditors.

According to the statement, certain former senior officers of the bank including the then-chairman and a member of the managing board who became chairman in 2003 knew that Bennett wanted to manipulate certain intercompany balances.

The statement said the bank from 2000 through February 2005 made short-term loans of hundreds of millions of dollars to Refco so Refco "could manipulate certain intercompany accounts in order deceptively to 'improve' Refco's balance sheet."

The New York-based Refco was one of the world's biggest commodities brokerages, employing some 2,400 employees in 14 countries. Bawag, Austria's fourth-largest bank, bought a 10 percent interest in Refco in 1999. It has 1.3 million private customers and 60,000 commercial customers.

The losses were revealed only two weeks after Refco went public in 2005, and led to the company filing for bankruptcy protection. Bennett has been indicted on eight felony counts and is under house arrest in New York, awaiting trial.

The Refco Unsecured Creditor's Committee had demanded $1.7 billion in damages from Bawag, claiming the Austrian bank aided Bennett.

Bawag had consistently denied any wrongdoing in its dealings with Refco, but Bawag Chief Executive Ewald Nowotny has said a settlement was needed to secure the bank's future.

Bawag also acknowledged in its statement that it sought and received assistance from Bennett at Refco in concealing Bawag's own investment losses on its balance sheet, prosecutors said.

Garcia said in a statement that the government agreed to the non-prosecution deal because Bawag had cooperated fully with his office's investigation and because the company had agreed to pay substantial restitution.

He also noted that Bawag's depositors and innocent employees would be harmed by a criminal prosecution.

He said new management at Bawag since January has taken steps to investigate its involvement with the Refco fraud and disclosed to the public in Austria the deficiencies in its own balance sheet, which the prior management had been hiding for years.

Garcia said the non-prosecution agreement showed that his office would vigorously pursue those who defraud American investors, "even those who act entirely from abroad."

In a statement, Nowotny called the settlement "a good deal because it draws a line under the past. The way is now open for a positive future development of Bawag PSK."

The company said the agreement calls for the dropping of pending and potential actions by Refco, the creditor's committee and a class-action lawsuit by Refco security holders.

The company said it has settled its SEC case, agreeing to not violate securities laws in the future.

The bank said it also agrees to drop its own claims against Refco and the Refco creditors, but not its claims against Bennett, who has been indicted under eight felony counts and is being held under house arrest pending trial.

Stuart M. Grant, a lawyer for institutional investors who are lead plaintiffs in a securities class action stemming from the Refco collapse, said in a statement he was pleased with the speedy settlement.

"This is a positive first step in providing compensation to investors who were scammed by Refco's management and directors, along with its financial advisors, auditor and other professionals," he said.

Austrian Bank Pays $675M In Refco Probe (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, June 6, 2006

NEW YORK — More than six months after the former CEO of a financial services firm was indicted on charges of fraud, a government investigation into the matter seems to have gathered momentum.

The U.S. Attorney's office here announced Monday that an Austrian bank would pay at least $675 million to settle claims that it helped Refco and its former CEO, Phillip Bennett, hide more than $1 billion in debt from investors and creditors in the past five years.

The settlement was part of a non-prosecution agreement between federal prosecutors and the Bank fur Arbeit und Wirtschaft (Bawag), headquartered in Vienna. In a statement, Michael Garcia, the U.S. Attorney in Manhattan, said the bank merited the non-prosecution agreement because new management, installed in January after the scandal, was cooperating fully with the criminal investigation.

Although no mention was made of the bank's previous management, prosecutors and regulators from the Securities and Exchange Commission are continuing their investigation.

The deal lifts a cloud of uncertainty from the bank, while resolving most of the financial claims that have been lodged against it for its role in propping up Refco, now in Chapter 11. “We're pleased to have resolved all these matters,” said Andrew Levander of the Dechert law firm, which represents Bawag. “We believe this generally resolves all potential claims against Bawag.”

More than half of the $675 million settlement will go to Refco's creditors. About $84 million will be paid to Thomas Lee Partners, which bought a substantial stake in the firm in 2004, and another $100 million to shareholders who invested in Refco after its 2005 IPO.

According to court documents, Phillip Bennett, the former CEO of Refco, helped the company disguise hundreds of millions of dollars in client losses in the late 1990s by shifting those losses off the books to entities he controlled. The SEC accused Bawag of helping Bennett hide the losses from investors and creditors.

By disguising the losses, Refco was able to go public last August. But seven weeks after the IPO, Refco's management disclosed the losses, causing the stock price to plummet and eventually result in a bankruptcy filing. Bennett was indicted in November, the same month Bawag ousted its CEO, Johann Zwettler.

Sean Coffey, a class-action lawyer with Bernstein Litowitz Berger & Grossmann, said Bawag will pay $8 million to investors who lost money in the IPO, and guarantee to fund $100 million more if that money can't be recovered from a special restitution fund.

Coffey, who represented investors hurt by WorldCom's meltdown in 2002, says Refco's other banks should have known about the hidden losses. “It's not as big a case as WorldCom, but in may ways, it's more egregious than WorldCom,” he said. “It was just seven weeks from IPO to DOA.”

Will Enron Probe Spawn Further Criminal Cases? (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

The giant federal investigation of Enron Corp. has produced criminal charges against 32 people, and it is continuing. But will it ever spit out charges against anyone else?

That question hangs over the four-year-old probe in the wake of its greatest victory: the convictions last month of former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay and former President Jeffrey Skilling on conspiracy and fraud charges. The four-month trial of those two men was viewed as a culmination of the federal criminal probe that began in the wake Enron's collapse into bankruptcy in December 2001.

Theoretically, the federal Enron Task Force still has lots of potential targets for criminal charges. Some even came up by name during the Lay/Skilling trial. Court filings in that case said about 100 individuals have been identified as co-conspirators of the two men. Of those criminally charged, 16 have pleaded guilty, eight have been convicted at trial, two have been acquitted and the rest are awaiting trial.

Among the senior executives whose names have come up during the criminal proceedings is Jeff McMahon, who served various senior Enron positions; David Duncan, one of the company's outside auditors and the only man in the Enron saga to have pleaded guilty to a crime and then reversed himself; and Greg Whalley, who took over as Enron's president when Mr. Skilling unexpectedly quit in August 2001.

Attorneys for Messrs. McMahon and Duncan declined to comment. Mr. Whalley and his attorney couldn't be reached.

Some observers believe that with its biggest case now completed, the Task Force is unlikely to file new cases. Instead, it probably will wind down its efforts and focus on cleaning up the already filed charges. "Enron Beach is closed, and not just for the summer," says Jacob Frenkel, a former federal prosecutor now in private practice in Rockville, Md.

However, others say the government could feel obligated to bring additional cases even after nabbing the two top figures at the company. As a prosecutor, "you want to make sure that the people most culpable are held to account," says Jonathan Halpern, a former federal prosecutor now in private practice in New York.

Another possibility is that any future cases will be handled as civil matters by the Securities and Exchange Commission, which could seek large monetary penalties from individuals.

"Lots of people would like to see the SEC take a pretty aggressive tack on the remaining players," says John Hemann, a former member of the Enron Task Force who is now in private practice in San Francisco.

A Justice Department spokesman declined to comment on any possible future Enron-related criminal charges being filed. An SEC spokesman also declined to comment on possible additional civil actions related to the fallen energy giant. Already, the SEC has filed numerous civil cases in the Enron scandal, including still-pending actions against Messrs. Lay and Skilling.

The failure to file further criminal charges could intensify debate over an issue previously raised by defense attorneys for Messrs. Skilling and Lay. They contended the Task Force used the threat of further indictments to intimidate witnesses, adding that scores of former Enron executives had been unwilling to talk with them. In a court filing last fall, attorneys for Messrs. Skilling and Lay contended that the Task Force had "engendered, fostered and exploited an atmosphere of fear" among potential witnesses.

The defense noted that the last new individual indicted was Mr. Lay in July 2004. The latest new plea bargain came from a former Enron executive last July.

Prosecutors have consistently and vehemently denied misusing their power in the Enron investigation. Judge Sim Lake, who presided over the trial of Messrs. Lay and Skilling, largely turned down defense efforts to win relief in connection with the alleged prosecutorial misconduct. However, if the Task Force doesn't bring any further criminal cases, defense attorneys for Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay could raise this issue again on appeal. "Our view has long been that the only purpose for the Enron grand jury is to keep witnesses with exculpatory evidence far from the witness stand," says Daniel Petrocelli, Mr. Skilling's lead attorney.

Whatever the possible complications on the appellate front, no further prosecutions would be welcome news for individuals who seemingly have been in the government's crosshairs. Among them is Mr. McMahon, whose Enron jobs included corporate treasurer. As part of a 2004 plea bargain with the Task Force, former assistant treasurer Timothy DeSpain said he had made false representations to credit-rating companies about Enron's financial condition and had been "directed by my superiors...to manipulate fraudulently Enron's credit rating." At the court hearing on his plea, Mr. DeSpain identified Mr. McMahon as one of his superiors.

Mr. Whalley, the former Enron president, saw his name surface at the trial of Messrs. Lay and Skilling. Enron's former chief financial officer, Andrew Fastow, testified Mr. Whalley told him that he cut short a 2001 trip to meet with securities analysts because "I'd have to lie too much" about Enron's financial condition. Another former Enron executive and government witness,

David Delainey, testified Mr. Whalley attended a top-level company meeting in March 2001 where finishing touches were put on a plan to hide large losses incurred by the retail energy unit.

Then there is Mr. Duncan, the former head of the Enron audit team at the accounting firm of Arthur Andersen LLP. He became the Task Force's first known cooperating witness when he pleaded guilty in April 2002 to obstructing the federal Enron investigation by destroying company-related documents. He was a government witness when the Task Force won a felony conviction against Andersen related to the document destruction -- a conviction that helped put the venerable accounting firm out of business.

After the Supreme Court last year overturned the Andersen conviction because of improper jury instructions, Mr. Duncan successfully moved to have his plea vacated. He remains subject to new criminal charges, if any more are ever forthcoming from the Task Force.

For Law Firm, Serial Plaintiff Had Golden Touch (NYT)

By Julie Creswell And Jonathan D. Glater

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

When it came to investing, Howard J. Vogel seemed to possess a perverse kind of Midas touch.

In early October 1997, he bought 50 shares of Oxford Health Plans. Three weeks later, the stock nose-dived, and Mr. Vogel lost about $3,000 of his investment. Still, Mr. Vogel reaped $1.1 million.

How was that possible?

Mr. Vogel was a plaintiff in a shareholder lawsuit filed by the New York securities litigation powerhouse Milberg Weiss Bershad Hynes & Lerach against Oxford Health. In 2003, the company, along with other parties that were sued, paid $300 million to settle.

Most of the investors received pennies on the dollar for their losses. But Mr. Vogel, then a real estate mortgage broker in Englewood, N.J., was not just a hapless investor who bought the wrong stock at the wrong time.

Mr. Vogel now says, according to a plea agreement with federal prosecutors, that he and members of his family were actually linchpins in a long-running arrangement that helped Milberg Weiss snare the lucrative lead counsel position in the Oxford Health and many other securities lawsuits, reaping hundreds of millions of dollars in legal fees.

Mr. Vogel, who has since moved to Florida, is a central figure in the government's case against Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, as the law firm is now called. Last month, a federal grand jury in Los Angeles indicted the firm and two of its name partners on several criminal charges, including racketeering conspiracy and money laundering. The firm is accused of making $11.3 million in illegal secret payments to Mr. Vogel and two others who served as plaintiffs in more than 150 lawsuits.

The firm contends it has done nothing improper and has vowed to fight the charges against it. But Milberg Weiss is struggling to keep its lawyers and clients from walking away. Several lawyers have left the firm and a number of institutional investors, including the New York state employee pension fund, have removed it as counsel in high-profile lawsuits.

The Oxford Health lawsuit was widely watched at the time, and it takes on new significance in light of Mr. Vogel's admissions and prosecutors' charges.

It provides a window into how, even after Congress passed legislation in 1995 aimed at undermining Milberg Weiss's dominance, the firm worked feverishly to find ways to maneuver around the new landscape.

Yesterday, William W. Taylor, a lawyer at Zuckerman Spaeder who represents Milberg Weiss, said in response to questions: "On behalf of the firm, the Oxford case was handled in the highest traditions of Milberg's practice. The result obtained was exemplary and the firm is proud of the result in that case as it is in all of its cases."

The 1995 law, the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act, or P.S.L.R.A., was intended to make it harder for plaintiffs' lawyers to file lawsuits after merely finding a single investor who held the stock of the company to be sued. Under the law, courts were required to select the investor with the largest loss as lead plaintiff, whose lawyer then coordinated the lawsuit.

The law was meant to rein in lawyers who simply eyeballed companies that were in trouble and ran to the courthouse with a plaintiff in tow at the first hiccup in the share price.

In many ways, the law seems to have had the intended effect. Since the legislation was enacted, institutional investors like big state pension funds have led the charge in numerous shareholder lawsuits, like those involving Enron and WorldCom.

Still, the majority of federal securities lawsuits settled last year — 62 percent — had individuals as lead plaintiffs, according to NERA Economic Consulting in White Plains.

Indeed, in the cases cited by federal prosecutors in the indictment of Milberg Weiss, the law firm's frequent clients were individual investors, including Mr. Vogel; his wife, Eugenia Gladstone Vogel; and his stepson, Emile Gladstone. Mr. Vogel's lawyer would not comment for this article.

Yet while Mr. Vogel and his family were frequently named as plaintiffs, they were not always successful in winning lead-plaintiff status. That would not mean that the case was a total loss for Milberg Weiss, but its share of any settlement would almost certainly be smaller.

That is because the lead counsel in a lawsuit typically has considerable influence over how the fees will be awarded to other law firms after a settlement is reached, according to plaintiffs' lawyers.

"What typically happens in a securities litigation is you have one case filed and then you have three or four copycat" complaints, said John H. Henn, a defense lawyer at Foley Hoag in Boston. "Then they agree among themselves about on who would make the best lead plaintiff."

Or they have knock-down-drag-out courtroom brawls.

The decision over lead plaintiff in the Oxford Health case dragged on for nearly four years, took many bizarre twists along the way and featured a revolving cast of plaintiffs.

In the fall of 1997, malfunctions in Oxford Health's computer system led to unexpected losses and a steep drop in its stock price, which wiped out nearly $3 billion of the company's market value. In the days after the announcement, more than 50 class-action lawsuits were filed against the company, claiming that Oxford officials had known of the computer problems and their effects, but had misled investors by failing to disclose what they knew.

"The advantage to having a client and being on file with a class action is that you could then send out mailings or press releases, trying to find other plaintiffs who had bigger losses," said a plaintiffs' lawyer who did not want to be identified because he works in the field. "Even if you had a small client, it was at least a foot in the door that allowed you to get the process rolling."

Oxford Health was a big, juicy target for plaintiffs' lawyers.

A lawyer who tried to get his clients named lead plaintiffs in the Oxford case, Lee Squitieri, said: "It looked like a good case right out of the box. This was not what we called a 'prediction case' where the wrongdoing consisted of a prediction that turned out to be untrue. This was a better case. It involved concealing material information. That's a good case."

Milberg Weiss's biggest rival for lead plaintiff was the Colorado Public Employees' Retirement Association, which claimed it had lost more than $20 million when Oxford Health's stock fell. The mutual fund company PBHG, managed by Pilgrim Baxter & Associates, also wanted to be the lead plaintiff, contending that six of its funds had lost $4.3 million. It later dropped all but one of the funds from its claim, saying that the remaining one lost $65,000.

Undaunted by groups that, arguably, better met the requirements under the new law, Milberg Weiss aggregated a group of 35 individuals who it said had lost a total of $10 million.

Milberg Weiss's initial plaintiff in the case was Mr. Vogel. What was unknown at the time was that Mr. Vogel had acquired shares of the stock on the belief that it was on the verge of a collapse.

In late April, Mr. Vogel pleaded guilty to a single count of perjury — falsely stating in a court filing that he had not received payment other than his share of the settlement proceeds. In exchange for his cooperation, Mr. Vogel was not charged with being part of the conspiracy that Milberg Weiss is accused of. In addition, prosecutors agreed to recommend leniency in sentencing.

According to Mr. Vogel's plea agreement, he contacted "Partner E" — identified by lawyers involved in the case as Robert Sugarman, a former Milberg Weiss lawyer — and "discussed a potential securities fraud class-action lawsuit" against Oxford Health. Mr. Sugarman is said to be cooperating with federal prosecutors. Mr. Sugarman's lawyer declined to comment.

Dating back to 1991, Mr. Vogel had been a lead plaintiff in numerous lawsuits filed by Milberg Weiss for which he illegally received a cut of the law firm's fees — as much as 14 percent, according to court filings.

But in the case of Oxford, Mr. Vogel was told by Mr. Sugarman that his payment would be less than his usual percentage because the lawsuit was so large and "Milberg Weiss would have other payment obligations in the case," the indictment said.

In 1998, the lawyer representing the Colorado pension fund, Jay W. Eisenhofer, challenged whether Mr. Vogel's losses were substantial enough to meet the law's new requirements.

Patricia M. Hynes, a Milberg Weiss lawyer who was not named in the indictment and has not been accused of any wrongdoing, responded in a June 1998 hearing that among the 35 plaintiffs representing the "Vogel group" were three individuals who had lost $2 million to $3.4 million each.

Swayed by Ms. Hynes's argument, the judge overseeing the case, Charles L. Brieant of the Federal District Court in Manhattan, decided to proceed with three co-lead plaintiffs — the Colorado retirement fund, the PBHG mutual funds and the "Vogel Plaintiff Group," which now did not include Mr. Vogel because his losses were too small. Instead, it consisted of Gary Weber, Daniel Hurley and Michael Sabbia. Milberg Weiss was named co-lead counsel, along with Grant & Eisenhofer, which represented the Colorado fund, and Chitwood & Harley, which represented PBHG.

The size of the losses by the individual investors became a focal point after lawyers with Sullivan & Cromwell, which represented Oxford Health, began to dig into the trading records of the Milberg Weiss plaintiffs.

Milberg Weiss had already revised Mr. Hurley's losses, dropping them from $3.4 million to less than $1 million after realizing an error had been made in going through his trading records.

But the lawyers for Oxford argued that more than 4,000 transactions in Oxford options that they had each engaged in during the 13 months of the time period of the lawsuit had been omitted.

By their accounting, Mr. Hurley had actually made $700,747 in profits from his combined trading in stock and options, while Mr. Sabbia's loss totaled $315,000. That was a far cry from the $2 million loss that Ms. Hynes told the court in 1998 Mr. Sabbia had suffered.

Ms. Hynes claimed the Sullivan & Cromwell lawyers had used "discredited experts, flawed methodologies and erroneous 'alternative' calculations of plaintiffs' losses." By her firm's calculations, even taking the options trading activity into account, Mr. Sabbia still lost more than $1 million and Mr. Hurley more than $500,000. Those were "substantial losses by any measure," she stated in a 2000 memo to the court.

When contacted, Mr. Sabbia and Mr. Hurley said this was the first time they had been plaintiffs in lawsuits and both men said they did not receive any money from Milberg Weiss for their roles in the lawsuit. Mr. Sabbia added that he had no idea there was even any dispute surrounding the size of his loss in Oxford Health. "I lost tons," he said.

Judge Brieant rejected the defense lawyers' objections, ruling that the two Milberg Weiss clients had indeed suffered losses and could continue as lead plaintiffs.

There were problems with another Milberg Weiss plaintiff, Mr. Weber, who withdrew from the case in late 1999, weeks after he was deposed by lawyers for Oxford. A court document in the case that was recently unsealed is a letter to the judge from a Sullivan & Cromwell lawyer who said Mr. Weber "chose to lie" about his education, criminal record, history as a defendant in a civil case and his trading in Oxford securities. The National Law Journal reported on the letter in early 2000. A call to Mr. Weber's office was not returned.

Despite these setbacks, Milberg Weiss and the other lead plaintiffs' law firms reached the $300 million settlement in June 2003. Milberg Weiss's share of the legal fees totaled about $40 million, according to the Justice Department's indictment.

A few months later, Mr. Vogel contacted another Milberg Weiss lawyer, Steven G. Schulman, about his payments for Oxford and other cases, the indictment said. Mr. Schulman and another Milberg Weiss partner, David J. Bershad, were also indicted by the federal grand jury in Los Angeles last month and have taken leaves of absences from the firm. Mr. Bershad's lawyer said his client "vigorously" denied the charges. A call to Mr. Schulman's lawyer was not returned.

Investors Who Fought Arbitrator's Ties Win A Big Ruling Against Prudential (WSJ)

By Susanne Craig

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

An arbitrator once accused of being in Wall Street's pocket was part of a panel that unexpectedly returned a $14.5 million penalty against a major Wall Street firm.

In late May, a New York Stock Exchange arbitration panel unanimously ordered Prudential Securities Inc. to pay $11.8 million plus back interest to Charanjit and Harpreet Sahni, a Roslyn Heights, N.Y., couple who alleged that Prudential mismanaged some of their money. From 2000 to 2004, the couple's Prudential account dwindled to less than $1 million from $23 million. Wachovia Corp. acquired a 62% stake in Prudential Securities in July 2003 from Prudential Financial Inc., which retained a 38% stake.

A Prudential spokesman said of the ruling: "We don't believe this decision conforms with the law, and we are considering taking steps to have the decision vacated."

The case is significant not only for its size -- it is the third-largest award ever handed down by an NYSE panel -- but also because the couple's lawyer worked to have one of the three arbitrators who heard the case, a former Merrill Lynch & Co. employee named Robin Henry, removed from the panel.

In a lawsuit filed in a New York state court against the NYSE, attorney Tom Ajamie alleged that Ms. Henry, 76 years old, failed to disclose some of her ties to Wall Street that should have disqualified her. Among them: While the case was being heard, she was chairman of a charity that received donations from a number of big Wall Street firms.

Ms. Henry did disclose she worked at Merrill Lynch in the 1980s. She was a vice-president-level executive at the Wall Street brokerage house, according to her arbitrator profile, although her exact job description is unknown. In the lawsuit, Mr. Ajamie also alleged Ms. Henry often fell asleep during the arbitration proceedings and coached witnesses.

"Given the issues I faced with the arbitration process, I am shocked by the outcome," said Mr. Ajamie, of Houston. Ms. Henry didn't return calls for comment. The NYSE declined to comment.

Mr. Ajamie's legal challenge drew attention because investors have been complaining for years that the arbitration system is stacked in favor of Wall Street. The debate intensified amid a flood of new arbitration claims following the bursting of the Internet bubble in 2000.

Most investors who have a complaint against a Wall Street firm like Prudential end up in securities arbitration because firms almost always require clients to agree to this before they open an account. Panels typically have three arbitrators, two of whom don't come from Wall Street and are supposed to represent the public. Ms. Henry filled one of these slots in the case she heard. (The third arbitrator on these panels must come from Wall Street, an effort to ensure knowledge of the inner workings of the brokerage industry.)

Despite the fact that two slots are reserved for public arbitrators, plaintiff lawyers often complain they are biased. For instance, if an arbitrator previously worked as a Wall Street broker, the National Association of Securities Dealers generally classifies the person as public if he or she held the brokerage job for fewer than 20 years and has been out of the business for at least five years. The NYSE has its own rules, including some similar to the NASD's that leave the door open for former Wall Streeters like Ms. Henry to be classified as public. This issue was the subject of a page-one article in The Wall Street Journal in 2005.

In recent years, the Public Investors Arbitration Bar Association, an industry group for plaintiff lawyers, has called for the NASD, the forum where more than 90% of arbitrations are heard, and the NYSE to impose tighter rules on public arbitrators and abolish the industry-arbitrator slot, allowing investors to decide whether they want someone from Wall Street on their panel. This most recent award shows that even an arbitrator with past ties to Wall Street can deliver a big award, possibly undercutting the PIABA's efforts to tighten the rules.

"Regardless of this award, it is critical that the public arbitrator be truly public to ensure the integrity of the system," said PIABA President Robert Banks. "Furthermore, in this case there were questions about her lack of disclosure that still need to be addressed by NYSE."

Mr. Ajamie, who in 2001 won the largest award ever handed down by an NYSE arbitration panel, said that, despite his victory, the system is still in need of repair. "Just because one investor wins in a rare instance does not make the system honest or fair," he said.

Mr. Ajamie said the Sahnis had a discretionary account at Prudential, allowing the broker to trade in the account without having to get consent to trade. The broker, Mr. Ajamie said, increased the couple's exposure to technology companies just as the Internet sector was turning sour in 2000 and failed to diversify the portfolio.

Prudential, in its response to Mr. Ajamie's claim, said the Sahnis were sophisticated investors who knew the risks associated with their investments.

The award, although large, is half of what was sought. "After sifting all the evidence, the panel concluded that the responsibility for the investment losses should appropriately be shared," the panel wrote. The panel, in its page-long decision, concluded that Mr. Sahni and his broker were in effect "partners" in trading the account and "relied on each other constantly." The panel concluded that "Prudential as the ultimate party responsible" should pay approximately half the losses in the account.

Should Prudential appeal the award, it faces an uphill battle. Courts can vacate an award only on a handful of grounds: for bias, fraud or if they find there was "manifest disregard" of the law in the arbitration process.

Justice In The Dock (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

As a federal prosecutor, Andrew Weissman helped to put Arthur Andersen out of business. Now in private practice, he still defends the Andersen indictment, but he also says the Justice Department's guidelines on corporate indictments "give the government an inordinate amount of power" and need some reining in.

We're glad to hear it. And a step toward doing exactly that may soon come in the courtroom of Lewis A. Kaplan, the federal judge hearing the case against 16 defendants in the KPMG tax-fraud case. He is expected to rule on whether Justice overstepped its bounds in pursuing that case. If he rules against the government, it may lead to an overdue rethinking of how far prosecutors can go in demanding cooperation from companies under investigation.

At issue is the 2002 Thompson memo, written by then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson. The memo lays out standards for when a company should be considered cooperative. They include whether the firm has waived attorney-client privilege to give prosecutors access to confidential documents, or stopped paying the legal fees of "culpable" individuals.

In the KPMG case, Justice denies improperly pressuring the accounting firm to stop paying defense fees. And officially, KPMG has agreed. But KPMG is under a deferred prosecution agreement in the case for the next year and a half, meaning any action it takes that the Justice Department considers "uncooperative" could lead to a renewed indictment threat.

KPMG's general counsel, Joseph Loonan, testified last month that "wanting to have the government believe we were cooperating with them was one of the reasons that we wrote the letter" that informed one of the defendants, Jeffrey Stein, that the company would no longer be paying his legal bills. So even if the prosecution never made cutting off the defendants an explicit condition of avoiding indictment, KPMG clearly knew what was in the Thompson memo and acted accordingly. An internal memo from Justice and meeting notes from an IRS agent also make clear that the question of legal fees was on prosecutors' minds when weighing a KPMG indictment.

According to USA Today, Judge Kaplan was blunt about the matter, asking at a hearing, "Isn't it just perfectly obvious . . . that it is the position of the United States Department of Justice that a company facing possible prosecution hurts its case for a favorable outcome" by supporting the defense of its former employees. Obvious, indeed.

Earlier this year, a federal judge in New Hampshire also questioned the application of the Thompson memo against Enterasys Networks, a Massachusetts-based technology company that agreed to restore legal support for its former employees facing trial. But the KPMG case is much larger, and Judge Kaplan can lay down an important and necessary marker for corporate fraud cases going forward. Whether he imposes any sanction on the government, and of what sort, will show if Justice can get away with acting unjustly.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby's Lawyers Look To Documents For Defense (LAW)

By Sarah Kelley, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 5, 2006

Scooter Libby's lawyers are leaving clues to their strategy for his upcoming perjury trial.

I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby Jr. never meant to lie to the FBI or to a federal grand jury. Instead, his lawyers blame "confusion" or a "faulty memory" for his failure to disclose conversations he had with reporters about CIA operative Valerie Plame.

In other words, he simply forgot.

Given the hectic nature of his job as Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff, Libby's lawyers say, it's understandable that their client might have failed to remember "snippets of conversation" he felt were unimportant.

And even if he did talk to reporters about Plame, the defense argues, he had no motive to lie about it later because he didn't know her status was classified and therefore was unaware he had done anything wrong.

Then again, they contend, it might just be that the reporters who claim they talked to Libby about Plame are themselves confused.

Little by little, Libby's lawyers have revealed aspects of their defense in court filings and at pretrial hearings. They've indicated what players likely will be called as witnesses, and they've made requests for thousands of documents — actions that shed light on likely trial strategies.

"It looks like the defense is going in a few directions, one of which is that Valerie Plame was so unimportant that even if Libby was mistaken, he didn't intend to lie," says Peter Henning, a former lawyer with the Justice Department's Criminal Division and now a law professor at Wayne State University in Michigan. "It looks like they may also raise some challenges as to what was actually said in these fairly short conversations with reporters."

Libby is accused of lying to a grand jury and to FBI agents investigating claims that someone in the White House leaked Plame's identity to the media in the summer of 2003 to retaliate against her husband, Joseph Wilson, an outspoken critic of the Iraq war. When questioned about his knowledge of the leak, Libby allegedly lied about how and when he learned of Plame's CIA status, and with whom he discussed the classified information.

So far, the investigation launched by Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald in the fall of 2003 has nabbed only Libby, who was indicted in October 2005 and immediately resigned from the White House. He faces felony charges of perjury, obstruction, and making false statements. His trial is set for January 2007 in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

While Libby's lawyers have hinted at various defenses they are likely to raise at trial, the crux of their case is clear: Any discussions their client might have had about Plame were so unimportant that he easily could have forgotten them.

Perjury cases are particularly tough for prosecutors because they must prove a defendant blatantly lied — misleading statements are not grounds for a perjury conviction — and because they must prove intent, Henning says. That's why perjury cases are relatively rare, he adds.

Although the faulty-memory claim is sometimes successful, it could be a particularly difficult sell for Libby's lawyers to make in this case, says Solomon Wisenberg, a criminal-defense lawyer with Wisenberg & Wisenberg in the District.

"It looks like Fitzgerald will be able to present evidence . . . that this was such an important matter to the White House, and specifically to Libby, that professions of forgetfulness are not reasonable," says Wisenberg, who served as deputy independent counsel during the Whitewater and Monica Lewinsky investigations and conducted the grand jury questioning of then-President Bill Clinton.

The prosecution is expected to call a number of former and current government officials — including Cheney and former White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer — who allegedly had conversations with Libby about Plame's CIA status in the weeks before her identity was published in an article by syndicated columnist Robert Novak.

Other witnesses likely to be called by the prosecution include former New York Times reporter Judith Miller and Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper — both of whom say they were told of Plame's CIA status by Libby — as well as NBC journalist Tim Russert. Libby testified before the grand jury that it was Russert who first told him Plame worked for the CIA. Russert denies that claim.

Although it's common for perjury defendants to blame a faulty memory for any misstatements, that strategy is far from a sure thing. It's especially risky in a major political-corruption case, where there are dozens of witnesses ready to counter that claim.

During the Watergate scandal, President Richard Nixon advised aides to say "I don't remember" when they testified before the Senate Watergate Committee. Subsequently, John Mitchell, Nixon's attorney general, H.R. Haldeman, his chief of staff, and John Erlichman, a policy adviser, all were convicted of perjury.

In Libby's case, Wisenberg says, "It will be a really significant victory if they can pull it off."

Even Libby's defense team — led by two prominent white collar defense lawyers — acknowledges they face a difficult fight.

"I've got a tough haul in front of this jury," attorney Theodore Wells Jr. proclaimed during a May 5 motion hearing in which he sought discovery to help build Libby's defense. Libby hired Wells, a partner with Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison, along with William Jeffress Jr., a partner with Baker Botts, to represent him shortly after he was indicted. The pair has since launched an aggressive campaign to portray Libby as a dedicated public servant who, during his tenure at the White House, was consumed with issues of national importance. Wells did not respond to a request for comment, and Jeffress declined to comment, saying, "The judge has indicated that he would prefer that counsel not discuss the case with reporters and we have decided we should honor that request."

As Cheney's chief of staff, Libby often was focused on homeland security and the war in Iraq, frequently working 14 hours a day and reading up to 200 pages of material daily, according to his grand jury testimony.

To corroborate the defense that Libby was too busy to remember any "peripheral" conversations, his attorneys have sought a trove of government documents, including hundreds of White House briefings, intended to convey the workload Libby confronted.

But Fitzgerald claims this and other requests for vast amounts of paperwork, much of which is classified, are an attempt to derail the case through "graymail." The term "graymail" refers to a tactic used by government officials facing criminal charges who attempt to halt their prosecution by exposing national-security secrets.

It could prove to be a successful strategy in this case, some observers say, noting that if Libby is denied access to discovery and convicted, there could be grounds for appeal.

"It's definitely a pretrial strategy, and it's a good strategy that might work," Wisenberg says.

One potential defense that is rather unorthodox is the Libby team's suggestion that some of the government's witnesses are unreliable. Specifically, the defense argues reporters Cooper and Miller might be confused about what actually was said during their conversations with Libby.

The defense subpoenaed reporters' notes and drafts of stories related to the CIA leak, hoping to find inconsistencies between what reporters wrote and what they told the grand jury. After reviewing the documents last month, Judge Reggie Walton ordered Time to turn over an unpublished draft that Cooper wrote about his testimony. The draft differs slightly from other versions of the story.

Walton indicated he might eventually order The New York Times to turn over Miller's notes if what she says at trial differs from what is written. The judge, however, rejected the defense's request to subpoena additional materials from NBC.

In addition to questioning the reporters' reliability, the defense claims some former and current government officials likely to be called as witnesses by the prosecution might be biased as a result of "fierce bureaucratic infighting" among officials at the White House, State Department, and CIA.

One such witness, according to the defense, is Mark Grossman, former undersecretary at the Department of State. The defense points out that in recent months there has been media speculation that Grossman's former boss at the State Department, Richard Armitage, might have been the source who leaked Plame's identity to Novak. That would mean the department — not Libby — is responsible for the leak.

"Grossman's testimony may be colored by either his personal relationship with Mr. Armitage or his concern for the institutional interests of the State Department," the defense writes in court papers.

Libby's lawyers have requested any documents from the files of Grossman and other likely government witnesses that pertain to the CIA leak investigation or to Wilson's claims that the administration exaggerated intelligence to justify going to war.

During the May 5 motion hearing, Wells argued it was necessary for the defense to show Wilson made false statements. "The wife's role becomes minor when you see what was really going on," Wells said at the hearing.

But Walton wasn't convinced: "I'm just not going to let this case end up being a judicial resolution on the legitimacy of the war." On June 2, Walton issued an opinion largely denying the defense's discovery request for documents pertaining to Wilson.

Cheney made me do it

On July 6, 2003, Wilson published an op-ed in The New York Times debunking reports that Iraq had attempted to buy uranium from Niger and accusing the administration of twisting prewar intelligence.

The editorial, entitled "What I Didn't Find in Niger," sparked a political firestorm, prompting Cheney's office to refute Wilson's claims and attack his credibility. But Libby's lawyers maintain their client was focused on correcting the public record, not on Plame.

To challenge that assertion, Fitzgerald plans to call Cheney to testify. If the vice president is called, experts say it's unlikely he would be able to dodge providing testimony by citing executive privilege.

Fitzgerald also intends to introduce as evidence a copy of the Wilson op-ed bearing handwritten notes by Cheney. Those notes, according to Fitzgerald, reflect the "contemporaneous reaction" of the vice president and his chief of staff. One notation questions whether Wilson's wife sent him to Niger, suggesting her CIA status was an issue.

"The government will argue the vice president's involvement would have made the whole matter so salient to Libby that anything he said to investigators would have been incredibly thought out, not haphazard and forgetful," says Dan Richman, a law professor at Fordham University and a former federal prosecutor in the Southern District of New York.

But Richman says it's possible Libby's lawyers might use Cheney's testimony to their own advantage.

"I think there will be an effort by Libby to portray himself as a sacrificial lamb of higher-ups — that he was sort of put in a bad place and forced to protect others," he says. "If done right, it could lead jurors to have some sympathy for him."

Fitzgerald, Scooter And Us (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

"One of the mysteries of the recent yellowcake uranium flap is why the White House has been so defensive about an intelligence judgment that we don't yet know is false, and that the British still insist is true. Our puzzlement is even greater now that we've learned what last October's national intelligence estimate really said."

Those words appeared in this column on July 17, 2003 under the headline "Yellowcake Remix." Three years later they show we were right about Joe Wilson and his false allegation that President Bush lied in that year's State of Union address about Iraq seeking nuclear materials in Africa.

So imagine our surprise when Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald declared his intention last month to use that editorial as part of his perjury and obstruction case against former Vice Presidential aide Scooter Libby, who had also questioned Mr. Wilson's claims. It suggests that his case is a lot weaker than his media spin.

Mr. Libby wasn't a source for our editorial, which quoted from the October 2002 National Intelligence Estimate concerning the Africa-uranium issue. But Mr. Fitzgerald alleges in a court filing that Mr. Libby played a role in us getting the information, which in turn shows that "notwithstanding other pressing government business, [Libby] was heavily focused on shaping media coverage of the controversy concerning Iraqi efforts to obtain uranium from Niger."

The prosecutor comes close here to suggesting that senior government officials have no right to fight back against critics who make false allegations. To the extent our editorial is germane to this trial, in fact, it's because it puts Mr. Libby's actions into a broadly defensible context that Mr. Fitzgerald refuses to acknowledge. * * *

In the summer of 2003, Washington was abuzz with the allegations of Mr. Wilson, a former ambassador who had been to Africa on a fact-finding mission for the CIA. Mr. Wilson served as the then-anonymous source for several articles alleging deliberate inaccuracies in the Bush Administration's case for war with Iraq, before making the case himself in a July 6, 2003, New York Times op-ed. Mr. Wilson asserted that the now famous 16 words -- "The British Government has learned that Saddam Hussein recently sought significant quantities of uranium from Africa" -- were false. And, he wrote, Mr. Bush would have known they were false because he knew Mr. Wilson had already debunked the story.

Those allegations were serious indeed, and the White House had every right -- even a duty -- to answer them. Mr. Libby appears to have played a significant role in this effort, but that can hardly be considered a crime. Enter our July 17 editorial, which pointed out that far from debunking the Niger-uranium story, the information presented by the intelligence community to President Bush tended to support it.

Quoth the NIE: "Iraq also began vigorously trying to procure uranium ore and yellowcake"; and "A foreign government service reported that as of early 2001 Niger planned to send several tons of 'pure uranium' (probably yellowcake) to Iraq. . . . We do not know the status of this arrangement." We ran the editorial to give readers a more complete understanding of the yellowcake debate, and of Mr. Wilson's claims, than they were getting in other media accounts.

A year later the 16 words were declared to be "well-founded" by Britain's high-level Butler inquiry, as well as by a bipartisan report from the U.S. Senate Intelligence Committee. To the extent Mr. Libby helped the actual contents of the 2002 NIE find their way into the public debate -- as opposed to Mr. Wilson's fantasy version -- he performed a public service.

Regarding our editorial, Mr. Fitzgerald does at least note that he "will not contend that the defendant's actions in this regard were criminal or otherwise unauthorized." But he also seems to imply that those actions suggest a pattern of malfeasance and a motive for the perjury and obstruction he alleges. Yet Mr. Fitzgerald has not indicted Mr. Libby, or anyone else, for leaking the CIA identity of Mr. Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame -- which was his original mandate from the Justice Department. His actual charge of obstruction comes down to the fact that Mr. Libby and several reporters have different recollections of their conversations.

All of this matters because it suggests that Mr. Fitzgerald is scrambling even now to explain why a seasoned attorney such as Mr. Libby would lie to a grand jury. The prosecutor's original indictment doesn't mention a motive. And his mention of our editorial suggests he's now trying to invent a motive out of Mr. Libby's attempt to defend the White House from Mr. Wilson's manifestly false allegations at the onset of a Presidential election campaign. (Mr. Wilson joined the Kerry campaign until he was dropped after the official probes destroyed his credibility.)

There is all the difference in the world between seeking to respond to the substance of Mr. Wilson's charges, as Mr. Libby did, and taking revenge on him by blowing his wife's cover, which was the motive originally hypothesized by Bush critics for the Plame exposure. The more of Mr. Fitzgerald's case that becomes public, the more it looks like he has made the terrible mistake for a prosecutor of taking Joe Wilson's side in what was essentially a political fight.

7 Charged With Hollywood-linked Drug, Money Laundering Scheme (AP)

By Gary Gentile, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 6, 2006

LOS ANGELES (AP) Seven people, including two affiliated with Limelight Films Inc., a film and TV distribution company, have been charged as part of a two-year investigation into allegations of drug trafficking, money laundering and arms dealing.

Bruno D'Esclavelles, 45, chief executive of Limelight, and Alexander de Basseville, 35, who is affiliated with Limelight's parent, the Swiss firm ADB Swiss S.A., were arrested in Alexandria, Va., and charged with conspiracy to distribute the drug Ecstasy.

Federal officials say de Basseville met several times over two years with undercover agents posing as international drug traffickers.

De Basseville offered to launder drug money, supply weapons and broker drug deals for the agents, according to a press release from the U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia and a separate release from the Drug Enforcement Administration.

Calls to the U.S. attorney's office were not returned Monday.

Authorities say that on two occasions, de Basseville and D'Esclavelles took cash, which they were told came from drug sales, and laundered it through Limelight Films.

In February, de Basseville and D'Esclavelles allegedly arranged for an associate, Thomas Frischknecht of the Netherlands, to sell 10,000 Ecstasy pills to undercover agents. The pills were shipped to the agent in Virginia, authorities said.

Authorities say de Basseville and D'Esclavelles later agreed to sell an additional 500,000 pills.

DOJ_NMG_0031815

Other meetings between the agents and the defendants took place in Geneva, Miami, Amsterdam and Los Angeles, authorities charge.

Frischknecht, 26, of Switzerland was arrested in Amsterdam and charged with conspiracy to import Ecstasy.

Authorities also charged Fabian Pruvot, 37, David Liberman, 32, Andrew Prikazhikov, 31, and Brian Delansky, 33, all of Los Angeles.

Prikazhikov and Delansky were charged with conspiracy to posses firearms in furtherance of drug trafficking.

Pruvot and Liberman were charged with conspiracy to launder money.

John Zwerling, an attorney representing D'Esclavelles, said his client denied the charges.

``This was a production that was conceived of, scripted and directed by agents of the United States government," Zwerling said. ``There is zero indication that my client had ever done anything illegal in his life."

A call to an attorney representing de Basseville was not immediately returned Monday.

De Basseville is engaged to Kiera Chaplin, the 23-year-old granddaughter of actor Charlie Chaplin and the great-granddaughter of playwright Eugene O'Neill, according to her manager Mitch Zamarin. Chaplin, who is listed on the Limelight Web site as the company's chairman, was not charged.

Pruvot, Liberman, Prikazhikov and Delansky could not be reached for comment.

DEA Busts Hollywood Ecstasy Ring (ABC)

By Jason Ryan

ABC News, June 6, 2006

A man engaged to Charlie Chaplin's granddaughter was arrested in a drug sting targeting a group that trafficked the drug ecstasy from Europe to Los Angeles and used a Hollywood movie studio to launder money, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

DEA officials say Alexandre De Basseville, who is engaged to Chaplin's granddaughter Kiera Chaplin, and Bruno D'Esclaelles, the CEO of Limelight Films, met on several occasions with undercover federal agents during the past two years and attempted to set up deals to bring 500,000 ecstasy pills into the United States.

De Basseville also allegedly discussed the possibility of weapons trafficking with undercover agents, but no weapons were ever exchanged in the deals.

The DEA says members of the drug ring took what they believed were drug proceeds and laundered the money using their Los Angeles business, Limelight Films. Chaplin is the chairwoman of the company, but she is not believed to be involved in the investigation, according to a federal law enforcement official.

De Basseville is an executive board member of ADB Swiss S.A., a Swiss-based financial services company that owns Limelight Films, Inc. Four other top executives at Limelight, including Chief Financial Officer David Liberman, were arrested in connection with the case.

Calls made by ABC News to Limelight's offices in Los Angeles were not returned Monday evening after the DEA announcement.

The Limelight Web site says of Chaplin: "As the granddaughter of Charlie Chaplin, her vision was to bring back her grandfather's legacy to the United States and develop new opportunities in the film arena."

Swiss national Thomas Frischknecht, who allegedly supplied De Basseville and D'Esclaelles with access to the ecstasy pills, was also arrested in the Netherlands. In February 2006, Frischknecht sent a package with 10,000 ecstasy pills into the U.S., but the pills were actually received by an undercover federal agent working on the case, according to the DEA.

After the shipment, Frischknecht, De Basseville and D'Esclaelles agreed to sell another 500,000 ecstasy pills to the agent posing as a drug trafficker. But all three were arrested before the second shipment was made.

Amid Government Data Gathering, Businesses Mull Their Options (INFOWEEK)

By Larry Greenemeier, InformationWeek

Information Week, June 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0031816

A Justice Department proposal that ISPs retain records for two years is just the latest in a growing list of data collection initiatives by federal agencies.

To protect the public from terrorism and other hazards, the U.S. government mines its vast databases for signs of trouble. Increasingly, the feds are requesting--even demanding--that businesses share their data, too. But such cooperation isn't cheap or easy, and several industries are pushing back to protect their customers' privacy.

Not long after forcing Internet companies to submit search terms, search result URLs, and other information as part of its enforcement of the Child Online Protection Act, the Justice Department is going a step further. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is now asking the likes of Google, AOL, and Verizon to keep subscriber information and other customer data for at least two years, just in case the government needs it for criminal investigations. Currently, Internet companies are under no obligation to save that data at all.

People want the government to have the data needed to fight crime and terrorism; it's the potential misuse of personally identifiable data--names, addresses, Social Security numbers, Web search histories--that is deeply worrisome.

Just last week, the European Court of Justice ruled that an airline passenger data-sharing agreement between the European Commission and the Department of Homeland Security's Customs and Border Protection division violates European privacy law. The arrangement was crafted in 2004 to keep out terrorists. The two sides have four months to rethink the terms of how data gets shared, at the risk of disrupting trans-Atlantic travel if they don't (see story, "Illegal EU Data-Sharing Deal With The U.S. Shows Transparency Not Always Enough").

These are only the latest examples of federal harvesting of company data. The National Security Agency is reportedly building a massive database of phone call records provided by AT&T and other telecom companies. Trucking companies share electronic manifests as their rigs cross into the United States, an information exchange that will become mandatory later this year. Financial firms report suspicious transactions. Subpoenas are used to get data from individual companies.

The feds have been mostly successful in getting businesses to cooperate. Following the 9/11 terrorist attacks, the government looked to transportation companies, especially airlines, to hand over information that can be used to match passengers and transportation workers with names on terrorist watch lists. However, while they initially complied with Homeland Security projects such as the Computer Assisted Passenger Pre-Screening System and Secure Flight, some airlines have said they're uneasy with the government's ability to safeguard their data from loss or misuse.

Privacy advocates worry about the volume of data being collected (millions of records and many terabytes of data), the length of time it's stored, and the level of detail. Under the existing agreement, participating European airlines provide Customs and Border Protection with up to 34 bits of information on each passenger, ranging from name and method of payment to meal requests. Homeland Security can keep the data up to 3-1/2 years. Those terms are now subject to renegotiation before the Sept. 30 deadline set by the EC court.

Yet even as one data-sharing arrangement comes under scrutiny, another arises. The U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention has requested that international airlines store passenger emergency contact information for six months in the event of a bird flu outbreak. "This requires still more manpower and more costs," says David Henderson, manager of information for the Association of European Airlines.

Subpoena Power

Government requests for data come in the form of a subpoena or a "national security letter." A subpoena must be approved by a judge and can be fought in court if it's too vague or burdensome to a business, as Google did earlier this year. A national security letter is a special type of subpoena issued by the FBI without the need for a judge's signature, entitling the FBI to bank, insurance, phone, ISP, and credit report records (but not medical records). Unlike a subpoena, a company receiving a national security letter cannot discuss the fact that it has received one.

The FBI appears to be liberal in its use of national security letters. The Washington Post reported last year that the government issues 30,000 such letters annually. A Justice Department spokesman said that's inaccurate but declined to provide a better estimate. The Justice Department doesn't track the number of subpoenas issued by its own agencies or by the 94 U.S. attorneys' offices.

Nor does Justice monitor the costs those subpoenas impose on recipients, which can be considerable. At AOL, a dozen employees handle about 12,000 law enforcement requests a year, a spokesman says. About one in five of those requests results in some form of information sharing.

Meantime, the ground rules are changing. Presaging the U.S. push for mandated electronic archives from ISPs, the European Parliament and Council in December approved rules that require telecom companies to retain phone and Internet records for two years for anti-terror investigations. Microsoft, in a statement, says it's reviewing its internal data-retention policies "in light of European Union data-retention regulations."

Businesses sometimes resist government requests for archived data and other information. Google did and, following a court ruling, ended up providing less data than the Justice Department originally requested. "What the ruling means is that neither the government nor anyone else has carte blanche when demanding data from Internet companies," Google associate general counsel Nicole Wong writes on the company blog.

Brett Glass, owner of Lariat.net, a small ISP in Laramie, Wyo., says his company has never been asked for customer data and would put up a fight if it were. "If the federal government--be it Congress, the FCC, or an executive branch agency--were to mandate that we supply it, we'd consider filing suit or joining a suit to void such a request," he says. "We owe it to our users."

For companies that do share data, there can be technical challenges, especially if they don't have a central data warehouse, consultant Richard Winter says. Government agencies might seek records scattered across IT systems that are difficult to pull together. Many companies have a hard enough time sifting disparate data for their own use, Winters notes.

Data sharing is a touchy subject. EarthLink, Microsoft, and Visa declined to discuss it. Google admits to receiving government subpoenas, but it won't say how many.

Disarray And Distrust

Homeland Security's agreement with the EC is spelled out far better than its Secure Flight program. The Transportation Security Administration admitted in October that Secure Flight's plan to integrate real-time transactional data, such as passengers with boarding passes, with other information, such as terrorist watch lists, would be difficult to implement without major upgrades to airline IT systems.

Some airlines have been publicly chastised for not doing more to protect customer privacy. JetBlue drew criticism when it was revealed in 2003 that it allowed Acxiom, acting as a contractor, to transfer 5 million records for more than 1.5 million passengers to Torch Concepts, which was developing a data mining tool to analyze the characteristics of people seeking access to military installations. JetBlue had agreed to participate after a written request from the TSA. JetBlue CEO David Neeleman later acknowledged that the data transfer was a violation of his company's privacy policy.

With safety at issue, the airline industry understands the need to participate in government-mandated data sharing. But industry officials in the States and Europe are urging the U.S. government to better organize its efforts. Airlines don't want to be subject to both the TSA Secure Flight program and Customs and Border Protection's Advanced Passenger Information program, which requires that passenger information be communicated to the government within 15 minutes of a flight's departure to the United States.

"Both should be designed to function through coordinated information feeds and avoid unnecessary duplication of communications, programming, and information requirements," James May, CEO of the Air Transport Association, and Ulrich Schulte-Strathaus, secretary general of the Association of European Airlines, wrote in an October letter to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. May and Schulte-Strathaus requested that Secure Flight and Advanced Passenger Information supersede the government's no-fly lists and that the amount of redundant data required from the airlines be reduced.

Financial services companies are likewise no strangers to handing data to the government, and the hunt for terrorist financing has only added to the burden. Suspicious Activity Report filings to the Treasury Department's Financial Crimes Enforcement Network have increased every year since they were first required in 1996, with 919,000 such reports sent last year alone.

Banks have expressed anxiety over Suspicious Activity Reports, especially in light of the Patriot Act, which punishes noncompliant companies with fines of up to $1 million a day or, in the extreme, by taking away bank charters. "It's definitely changed the compliance environment for banks since 9/11," says Kelly Etherington, corporate compliance manager for Zions

Bancorp, which operates more than 450 branches and offices. Like other banks, Zions has always reported suspicious activity, but it finds law enforcement requests are up in the last few years.

Suspicious Activity Reports "create a very significant burden" on financial services companies without any clear benefits to them, says John Carlson, a director with BITS, a consortium of the 100 largest U.S. financial services companies. Given the industry's heavy regulations and what Carlson calls its culture of protecting customer privacy, he says financial services companies generally wouldn't provide data to a government agency unless required to by law or a court-issued document.

Biggest Fears

What might government agencies do with all the business and Internet data they're collecting? Some skeptics worry about a single massive database where all kinds of information gets crunched together, providing a complete picture of Joe Citizen. That seems a remote possibility, though researchers at the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency did work on a system several years ago that would have mined data in that way to identify terrorists. That program, dubbed Total Information Awareness, was scrapped more than two years ago under public pressure.

A different but related concern is that data collected for one purpose could get used for another. USA Today last week reported that the FBI plans to use its database of DNA evidence, collected from convicted criminals and some others upon arrest, to help identify thousands of dead people whose identities aren't known.

There's also the concern that once the feds gets their hands on data, they can't be trusted to secure it. Look no further than last month's news of a stolen laptop and external hard drive containing data on 26.5 million military veterans and family members. The Veterans Affairs Department has been fingered for its lack of security before, but it's not the only agency with low marks. Security becomes even more of an issue as more data accumulates and gets retained longer.

Encryption is one solution, but encrypted data can't be searched easily and is thus less useful to the government. Nothing, it seems, about data sharing between businesses and government is destined to be easy.

Dems Hold Steering Meeting As Jefferson Dilemma Looms (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, June 6, 2006

With emotions still raw over House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) recent request that Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) relinquish his seat on the Ways and Means Committee while he faces a government bribery investigation, House Democrats are convening a meeting this evening of their Steering and Policy Committee.

The committee is charged with determining panel memberships, among other matters..

It was unclear at press time whether the steering committee, which is stocked with Pelosi loyalists, would discuss Jefferson's situation or vote to take him off the tax-writing panel.

A notice on the meeting stated that the gathering would address Democratic messaging efforts.

But it could be an indication that Pelosi is seeking to overcome the first hurdle in the process of formally ejecting Jefferson from the panel. The matter could then proceed to a potentially contentious vote in the House Democratic Caucus followed by a vote on the House floor.

Rep. Mel Watt (D-N.C.), chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus and one of Jefferson's most vocal defenders, said through an aide last night that he had not been made aware of the meeting. Watt does not sit on the Steering and Policy Committee.

Democrats To Discuss Jefferson (RC)

By Steve Kornacki

Roll Call, June 6, 2006

Rep. William Jefferson's (La.) tenuous standing as a member of the Ways and Means Committee will be discussed when the Democratic Steering and Policy Committee convenes a members-only session, tentatively set for late Tuesday afternoon.

The committee does not hold regularly scheduled meetings, but on Monday, members were told to be present Tuesday for what was billed as an important event: a discussion of the party's message and agenda.

But the timing — it was only a few session days ago that Jefferson ignored a demand from House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) that he leave Ways and Means immediately — promptly ignited specualtion that Pelosi is planning to ask the Steering and Policy Committee to recommend to the full Democratic Caucus that Jefferson be stripped of his assignment on the exclusive panel.

"If that's what they're going to do, they probably won't say it until everyone's there," a Democratic aide noted.

A senior Democratic aide, however, said that Pelosi is expected to broach the Jefferson subject but said that she is likely to tread carefully, perhaps only sampling opinion instead of calling for specific actions.

"I don't even know that she's in a position to do anything about it," the aide said.

(With Members trickling back to Washington, D.C., after the Memorial Day recess, there was talk late Monday that the Steering and Policy meeting might be moved to Wednesday morning. A final decision is expected Tuesday morning.)

Other aides also expressed doubt that Pelosi would ask for an actual vote on Jefferson's status at the meeting, but in showing a desire to press ahead on the matter, she is testing, at least potentially, her relationship with the Congressional Black Caucus.

The 59-year-old Jefferson, an eight-term House veteran, has not been charged with any crime. But, while maintaining his innocence, even the Congressman has acknowledged that an indictment on bribery charges is likely, and soon.

Pelosi requested his resignation from the panel "in the interest of upholding the high ethical standard of the House Democratic Caucus," a move that figured to score points with a general public not known for its willingness to give ethically suspect politicians the benefit of the doubt. But it also rankled Jefferson's 42 colleagues in the CBC, who communicated to Pelosi their readiness to go to war with her publicly if she took any further steps to force Jefferson out once he refused her request.

There are two avenues available to Pelosi to pry Jefferson from the committee. She could simply invoke her status as Minority Leader and bring a privileged resolution to the House floor, a death knell for Jefferson unless Republicans for some reason rallied to his defense. But such a move could stir broad resentment among House Democrats, who might interpret it as a precedent for future heavy-handedness.

Pelosi's other option involves building consensus within the Democratic Caucus, first by winning a recommendation from the 50-member Steering and Policy Committee and then by making her case to the full Caucus.

As the Minority Leader, Pelosi has packed Steering and Policy with some of her closest allies, including Reps. George Miller (Calif.) and Rosa DeLauro (Conn.), who serve as the body's co-chairs. The primary function of Steering and Policy is to make recommendations on committee appointments — recommendations that typically, and not coincidentally, jibe with Pelosi's own preferences.

Still, there are nine CBC members on the Steering and Policy Committee, including Reps. John Lewis (Ga.) and Charlie Rangel (N.Y.), who were among the sextet of senior CBC members who warned Pelosi to her face two weeks ago about the dangers of pursuing Jefferson's departure too aggressively.

Pelosi's office was tight-lipped Monday about the looming meeting. Jennifer Crider, Pelosi's press secretary, said the meeting was part of the Democrats' "ongoing message efforts."

Several Democratic aides said they are inclined to believe that Pelosi will do little more than take the temperature on the Jefferson question. And they also said they expect the Democratic message and agenda will, as touted, be discussed.

If Steering and Policy were to endorse Jefferson's removal, the matter would be taken up by the full Caucus, which will next hold a weekly meeting on Wednesday morning. Those close to Pelosi say she did her homework before calling for Jefferson's head and have expressed confidence she would prevail in a vote of all 203 Democrats — even if the CBC's opposition ensures the maneuver wouldn't be entirely tidy.

CBC leaders have told Pelosi they will not resist any reprisals against Jefferson — if and when he's indicted. Until then, they are willing to give her room to posture, as long as she doesn't formally act. Bringing up the subject at a Steering and Policy Committee meeting without asking for a vote would, it appears, preserve this balance.

The latest hint that Jefferson's days on Ways and Means might be drawing to a close is only fueling speculation about his successor.

The most popular theory has Pelosi tapping Rep. Artur Davis (Ala.) to fill a slot that many believe is unofficially earmarked for a CBC member from a Southern state. Given the current tension, Pelosi might find particular urgency in trying to assuage the CBC with a Jefferson replacement pick.

But there also are suggestions that some CBC veterans, who recall that Davis ousted Earl Hilliard, a longtime CBC member, in 2002, might prefer that the spot go to someone else — Elijah Cummings (Md.), for instance, who already has expressed a desire to replace Rep. Benjamin Cardin on Ways and Means when his fellow Marylander leaves the House at the end of the year.

Other names making the rounds include Reps. Joe Crowley (N.Y.), Brian Baird (Wash.), Shelley Berkley (Nev.), Bob Etheridge (N.C.), Ron Kind (Wis.), and Charlie Melancon (La.). One rumored scenario actually has Pelosi putting off any appointment until after the November election. If the Democrats retake the majority, the thinking goes, she would likely have four new Ways and Means seats to dole out, meaning she might not have to say no to as many of her members seeking to sit on the panel.

Ex-Official Testifies He Provided 'Insight And Advice' To Abramoff (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 5 — A former White House budget official acknowledged Monday that he had provided "a lot of insight and advice," including government information not available to the public, to the lobbyist Jack Abramoff in 2002.

But the former aide, David H. Safavian, testified that he had not violated ethics rules in accepting the lobbyist's invitation for a golfing trip to Scotland that summer.

Mr. Safavian insisted in testimony in federal court here that he had not lied to government investigators when he was asked about the golf trip, although he acknowledged giving them inaccurate information about some contacts with Mr. Abramoff, a former lobbying partner.

Mr. Safavian, who is charged with lying about his relationship with Mr. Abramoff and the circumstances of the golf trip, attributed the inaccuracies to a faulty memory, a claim that brought expressions of disbelief from prosecutors.

Mr. Safavian is the first person to go on trial as a result of the influence-peddling scandal centered on Mr. Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to trying to corrupt public officials.

In testimony that concluded the defense case, Mr. Safavian acknowledged under cross-examination that he had been helpful to Mr. Abramoff in the summer of 2002 in gathering information about two parcels of government-owned property that the lobbyist was interested in acquiring from the General Services Administration, where Mr. Safavian then worked. He later went to work in the White House budget office as the director of federal procurement policy.

"I gave him a lot of insight and advice," Mr. Safavian testified, acknowledging that he had set up a meeting at the services agency to discuss one property for Mr. Abramoff's wife on Aug. 2, 2002, the day before his departure for Scotland.

But he said he had set up several similar meetings at the agency, a comment that led the trial prosecutor, Peter R. Zeidenberg, to ask in a sarcastic tone, "Were those for lobbyists who were taking you on vacation?'

Mr. Safavian replied in an angry tone, "That had nothing to do with it."

Mr. Safavian's trial is in abeyance for the rest of the week because of scheduling difficulties involving the trial judge, Paul L. Friedman, and as a result of a judicial conference that will largely close the federal court here on Thursday and Friday. The case is scheduled to go to the jury after closing arguments next Monday.

Safavian: Advice To Abramoff Did Not Cross Line (GOVEXEC)

By Jenny Mandel

Government Executive, June 6, 2006

David Safavian, former head of the Office of Management and Budget's procurement policy division, took the stand in his own defense for the second time Monday, describing how he provided assistance to his friend and former colleague Jack Abramoff in ways that approached, but did not cross, lines of propriety.

Safavian faces charges that he lied about his dealings with Abramoff to obtain clearance from the General Services Administration ethics office to go on a golfing trip to Scotland while serving as the chief of staff at that agency, and that he subsequently obstructed two investigations into his participation in the trip.

As the final witness in his own defense, Safavian testified that he had advised Abramoff on efforts to take over two GSA-controlled properties, as was clear from a large number of e-mail messages presented as evidence by Justice Department lawyers earlier in the case. But on Friday, Safavian had testified that while he had not expected some of that assistance to actually help, he had moved his friend's queries forward so Abramoff could get answers from the appropriate GSA decision-makers.

Safavian said he had arranged a meeting and provided information about a large GSA property in White Oak, Md., that Abramoff hoped to lease for a religious school he and his wife founded, despite it being clear that the effort to lease the property would not ultimately succeed. He said he had tried to explain that the religious nature of the school and potentially hazardous condition of the buildings ruled out leasing the property to Abramoff's Eshkol Academy.

"If you knew Jack Abramoff, you'd know he's a man who doesn't take 'no' for an answer," Safavian said to explain why he expended time and effort to provide information about the property and supported an eventual meeting between GSA officials and representatives of the school, including Abramoff's wife. That effort did not constitute "seeking to do business before the GSA," Safavian argued, in part because he felt it had virtually no chance of panning out.

At another point, Safavian attributed differences between his own decision-making and that of a GSA colleague to his having joined the federal government from Capitol Hill. Before entering GSA as chief of staff, Safavian had worked on the Hill as chief of staff for Rep. Chris Cannon, R-Utah, as well as in other staff positions. He also had worked previously as a lobbyist at the firms Preston Gates Ellis LLP and Janus-Merritt Strategies.

Safavian testified that in the process of advising Abramoff regarding the lobbyist's efforts to acquire the Old Post Office building in Washington, D.C., he at one point realized that pushback from GSA colleagues "was a sign for me that I shouldn't be so close with Jack Abramoff."

In a tough line of questioning that continued from Friday into Monday, federal prosecutor Peter Zeidenberg pushed Safavian to explain why he had not more closely examined his own invitation to join the lobbyist on the 2002 golfing trip to Scotland that has since landed several participants in hot water. Zeidenberg questioned why Safavian had accepted Abramoff's figure of $3,100 as his share of the trip, showing photographs of the luxury hotels where the group stayed and the charter airplane they had flown on.

Government lawyers presented credit card and automated teller machine receipts as evidence that Safavian had been spending generously, and said Abramoff's pre-trip estimate of $3,100 could not have been expected to include both scheduled and spontaneous costs. Multiple rounds of golf at $400 each, $100 caddie tips and rounds of expensive Scotch for the group should have led the defendant to question the modest sum he had paid in advance of leaving the United States, Zeidenberg argued.

Safavian answered many of the questions with the response that it had not occurred to him to verify the individual expenses, and that he had no reason to think Abramoff would have under-reported the cost of the trip.

"He knew I didn't want to take a gift," Safavian said. "He also knew I was concerned about appearances [of a conflict of interest]. Why would he sandbag me that way?"

Asked if he was still friends with Abramoff, Safavian said, "We haven't spoken in a long time but yes, I will always consider him my friend."

Following a morning of close questioning on Monday, Safavian was apparently not feeling well. A nurse entered the courtroom at a break for lunch, and when court resumed, the judge indicated that should Safavian feel unwell, proceedings could be stopped for a break.

The defense continued uninterrupted before concluding in the afternoon, however. Due to scheduling conflicts, closing arguments in the case will be heard Monday, June 12, following which the jury will begin its deliberations.

Takes Stand To Counter Harm Of Tapes, 'bag Man' Testimony (MCA)

By Lawrence Buser

Memphis Commercial Appeal, June 6, 2006

June 6, 2006 Former state senator Roscoe Dixon took the stand Monday in his bribery trial, hoping to undo five days of testimony and secret recordings that prosecutors say illustrate a politician on the take.

Dixon, who resumes the stand today, testified for about 45 minutes near the end of the day, telling jurors of his family background, of working and attending college, of 16 years of service in the Army and Tennessee National Guard and his life as a legislator from 1982 to 1994.

"Lobbyists play a very powerful role," said Dixon, who addressed jurors in a personable manner and sometimes added gentle humor to his answers. "They are promoting their interests and protecting their concerns. Everybody wants to get your ear.

"There are dinners and receptions. You can go up there weighing 160 pounds and leave weighing 240. It's hard to pass up all that food."

Dixon is charged in a five-count indictment with conspiracy to commit extortion and bribery for allegedly accepting $9,500 in payoffs from informants and undercover FBI agents running a fictitious company called E-Cycle Management Inc.

The ruse was that E-Cycle needed special legislation to be successful, and that its representatives were willing to pay legislators for their help.

Ten people, including five present or former legislators, were indicted in the case known as the Tennessee Waltz.

Defense attorney Coleman Garrett has argued that Dixon was entrapped and that the agents and informants "tricked" his client into taking payoffs.

Federal prosecutor Tim DiScenza contends Dixon was predisposed to accept bribes and that a preliminary investigation showed he solicited payments in 2003 from lobbyist Tim Willis, who was seeking TennCare status for a children's dental clinic.

Willis, a convicted felon in an unrelated credit card fraud case, was a key government informant in the investigation.

Willis began his cooperation after the FBI began investigating him in a bogus invoice scheme in 2001 at Juvenile Court, where he had a contract as a consultant. He also has admitted lying to a grand jury, but has not been charged with a crime in either case.

Prosecutors presented a somewhat streamlined case that involved 15 witnesses -- including Dixon's self-described "bag man" Barry Myers -- and just a few of the hundreds of hours of audio and video that was secretly recorded.

In other testimony Monday, undercover FBI agent "L.C. McNiel," whose real name was not revealed, identified himself in a surveillance tape counting out $2,000 in cash for Dixon aide Myers on May 14, 2004, at E-Cycle's office Downtown.

On the tape, Myers tells McNiel that Dixon "needs two" and that "Roscoe is solidly on board" in helping promote legislation favorable for E-Cycle.

McNiel testified that Myers made it clear that he was picking up money for Dixon. Prosecutors and witnesses have said Dixon's euphemism for seeking payoffs is "take care of Barry" and "keep Barry happy."

"I want to know what I'm paying for," McNiel says on the tape, adding that he wants people who can bring contracts to the table. "I want to know what I'm getting. ... You don't mind these 50s do you?"

McNiel said that, in a later conversation, he voiced concern about paying Dixon, who was considering leaving his Senate seat for a county government post.

In a recording played in court, Dixon assures McNiel that he will be in an even better position to help deliver business to E-Cycle because of his connections to other politicians.

"We got a team," says Dixon, who makes references to Kathryn Bowers, former congressman Harold Ford Sr., County Mayor A C Wharton and others. "It's a network."

Dixon left his Senate seat in January 2005 to become the $101,856-a-year assistant chief administrative officer under Wharton, a post he resigned after his indictment last May.

On the tape, Dixon tells McNiel that administrators are "always the big dogs on the porch," but that his dream job is that of city mayor.

Roscoe Dixon Appears On Witness Stand (WMC-TV)

WMC-TV, June 6, 2006

On his way out of federal court, former State Senator Roscoe Dixon wouldn't answer questions about his first stint on the witness stand.

Dixon states, "If I talk to y'all the judge will get mad. Do you think it's in your best interest to talk? The judge will get mad."

Dixon's attorney did shed some light on why his client chose to aid in his own defense.

Dixon is accused of taking more than 9-thousand dollars in bribes to push legislation for E-Cycle Management, a bogus company created by the FBI as part of Operation Tennessee Waltz.

Before Dixon took the stand, prosecutors showed jurors this 2004 video they say shows an undercover FBI agent counting out two thousand dollars in cash for bagman Barry Meyers to give to Dixon.

In FBI undercover video used in court, Meyers is heard calling Dixon during the meeting: "(Meyers) - Hey, Roscoe, this is Barry. Give me a call as soon as you get this message. I know you probably still in a meeting so give me a call. Thanks. He'll call me back. He's still in a meeting." (UC) You don't mind these 50's do you? (meyers) I mean, he, he...as long as it's two he's straight."

After court, I tried to ask Dixon about the tape.

When questioned about the video, Dixon is asked by attorneys, "Is there any concern on your part about what's on those tapes?"

Dixon replies, "I can't talk, remember I got a gag order."

Dixon's attorney says his client's defense will come out in court.

Roscoe Dixon Takes The Stand (WPTY-TV)

WPTY-TV, June 6, 2006

New information tonight in the Tennessee Waltz corruption investigation. Former State Senator Roscoe Dixon took the stand on his own behalf late Monday afternoon. Dixon's lawyer Coleman Garrett says his client had no choice but to testify. He says, "He's been accused of committing a crime!"

Dixon is facing bribery and corruption charges. Monday morning, an undercover F.B.I. agent testified he gave Dixon money. He also testified he gave Dixon's friend Barry Myers $2,000 to be given to Dixon.

Prosecutors say the cash was funneled through Dixon's close friend Barry Myers. Former Tennessee State Senator Roscoe Dixon isn't talking to the media because of a judge's order, but video and audio recordings gave jurors a first hand account of what the prosecution says happened. The videos include Dixon taking money from FBI informant Tim Willis. There is also video of Myers and Willis exchanging money.

Tim Willis was the go-between for E-cycle. E-cycle is the name of the fake company set up by the FBI to catch lawmakers taking bribes. Prosecutors say their video and audio tapes prove Dixon is guilty of doing just that. The former Tennessee state senator is expected to tell his side of the story in federal court tomorrow. His trial resumes at 9 a.m.

Waltz Figure Said He Needed Money (KNOXNS/AP)

By Woody Baird, Associated Press

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), June 6, 2006

MEMPHIS — A former state senator charged in an FBI bribery sting complained that his job as a lawmaker paid too little, according to a recording played for a federal jury Monday.

"I need to get in the big league, man," Roscoe Dixon said on a recording played at his bribery and extortion trial.

L.C. McNeil, an FBI agent testifying under his code name, said the recording was made in August 2004 when he was talking with Dixon about the senator's desire to leave the Legislature.

McNeil was pretending to be vice president of E-Cycle Management, a company seeking legislative favors from Tennessee lawmakers. He used the name "McNeil" during the investigation, and Judge Jon McCalla allowed him to continue using it in court.

Dixon was running for clerk of Shelby County General Sessions Court when the audio recording was made, and McNeil said he was worried that if Dixon left the Senate, E-Cycle would lose influence in the Legislature.

Dixon is one of five current or former state lawmakers indicted in a federal investigation, code named Tennessee Waltz, that focused on E-Cycle, the fake company created by the FBI. He is the first lawmaker to go to trial.

The trial began last week, and prosecutors have played several secretly made audio and video recordings of Dixon for the jury.

Dixon, a Democrat, lost the clerks race and stayed in the Senate. He resigned last year, shortly before his indictment, to take a top job with the Shelby County mayor's office.

In the conversation with McNeil, Dixon referred to administrative government jobs with good salaries, large staffs and contract-signing authority as "big league."

He complained that no matter how much per diem pay he drew above base salary, he could not make more than $30,000 a year as a Senator. "Everybody got some semi-hustle," he said of the state Legislature.

On the recording, McNeil expresses concern that Dixon will no longer be able to help E-Cycle if he leaves the Senate.

Dixon says he will still be part of a political "network" in Memphis and can use the court clerk's office to lobby the Legislature.

"I'll have a credit card and I'll have more power and sway over them than I do as senator," he says.

One lawmaker charged in the Tennessee Waltz scandal, former Rep. Chris Newton, R-Cleveland, has pleaded guilty and is serving a one-year prison sentence. The other are awaiting trial.

Three county officials in Chattanooga and Memphis also were charged in the investigation as were two accused "bagmen" who have pleaded guilty to handling payoffs for lawmakers.

FBI Agent Testifies In Bribery Trial (WTVF-TV)

WTVF-TV, June 6, 2006

The public corruption trial of former state Senator Roscoe Dixon was in its fourth day in Memphis on Monday.

Dixon faces bribery charges from an undercover sting, Operation Tennessee Waltz.

Monday, a top FBI agent involved in sting took the stand.

The agent testified that he posed as a vice president of E-Cycle Management, a fake company set up by the FBI.

The agent told the jury he talked to Barry Myers about paying bribes to Dixon. Myers has been described as a "bag man" by federal investigators.

The trial was expected to last several weeks.

Witness: Mayor's Aides Gave Marching Orders (CHIT)

By Dan Mihalopoulos And Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, June 6, 2006

From the time Mayor Richard Daley took office, dozens of city department managers gathered before elections at the plumbers' union hall or other sites to get campaign marching orders from top mayoral aides, a former Daley loyalist testified Monday in the City Hall corruption trial.

Donald Tomczak, a longtime Water Department official and veteran political operative, said he then would summon his top deputies to his office in the Jardine Filtration Plant to tell them which candidates would get help from hundreds of blue-collar city water workers.

After elections, Daley aide Robert Sorich fielded requests for promotions from the political workers and tried to accommodate them, Tomczak told jurors. When Sorich rewarded his effective campaign workers by advancing their careers, Tomczak said, he thanked Sorich.

But Tomczak said he also made sure to complain to Sorich when his campaign troops did not get what they wanted: "Robert, how can I keep this thing together if I can't get these people promoted?"

Tomczak is the latest in a growing line of former Daley administration officials to detail systematic patronage hiring in the federal trial of Sorich and ex-city officials Timothy McCarthy, John Sullivan and Patrick Slattery.

Prosecutors say the four were involved in a scheme to rig hiring and promotions in favor of applicants endorsed by the mayor's office, including pro-Daley political workers, in violation of a federal court decree restricting patronage.

Although Daley has long insisted that machine politics in Chicago are dead, Tomczak described a Daley campaign organization in which high-ranking city officials doubled as political coordinators. Promotions for water workers were based more on precinct-by-precinct election results than actual job performance, Tomczak said.

Tomczak, 70, provided jurors with a tale of his lifetime journey through Chicago politics and City Hall—from his first public job as a Water Department laborer to his admission last year that city trucking contractors gave him almost $400,000 in bribes.

His 45-year career in local politics began when Tomczak joined the payroll in 1958 as a lowly asphalt helper.

"The minute I got my city job, I was active in politics as an assistant precinct captain for the 11th Ward," he said, referring to the Democratic organization in the Daley family's political power base on the South Side.

Tomczak rose to a high-ranking post in the Water Department in 1982, but he lost the job after Harold Washington became mayor, and his legal efforts to get it back proved unsuccessful. The first deputy commissioner's job was his again, however, when Daley was elected in 1989.

For the next 14 years, Tomczak testified, he was the leader of between 100 and 250 department workers who served in his political army. The troops were divided into three groups—black, white and Latino—because "areas that we worked in were diverse areas. We needed groups to go in and talk to the various people."

The directors of the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs dictated which politicians would enjoy the campaign support of the political groups led by city officials, Tomczak said. Until they were charged criminally last year, Sorich and McCarthy worked in Intergovernmental Affairs, which Tomczak repeatedly referred to in his testimony as "the patronage office."

From 1989 until he left city government in 2003, Tomczak said his campaign group took orders from Timothy Degnan, Victor Reyes and John Doerrer. Degnan was Daley's first Office of Intergovernmental Affairs director, and his protégé, Reyes, succeeded him in 1995. Reyes gave way in 2000 to Doerrer, who resigned last year.

Degnan, Reyes and Doerrer have not been charged, although prosecutors have referred to Reyes as a "co-schemer" in the alleged hiring fraud scheme.

Directed by that trio, Tomczak said, he deployed water workers to help Al Gore for president, Glenn Poshard for governor, Rahm Emanuel for Congress, Patricia Bailey for Illinois House, Iris Martinez for Illinois Senate and two aldermen, Emma Mitts (37th) and Ted Matlak (32nd).

Tomczak said the only times he directed his workers independently of the mayor's office were when his son, Jeff, ran for Congress and for Will County state's attorney.

He said he met with Sorich after elections to single out particularly good political workers who merited promotions. Tomczak told jurors that Sorich would reply, "Don, we'll see what we can do," and promised to talk to Reyes or Doerrer.

In 2001, when there were openings for district foremen in his department, Tomczak said two men were promoted on the basis of their "great job" in campaigns. But he named four other applicants he said were better qualified and did not get promoted for lack of support from the mayor's office.

As part of his guilty plea last year, Tomczak agreed to cooperate with federal prosecutors. In exchange, he will be sentenced to 4 years in prison instead of receiving a longer term.

Tomczak's comments Monday echoed earlier testimony by Daniel Katalinic, who led a white ethnic political group of Streets and Sanitation workers, and Mary Jo Falcon, who was the political coordinator of Asian city workers in the Sewers Department.

Earlier Monday, an assistant commissioner in the Department of Streets and Sanitation testified that Slattery told her in 2004 that he had no legitimate business reason for hiring a series of laborers in the department.

Catharine Hennessy said Slattery made the statement after she requested a series of applicant ratings forms to answer a local laborer union's grievance.

'Were They Best Men For The Jobs?' 'No' (CHIST)

By NATASHA KORECKI, TIM NOVAK AND STEVE WARMBIR, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, June 6, 2006

Political performance trumped qualifications when it came to hiring in the city Water Department, former No. 2 man Donald Tomczak testified Monday at the City Hall hiring trial.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Patrick Collins asked if two soldiers in Tomczak's political army deserved the city positions they were given.

"Were they the best men for the jobs?" Collins asked.

"No," Tomczak said plainly. "They were active in my political group and did a good job."

HIGHLIGHTS

PROSECUTION: Key witness Donald Tomczak says politics -- not qualifications -- won candidates jobs in the city's Water Department.

DEFENSE: Will likely question Tomczak's motives to testify by exploring his deal with federal prosecutors.

UP NEXT: Defense lawyers will have a shot at Tomczak's testimony.

Clout on Wheels

The scandal of the city's Hired Truck Program - a Chicago Sun-Times investigation.

Showing Tomczak a list of all the job candidates, Collins asked who deserved the posts if politics weren't a factor. Tomczak picked out several different names.

Tomczak, 70, who ran one of the largest city-based political armies and is one of the highest-ranking city officials convicted in the scandalous Hired Truck Program, gave an insider's view on how hiring operated in City Hall.

He testified in the trial of Robert Sorich, a former top official in the Mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, and three others who are accused of letting politics determine hiring. Prosecutors contend that violates the Shakman decree, which is supposed to keep most city jobs free of political influence.

Tomczak said he once sued the city, claiming former Mayor Harold Washington fired him for political reasons. He was rehired and grew a political group to 250 people who were sent out to work on campaigns of Al Gore, Rahm Emanuel and mayoral and aldermanic races.

Tomczak said he'd meet with Sorich after campaigns and make pitches on who deserved city jobs as rewards. He'd leave index cards with names of political workers, he said. Sorich never made guarantees and often said he'd have to consult with his bosses: either Victor Reyes or John Doerrer, Tomczak said.

If Tomczak's people weren't chosen, he'd press Sorich: "How can I keep this thing together?" meaning his political group.

"I'll talk to Victor [Reyes]," he said Sorich reassured him.

Reyes, who also ran the mayor's Hispanic Democratic Organization, has come up repeatedly at trial but not been charged.

Under Tomczak's deal with prosecutors, he'll face four years in prison instead of up to nine years for taking Hired Truck bribes.

Also Monday, Catharine Hennessy, assistant commissioner in Streets and Sanitation, said the city got into a messy situation when a union challenged a batch of hirings. Hennessy said Sorich codefendant Patrick Slattery, who she said briefly handled personnel decisions, couldn't come up with rating forms to show the union.

"Pat, please tell me you had a legitimate business reason for the selections," she said she asked Slattery. Slattery simply said "no," she testified.

Slattery lawyer Patrick Blegen challenged Hennessy on whether his client really gave a one-word response. She stuck with her answer.

Hennessy locked into a tense courtroom exchange with Blegen, often smirking, and battling him on nearly every question.

Hennessy acted as a liaison to the Law Department. She is married to Edward Hennessy, an attorney and partner with the firm Hennessy & Roach. The city has regularly hired the firm to work in cases involving injured city employees. The city paid Hennessy & Roach $646,360 in 2004 and $286,063 through July 2005. There is no indication Hennessy & Roach was involved in Streets and Sanitation cases. The firm is retained by the City Council Committee on Finance headed by Ald. Edward M. Burke (14th).

Report Cites Abuse By Fired UMDNJ Dean (PHI)

By Troy Graham

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 6, 2006

The allegations that have been swirling around Warren Wallace for weeks finally came to light yesterday, and the details were not pretty.

A federal monitor investigating the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey, where Wallace was a senior dean until he was fired last week, accused him of manipulating the petty-cash system and steering a lucrative no-bid catering and cafeteria contract to a friend.

The monitor's report also said Wallace, a Gloucester County freeholder and chairman of the Delaware River and Bay Authority, had devoted "significant" amounts of university time and resources to his political jobs.

And, finally, the monitor said Wallace had tried this spring to get his daughter into the university's School of Osteopathic Medicine in Stratford, where he was responsible for admissions, even though she did not write the required essays or take the required tests.

The monitor said Wallace's actions were, "at a minimum, unethical."

Gov. Corzine said yesterday that Wallace should step down from the bay authority's board if there was credible evidence against him. Wallace's term expires at the end of the month.

"If he does not step aside, he will not likely be reappointed," Corzine spokesman Anthony Coley said.

Wallace did not return a message left on his cell phone yesterday. His attorney, Carl Poplar, also did not return a call.

State Sen. Stephen Sweeney (D., Gloucester), the Gloucester County freeholder director, spoke in support of Wallace.

"It's a report. And he will have his chance to respond to the report, and I'm going to wait for his response," Sweeney said. "He's told me he did nothing wrong, and I trust Warren and believe him."

In December, U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie appointed a federal monitor, former U.S. District Judge Herbert J. Stern, to investigate the university. The appointment came in a deal that deferred prosecution of the school on allegations of Medicare and Medicaid fraud.

Stern has launched more than a dozen investigations, and two other high-ranking deans have resigned, but no new criminal charges have been filed.

The monitor received a tip May 17 that Wallace's secretary was shredding documents, and the FBI quickly raided his office. Wallace was fired from his $166,000-a-year job in anticipation of the monitor's findings.

The monitor said a forensic analysis of Wallace's computer had found nearly 5,000 files dealing with his political jobs, and only 350 dealing with the admissions committee at the school.

Sweeney said Wallace had permission to do other work at the school.

"My understanding was it was just e-mails being sent and he had approval from the administration," he said. "It's a state university, and the bay authority is a state agency."

The report also said Wallace had told three other school employees to submit his travel expenses in their names, telling them he had been ordered to do this so that his travel expenses would appear to be smaller than they were. Some of the expenses were for travel related to his other jobs, the monitor said.

Since 2000, those employees submitted at least $2,500 worth of Wallace's expenses.

The findings also accused Wallace of steering a no-bid food-services contract to his friend Sal Randazzo. Since 2003, the school has paid Randazzo nearly $300,000 for catering nearly 1,000 events. At the same time, Wallace was allowed to eat for free at the cafeteria, Top Doc Cafe.

The monitor said "such a contract should not have been awarded without a public bidding process as required by law and UMDNJ policy."

Spokeswoman Anna Farneski said the university was "reviewing the food-service contract and expense issues outlined in today's report."

The report also said Wallace had arranged for a relative - identified through other sources as his daughter - to be interviewed by members of the admissions committee even though her application was incomplete. Two members gave her the highest possible score, "which is out of the ordinary considering all of the attendant factors," the monitor wrote.

Farneski said Wallace's daughter had withdrawn her application for admission in the fall.

"Dr. Wallace's interference with the admissions process was unethical and unacceptable," she said. "Upon becoming aware of the issue... we immediately relieved him of his admissions duties, and ultimately terminated his employment."

Report Faults Ex-dean (CAMCP)

By Sarah Greenblatt

Camden Courier-Post, June 6, 2006

A former dean at the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey bypassed the university's admissions and financial systems and conducted political business from his campus office, a federal monitor's report said Monday.

Former School of Osteopathic Medicine associate dean Warren Wallace steered a no-bid food-service contract to a friend, used his office for political activities, rigged travel-expense records and helped a relative gain admission to school, according to the report.

Wallace's UMDNJ computer showed seven times more files related to his activities on the Gloucester County freeholder board and the Delaware River & Bay Authority than to his duties as the school's chief admissions administrator, the report said.

But Wallace was fired last Thursday for using his authority over the admissions process to benefit his daughter, according to a UMDNJ spokeswoman.

Neither Wallace nor his attorney returned calls seeking comment on Monday.

Wallace declined to be interviewed by the monitor's office, according to the 15-page report.

The report said members of the school's Admissions Committee said Wallace forced them to interview a relative who had not yet taken the Medical College Aptitude Test or completed application essays.

Committee members told investigators that Wallace's actions damaged the school's reputation, but he defended his behavior in a letter to the panel's chairman, the report said. Wallace's efforts on his daughter's behalf ultimately caused UMDNJ officials to fire him, university spokeswoman Anna Farneski said on Monday.

"Dr. Wallace's interference with the admissions process was unethical and unacceptable," Farneski said. "Upon becoming aware of the issue, one and one-half weeks ago, we immediately relieved him of his admissions duties, and ultimately terminated his employment."

Farneski also said Wallace's daughter recently withdrew her application.

University officials are still reviewing issues tied to Wallace's alleged steering of a food-service contract to a friend and manipulating petty-cash procedures, Farneski said.

The monitor's report -- issued as part of a deferred prosecution agreement between UMDNJ and U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie -- said Wallace helped his friend, Sal Randazzo, secure a food-service and catering contract without submitting a bid.

The owner of Randazzo's Pizza and Pasta in Washington Township and a neighbor who lives on the same block as Wallace, Randazzo received a contract that has provided the restaurateur with more than $290,000 for catering between July 2003 and March 2006, the report said.

The contract was projected to cost the school $50,000 to $65,000 per year, according to a UMDNJ memo attached to the report.

Despite a profit-sharing provision of the contract, the report said, Randazzo has not provided the school with financial records.

A young man who answered the phone at Randazzo's home said he was not there but refused to take a message.

The report also alleged that Wallace directed subordinates to submit vouchers for some of his travel expenses in their own names, allowing him to approve the expenditures and bypass scrutiny by superiors.

DOJ_NMG_0031829

UMDNJ employees told investigators that Wallace had said the arrangement was required by former Dean Michael Gallagher, who stepped down in April amid allegations that he billed the university for $200,000 in extravagances and rigged financial records to qualify for a bonus.

Some of Wallace's travel costs were tied to his activities as a freeholder and member of the DRBA, the monitor's report said.

Wallace's political activities accounted for more of the activity on the administrator's UMDNJ computer than his duties at the school, the report said.

A forensic analysis of Wallace's computer showed 119,501 references to the DRBA, freeholder activities, Gloucester County and Washington Township, compared to 16,968 references to the school's admissions committee, which the administrator oversaw.

While portions of the report released to the public did not describe the nature of Wallace's political activities on the Stratford campus, John Inglesino, an attorney in the monitor's office, hinted that Christie may be reviewing the matter.

Calling Wallace's actions "unethical at a minimum," Inglesino declined to say if he broke any laws.

"It's not our role to characterize something as illegal or legal," Inglesino said. "It's our role simply to report the facts."

Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for Christie, declined to comment.

The report also noted that the monitor received a tip on May 17 that a UMDNJ employee in Wallace's office was shredding documents that might be related to the investigation. The shredding operation was halted, the report said, adding that the university has since banned the destruction of documents on the Stratford campus.

Among the investigations still under way is a probe of the role at UMDNJ of state Sen. Wayne Bryant, D-Lawnside, who received a $38,000 contract to serve as a liaison to the school.

Relatives Of Mob-hit Victim Blame Government For His Death (AP)

AP, June 6, 2006

BOSTON -- John McIntyre thought he was going to a house party on Nov. 30, 1984.

Instead, he was chained to a chair, interrogated, strangled, then shot in the head.

McIntyre's family is suing the federal government for $50 million, alleging that McIntyre was killed by fugitive crime boss James "Whitey" Bulger after former FBI Agent John Connolly tipped him that McIntyre was cooperating with authorities in an investigation of Bulger.

As the McIntyre family's wrongful death lawsuit went to trial Monday, attorney Steven Gordon gave chilling details of McIntyre's killing.

Gordon said McIntyre was lured to a house by Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi, leaders of the notorious Winter Hill Gang.

After he arrived carrying a case of beer, McIntyre was handcuffed and chained to a chair, then interrogated by Bulger, who asked him if he was talking to authorities about Bulger's failed plan to ship guns to the Irish Republican Army on a Gloucester fishing boat.

"It did not take much time for John McIntyre to say he was," Gordon said.

Gordon said Bulger tied a boat rope around McIntyre's neck and tried to strangle him, but when that took too long, he decided to shoot him.

Gordon said Bulger asked McIntyre, "Do you want one to the head?"

"The last words spoken on this earth by John McIntyre was a plaintive, 'Yes, please,' " Gordon said.

Then Bulger shot him in the head, Gordon said.

Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi, Bulger's former right hand man, who pleaded guilty to participating in McIntyre's death, is expected to be a key witness for the McIntyre family.

Flemmi, who is serving a life sentence in 10 killings as part of a plea deal that spared him the death penalty, testified in a deposition last year that Connolly told Bulger that McIntyre had begun talking to federal authorities about Bulger's criminal activities.

Flemmi testified only briefly Monday before the trial recessed for the day. He is scheduled to resume his testimony Tuesday.

Connolly was convicted in 2002 on racketeering and other charges for tipping Bulger _ who himself was an FBI informant _ that he was about to be indicted. Bulger fled on the eve of his 1995 indictment and remains a fugitive on the FBI's "Most Wanted" list.

Gordon said the government acknowledged in the criminal case against Connolly that he is the one who revealed McIntyre's identity. Kevin Weeks, Bulger's former enforcer, testifying for the government at Connolly's trial, described McIntyre's killing in gruesome detail and said Bulger learned of McIntyre's identity from Connolly.

"McIntyre's cooperation was a direct threat to Bulger's group and a direct threat to Bulger's relationship with the FBI," said Gordon, who also said he plans to call Weeks as a witness.

But Bridget Bailey Lipscomb, an attorney for the Justice Department, said that there is no direct evidence that Connolly revealed McIntyre's name to Bulger. She said Flemmi, in his deposition, said only that Connolly told Bulger that one of two people who were arrested on the fishing boat was an informant. She also said that Bulger had other law enforcement sources who could have given him McIntyre's identity.

She said that McIntyre, who was acting as an informant for U.S. Customs agents, had declined the agency's offer to place him in the witness protection program.

Lipscomb said the McIntyre case had been unfairly portrayed in the media as part of a wave of negative publicity surrounding the FBI's use of criminal informants.

Bulger and Flemmi were longtime informants who provided the FBI with information on the mafia, which the Bulger gang considered its main rival for criminal rackets in the Boston area, including gambling, drugs and loan-sharking.

Connolly's case and others prompted an uproar and Congressional hearings into the relationship between the FBI and its criminal informants.

Lipscomb said the media had depicted the Boston FBI office as "a bunch of renegade agents" who allowed its informants to commit murder so that it could achieve its goal of dismantling the Mafia.

"We believe that this is a case about fact and fiction," Lipscomb said. "It's fiction that the federal government did not protect John McIntyre and intentionally had him killed."

Connolly, who has not been charged in McIntyre's killing, is now serving a 10-year sentence and is currently awaiting trial in Florida in connection with the 1982 slaying of Miami gambling executive John Callahan.

McIntyre's mother, Emily, who filed the lawsuit, did not attend the trial Monday. Gordon said Emily McIntyre did not want to see Flemmi, who has admitted pulling out McIntyre's teeth after he was killed.

FUGITIVE COUPLE ACCUSED OF SELLING CHILDREN (AP)

AP, June 6, 2006

A fugitive couple accused of trying to sell their children in Mexico spent the weekend in San Diego jails will be extradited to Arizona.

The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children reportedly tipped off federal investigators about the couple. The tip led Mexican authorities to arrest 20-year-old Jessica Karin Heird and 37-year-old Edward Henry Leader in Tijuana on Friday.

Mexican authorities reportedly found the couple's 3-year-old son, but their 18-month-old daughter was still missing. The San Diego Union-Tribune reported that the boy and girl were sold, though there was no word on who paid for the children or what the price was.

Heird was being held on a $12,500 bond.

Leader was being held on no bail and is wanted in Arizona on kidnapping charges. A U.S. Justice Department spokesman says Heird is six months pregnant with the couple's fourth child. He says authorities recovered three of Leader's other children from a different relationship.

Couple Awaits Extradition In Child-Selling Case (KGTV)

KGTV, San Diego, June 6, 2006

A couple who allegedly sold two of their children in Baja California were behind bars Monday and awaiting extradition to Arizona, where the youngsters went missing several years ago, authorities said Monday.

Federal agents arrested Jessica Karin Heird, 20, and Edward Henry Leader, 37, at San Ysidro Port of Entry on Friday night.

Mexican authorities had detained them in Tijuana earlier in the day.

Heird -- who is six months pregnant -- and Leader had been living south of the border for several years and allegedly decided to make money by selling two of their youngest children, Deputy U.S. Marshal Omar Castillo said Monday.

Investigators believe the suspects took cash for their 18-month-old daughter and 3-year-old son. Authorities have since recovered the youngsters, who evidently were not physically harmed during their ordeals, Castillo said.

The intentions of those who bought the children remain unclear. No additional arrests have been announced.

Leader has fathered at least six children, the three youngest with Heird, according to investigators.

His eldest child, a 16-year-old girl, remains missing. She is considered a runaway and likely remains in Mexico, Castillo said.

Police believe Leader tried to force the girl into become a prostitute.

?When the child resisted, he would try to beat her into prostitution. We know he was trying to force her from the e-mails she was sending to her grandparents,? said another official involved in the investigation.

The chain of events began in 2000, when Heird disappeared from her home in Mohave, Ariz., Castillo said. Police thought she was with a man and headed to Mexico.

Heird evidently became involved with Leader in Nevada in 2002, according to federal investigators.

Social workers found her through a child-neglect complaint lodged in Las Vegas, and she was returned to her mother, who eventually gained custody of the children.

Some time later, Heird took the children out, purportedly for a walk, and never returned, Castillo said. She and the children apparently met up with Leader somewhere in Mohave, and then headed to Mexico.

When Heird turned 18, Arizona authorities issued a warrant for her arrest on suspicion of kidnapping her children.

Recently, the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children received information that Heird and Leader had been spotted in Baja, and U.S. Marshals personnel in San Diego were asked to help. Heird's mother will regain custody of two of her daughter's children, while Leader's will be placed with a guardian, Tyler said.

?When she took the kids, it was a shock. I didn?t know what to do,? said Angelika Heird.

Heird remained in Las Colinas Detention Facility in Santee this afternoon on a fugitive warrant. Her bail was set at $12,500. Leader was being held without bail in county jail in downtown San Diego.

'Mafia Cops' Get Life In Prison (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, June 6, 2006

The "Mafia Cops" took eight lives and yesterday, they learned theirs would be lost to prison.

Saying their crimes were the worst he ever saw, a Brooklyn federal judge hit two ex-Police Department detectives with life terms in prison and million-dollar fines for their roles as mob hit men.

"It is hard to visualize a more heinous offense," said Judge Jack B. Weinstein as he announced in a packed courtroom the heavy sentences for Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa for their roles in eight gangland murders during a bloody period that stretched from the mid-1980s into the early 1990s.

"These are probably the most heinous crimes ever tried in this courthouse," Weinstein said.

"These two men stand before you unrepentant and remorseless and perhaps by a higher power unforgivable," said lead prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Henoch. "Police are supposed to protect people; we don't have death squads here -- at least we aren't supposed to."

Delay in serving sentences

But in another twist in a case that has been filled with complex legal issues, Weinstein delayed imposition of the sentences until hearings are held later this month on critical post-trial motions for either acquittal or new trials. Both defendants will remain jailed but have asked Weinstein to overturn the April guilty verdicts, in part because the statute of limitations on the federal racketeering charges had expired.

Weinstein is also going to hold a hearing on Eppolito's and Caracappa's claims that their high-profile lawyers, Bruce Cutler and Edward Hayes, respectively, gave them ineffective representation. The lawyers have denied that claim. But no matter how Weinstein decides those issues, the case will be litigated for years.

"I didn't do any of these crimes at all," said Eppolito in a short, rambling statement. "I was one hell of a cop. I tried my best in my cases."

Eppolito asked the victims' family members to visit him in prison so he could prove his innocence to them, drawing audible scoffs from the relatives.

But as Eppolito spoke he was interrupted by a shouting Barry Gibbs, whose murder conviction was overturned last year because of allegations that Eppolito coerced a witness to testify falsely.

"You remember me, Mister Eppolito, you remember me!" shouted out Gibbs.

"No, I don't," replied a startled Eppolito.

As federal marshals hustled Gibbs out of the courtroom, he kept screaming.

Neither Eppolito, 57, nor Caracappa, 64, who didn't address the court, showed any emotion as family members of the victims addressed the court and told how the murders impacted their lives. The defendants sat glumly and looked on intently as the relatives spoke.

Eppolito's son, Louis Jr., was the only relative of the defendants to appear in court.

Robbed of childhood

Addressing the court, one victim's daughter, 30-year-old Michal Greenwald said, "You took away our Daddy and by doing that you took away our childhood. You took away our mother. You stole our innocence. You filled our nights with nightmares and our days with torture."

Eppolito and Caracappa were convicted of not only playing roles in the murder of jewelry merchant Israel Greenwald but also seven other victims, including reputed Gambino crime family member Edward Lino, James Hydell and Otto Heidel. All were killed, prosecutors said, at the behest of the Luchese crime family, which used Eppolito and Caracappa as law enforcement moles and contract killers.

Widowed Leah Greenwald, 51, of Fresh Meadows, looked at both defendants as she asked for a maximum sentence.

"You must pay severely for what you have done, for you did not just kill one person, you killed a family," she said.

An angry Daniello Lino, 27, daughter of the slain Edward Lino, seemed to spit out her words as she stared at Eppolito and Caracappa.

"You two are an embarrassment to the New York City Police Department, and furthermore are one of the largest blemishes in the department's history," she said.

For 2 Ex-Detectives, Life Terms And Tales Of Grief (NYT)

By Alan Feuer

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

Calling their crimes the "most heinous" he had ever seen in court, a federal judge issued — but did not officially impose — life in prison sentences yesterday for two retired New York detectives convicted in April of taking part in at least eight murders for the mob.

The sentencing of the men, Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, drew to a conditional close a stunning case of police corruption that began 20 years ago when they stopped a jeweler on the highway, helped to kill him and later left his body buried under concrete in an auto-body shop.

The judge, Jack B. Weinstein, issued the harshest penalty he could, but held up its imposition until he conducts a hearing later this month to determine if the men had shoddy lawyers, as they contend, and deserve a new trial.

There was little reaction from either man in Federal District Court in Brooklyn and both returned to jail, where Mr. Caracappa's face has grown skeletal and Mr. Eppolito has grown a white goatee and gotten somewhat slimmer.

By law, the friends and family of a victim can address the court at sentencing, and before the penalty was read, there were brutally emotional — and achingly personal — accounts from the survivors.

One of them was Michal Weinstein, daughter of the jeweler, Israel Greenwald, who on Feb. 10, 1986, disappeared after giving young Michal a hug as she waited for a bus. She was 10 years old then, and as she spoke from the stand, addressing both defendants by name, it was with a caged fury that only now, after 20 years, had found release.

"You took away our daddy," she said, "and by doing that you took away our childhood. You took away our mother. You stole our innocence. You filled our nights with nightmares and our days with torture."

She posed a list of questions to the men: Did they know what it was like to be asked about your father and not have an answer? To be treated with fear and pity? To watch from the window as your mother's car is repossessed? To leave the only home you ever knew and loved because you could not afford the mortgage? To take charity from the very charities your father once gave to? To visit a friend who had lost a loved one and be envious? Because they had a grave?

"To be envious of a grave," she said.

It seemed impossible after such a speech for another syllable to be spoken, but three more family members of victims took the stand and then, sheepishly, Mr. Eppolito rose to speak.

He began contritely, saying that he understood the families' pain and that, in 22 years as a detective, he had often had to deliver news about a death. He had knocked on doors, he said, had spoken to grieving widows — "I know the feelings."

He then invited the families of his victims — the Greenwalds, the Hydells, the Linos — to visit him in jail, where he promised he could prove to them he was an innocent man.

It was at this point that without warning and certainly without permission, a large man wearing a seashell necklace suddenly stood up.

"Mr. Eppolito!" he yelled from the gallery. "Do you remember me?"

Apparently baffled, Mr. Eppolito said, "No."

"I'm the guy you put away for 19 years! I'm Barry Gibbs! You don't remember me? You don't remember what you did to me? To my family?"

The marshals quickly led the man outside, as the courtroom burst into applause.

Mr. Gibbs went to prison 19 years ago for murder, but was released in September when a judge in Brooklyn found that Mr. Eppolito had intimidated the only eyewitness in the case into lying on the stand. Mr. Gibbs's startling appearance put something of a kink in Mr. Eppolito's speech, which he amended on the spot, repeating that he did not know the man.

Later, after Judge Weinstein issued the sentence (which, aside from life in prison, included a $1 million fine and a $400 special court fee), there was discussion of the next hearing, scheduled for June 23. At that time, it is likely that the defendants' former lawyers, Bruce Cutler and Edward Hayes, will take the stand to be questioned on their legal work at trial.

As has happened often in the case, the various players spilled outside the courthouse to discuss things with the news media.

Mr. Gibbs, tanned and healthy, said that Mr. Eppolito had taken his "constitutional rights and put them in the street."

He found a strange bedfellow in Anna Lino, wife of Edward Lino, whom Mr. Eppolito and Mr. Caracappa were found to have murdered 16 years ago.

"Nineteen years," she said. "Don't you think he has a right to have an outburst?"

Wild Day In Brooklyn Ends With Mafia Cops Sentence Pending (AP)

By LARRY McSHANE, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, June 6, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) - A federal judge tore into two decorated ex-NYPD detectives Monday for their brutal killing spree while on the payroll of a mob underboss and told the pair he would sentence them to life in prison - but not until the "Mafia Cops" can argue their lawyers were incompetent.

In a dramatic day inside a Brooklyn courtroom, U.S. District Court Judge Jack B. Weinstein said the sentences were pending until a June 23 hearing at which Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa will argue they received inadequate legal representation at their racketeering trial. His decision to put off imposing the sentences came minutes after he had announced the prison terms to a packed courtroom.

The unusual legal twist capped an emotional day in court where five family members took the witness stand to testify how the murders linked to the two detectives had destroyed their lives.

"You did not kill one person," said Michal Greenwald Weinstein, whose father was the pair's first victim. "You killed a family."

Another man, wrongly jailed for 19 years in a case investigated by Eppolito, was thrown out of court after launching into a rant against him.

Eppolito, speaking for the first time in court, insisted he was innocent of any crimes and encouraged the family members who called for his incarceration to visit him in jail. "I can hold my head up high," said Eppolito, sporting a freshly-sprouted snow-white goatee. "I never did any of these things."

And this all came before Weinstein's near-sentencing.

"This is probably the most heinous series of crimes ever tried in this courthouse," the judge said before announcing the delay. Eppolito and Caracappa will press forward with their request for a new trial based on claims that their attorneys failed to put on a competent defense.

Bruce Cutler, who represented Eppolito, was out of his office and unavailable for comment Monday. Hayes was in Los Angeles, and did not return a call left at his Manhattan office. The high-priced, well-known attorneys - longtime friends who greeted one another in court with a kiss - attracted a great deal of attention before the trial began.

Both defendants have been jailed since their April 6 convictions on racketeering charges that included murder, kidnapping, drug dealing and obstruction of justice.

Eppolito, 57, whose father was a member of the Gambino crime family, and Caracappa, 64, were respected detectives who worked for Luchese underboss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso between 1986 and 1990. The eight murders were committed while they were simultaneously on the payrolls of the New York Police Department and Casso.

The sentencing delay was anticlimactic compared to the courtroom theatrics that preceded it. Barry Gibbs, who spent almost 20 years in jail after a wrongful conviction in a case where Eppolito was lead investigator, stood up in the middle of Eppolito's speech to attack the ex-detective before federal marshals led him out of the courtroom.

"Remember what you did to me? To me? You framed me!" he screamed as the crowd burst into cheers.

Eppolito and Caracappa received $4,000 a month from Casso, who also used them to get information from inside law enforcement. Their pay went up for the murders: They earned $65,000 for one killing.

Caracappa, who retired in 1992, helped establish the police department's unit for Mafia murder investigations. Eppolito was a much-praised street officer despite whispers that some of his arrests came via tips from mobsters.

Eppolito also played a bit part in the mob movie "GoodFellas." After retiring in 1990, he unsuccessfully tried his hand at Hollywood scriptwriting.

In his autobiography, "Mafia Cop," he portrayed himself as an honest officer from a crooked family. The pair, both highly decorated, spent a combined 44 years on the force and eventually retired to homes on the same block in Las Vegas.

The racketeering convictions also could be overturned due to the statute of limitations. The defense argues that there was no ongoing criminal enterprise while the detectives were living in Las Vegas, making a racketeering charge legally untenable.

Judge delays sentencing of former detectives who were convicted of being hitmen for the mob.

NEW YORK — Calling their crimes "the most heinous … ever tried in this courthouse," a U.S. district judge Monday promised to sentence former New York police detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa to life in prison for moonlighting as mafia hitmen.

Like every other phase of the "Mafia Cops" trial, the hearing featured its share of theatrics. When Eppolito began to address the courtroom for the first time, a spectator screamed: "Do you remember me, Mr. Eppolito? Do you remember what you did to me? To me? You framed me!" Other spectators cheered him on as he was escorted from the courtroom.

Notably absent were Bruce Cutler and Eddie Hayes, the flamboyant defense lawyers who took center stage at the trial from its first day, when they greeted one another with a jovial kiss. Eppolito and Caracappa have accused the famous lawyers of incompetence; their request for a mistrial will be heard June 23.

Until that matter is settled, Judge Jack Weinstein cannot sentence the retired detectives, who were convicted April 6 of participating in eight murders, among other crimes. Weinstein said he intended to sentence the two to life in prison, impose a $1-million fine and seize their assets.

That came as satisfying news to Danielle Lino, 27, the daughter of a Gambino captain named Eddie Lino, whom Eppolito and Caracappa were convicted of killing.

"It is our sincere hope that you will spend your remaining years rotting in prison," she said, glaring at the detectives. "We hope you will burn in hell."

The two men were arrested last year in Las Vegas, where they had retired after serving a combined 44 years on the police force. Eppolito, who is fat and garrulous, left New York to pursue show-business aspirations and found a few acting jobs, such as Fat Andy in "Goodfellas." His friend Caracappa moved to a house on the same block.

A series of underworld figures testified that Eppolito and Caracappa worked as informants and hitmen for Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso, an underboss for the Luchese family. Burton Kaplan testified that Casso paid the two $4,000 a month, plus lump sums for murders. For pulling over Eddie Lino's car at a traffic stop and shooting him in the head, he said, they were paid $65,000.

Hayes and Cutler delivered memorable opening and closing statements but called few witnesses. Cutler's entire defense lasted 13 minutes. Eppolito has replaced him with a new lawyer, Joseph Bondy, who said Cutler should have identified other potential perpetrators and allowed Eppolito to take the stand. Caracappa's new lawyer, Daniel Nobel, filed a similar complaint Monday morning.

Attorneys for the pair argued that the verdict should be thrown out because, except for one charge, the crimes did not fall within the statute of limitations for racketeering.

Eppolito seemed eager to finally address the courtroom Monday, speaking without notes. He said he was handicapped in life by his father, a Gambino soldier nicknamed "Fat the Gangster." Although he turned his back on the mafia, he said, it made no difference.

"I was already crucified with the name Eppolito before I got any opportunity," he said. "This is coming down on me because of who I am, who I was, not because of what I did. I can hold my head up high. I have never done any of this."

Family members who spoke included the wife and daughter of Israel Greenwald, a diamond merchant who, in 1986, was shot in a Brooklyn parking garage and entombed in concrete.

Michal Greenwald, who was 9 when her father disappeared, described the losses that followed: watching, from the window, while the car was repossessed; switching schools when her scholarships were revoked; listening to a burglar break into the house because they could no longer afford an alarm system.

"We loved our daddy and having him disappear into thin air was a torture I would not wish on my worst enemy," she said. "Do you know what it's like to visit a friend who lost a loved one and be envious of them because they have a grave? Envious of a grave?"

Outside the courthouse, as the hearing ended, waited Barry Gibbs, the man who shouted at Eppolito in the courtroom.

In 2005, Gibbs was released from prison after 19 years when his murder conviction was overturned by DNA evidence. Gibbs said Eppolito — the lead investigator in the case that led to his arrest — pressured a witness into fingering him for the crime.

He wanted to celebrate with the families of the pair's victims. Asked whether he had a message for Eppolito, he said: "Every day in jail is like a million years. It's not a day; it's a million years."

Alito Opinion Draws Rebuke From Scalia (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 6, 2006

Just four months after joining the Supreme Court, Samuel Alito Jr. on Monday joined the club of jurists who have been targets of Justice Antonin Scalia's wrath.

Alito wrote Zedner v. United States for a unanimous Court on Monday, siding with a criminal defendant in a dispute over interpretation of the Speedy Trial Act. But Scalia, while joining the decision, wrote a concurrence criticizing Alito for citing the legislative history of the statute, which Scalia believes is irrelevant.

"Because the use of legislative history is illegitimate and ill advised in the interpretation of any statute -- and especially a statute that is clear on its face -- I do not join this portion of the Court's opinion," Scalia wrote.

The side spat is a small but significant sign of Alito's independence from Scalia, whom many presumed would be a consistent conservative ally and friend.

In the drafting process, Alito could easily have mollified Scalia by deleting the paragraph that invoked legislative history. In interpreting acts of Congress, Scalia has vocally criticized reliance on legislative history -- congressional floor statements, committee reports, and the like -- in his 20 years on the Court, preferring instead to go strictly by the words of the statute. But the fact that Alito left the paragraph in, and Scalia felt moved to object to it, revealed at least some daylight between the two.

Alito's use of legislative history places him closer to the camp of moderate-liberal Justice Stephen Breyer, who last year warned in his book "Active Liberty" of "the danger that lurks where judges rely too heavily on text."

Monday's ruling favored Jacob Zedner, indicted in 1996 on seven charges of bank fraud. Both he and the prosecution sought delays in the trial, raising red flags because of requirements of the Speedy Trial Act that a trial begin 70 days after a defendant is charged. Responding to a request from the judge, Zedner signed a form waiving his rights "for all time" under the law.

After four years of procedural delays, Zedner moved to dismiss the indictment, claiming the prosecution had violated the Speedy Trial Act. The motion was denied, the trial proceeded, and he was found guilty. The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled against Zedner, finding that because he had contributed to the delay in the trial, he could not object to it.

At issue before the Supreme Court was the standard for analyzing when a defendant has legitimately waived his rights under the law.

Alito wrote that the Speedy Trial Act was "designed with the public interest firmly in mind ... That public interest cannot be served, the Act recognizes, if defendants may opt out of the Act entirely." As a result, the Court ruled, a defendant cannot waive rights under the act for all time. Zedner's case was sent back to trial court for dismissal, but the Court said it was up to the trial judge to decide if it should be dismissed with or without "prejudice." If dismissed "with prejudice," the prosecution would be over, but if it is done "without prejudice," prosecutors would be able to try Zedner again.

Alito's offending paragraph cites several instances in the House and Senate reports accompanying passage of the law in 1974 that emphasized the public interest in speedy trials.

Scalia wrote: "It may seem that there is no harm in using committee reports and other such sources when they are merely in accord with the plain meaning of the Act. But this sort of intellectual piling-on has addictive consequences." Among other things, Scalia said it could lead to the belief that a single senator's statement about the meaning of a law represents the views of the entire Congress. "There is no basis either in law or reality for this naive belief," Scalia said.

Supreme Court Will Consider Retroactivity Of 'Blakely' (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, June 6, 2006

The Supreme Court said Monday it will decide whether inmates can reopen challenges to prison sentences based on a Court ruling two years ago that limited judicial discretion in sentencing.

Justices will hear arguments this fall from Lonnie Burton, who is serving nearly 47 years in prison in Washington state for rape, robbery and burglary.

Burton's lawyers told justices that the judge increased Burton's sentence by about 21 years, declaring that he deserved a harsher sentence than the sentencing scheme provided for there.

The case two years ago was also from Washington state. Justices on a 5-4 vote overturned the sentence of a Washington state man for kidnapping his estranged wife. A judge, acting alone, had determined that Ralph Blakely acted with "deliberate cruelty" and deserved a longer prison term.

Justices did not say then how the decision would affect old cases. Justice Antonin Scalia authored that opinion, for an odd right-left lineup of justices.

Burton had an appeal pending when the Court resolved Blakely's case. He had been convicted in 1994 of raping a 15-year-old boy he followed home from school.

The case is Burton v. Waddington, 05-9222.

Cocaine User Convicted Of Killing Girlfriend With Ax Set To Be Executed In Texas (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Graczyk, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 6, 2006

(AP) - HUNTSVILLE, Texas-A man who killed his girlfriend with an ax while he was high on crack cocaine is to be executed by lethal injection Tuesday, the 11th person to be put to death in Texas this year.

Timothy Titsworth, 34, is the first of three scheduled to die this month in the nation's most active capital punishment state. The U.S. Supreme Court refused to review Titworth's case in January.

Evidence showed Titsworth, who dropped out of school before he reached high school and worked as a roofer, was high on crack cocaine at the time of the July 23, 1992, attack.

"I didn't think that I had a problem and didn't accept the help and treatment provided to me," Titsworth, who had walked out of at least two drug treatment programs, wrote on an anti-death penalty Web site. "With my fear, ignorance and denial of the truth that so many others have seen, I ended up here: on Texas death row."

Before the killing, Titsworth had avoided a five-year prison term for auto theft by attending a boot camp for two months, an option available to him as a first-time felony offender. He was released on probation.

Three months later, he was arrested and charged with capital murder for the slaying of his girlfriend, who died at the mobile home they shared in Amarillo, in north Texas. Christine Sossaman, 26, had been hit about 16 times with a dull two-bladed ax as she slept.

According to court records, a friend of Sossaman testified the victim told her the day before she was killed she intended to ask Titsworth to leave because she believed her boyfriend had been stealing from her. Evidence showed after the attack, Titsworth took her car along with items from the trailer home that he sold to buy more crack cocaine, then returned repeatedly to the murder scene to take more property to sell to purchase more drugs.

He was arrested driving Sossaman's car while on his way to what a companion said was yet another visit to the crime scene to collect more items to sell. By then, however, Sossaman's mother, worried when she couldn't reach her daughter by phone, had discovered the body and alerted police.

"He was just a crackhead," Randall County District Attorney James Farren said. "He got caught with her property in his possession. In addition, he confessed."

In his confession, Titsworth told authorities the two had argued, Sossaman went to bed and he went out to buy crack and a pill he believed was LSD. He told detectives that while high on the drugs, he went to the mobile home where Sossaman was sleeping, got the ax from a closet and blacked out, although he said he did remember hitting the victim four or five times.

Evidence showed the woman lived from 20 minutes to two hours after she was beaten to her head, neck and upper body. A chest wound was so severe her ribs were driven into her lungs, a pathologist testified.

While being held at the Randall County Jail and awaiting trial, Titsworth was among four inmates who escaped by crawling through ductwork. He was captured about 12 hours later.

At his 1993 trial, Titsworth's lawyers argued he shouldn't be convicted of capital murder because evidence showed the slaying was committed while he was under the influence of drugs and that he didn't intend to steal her property. Jurors didn't buy the argument, returning a guilty verdict after deliberating for about an hour.

Titsworth declined to speak with reporters in the weeks preceding his scheduled execution.

"I'm on death row and have fought a hard battle within the appellate courts, only to reach the final stage ... a better man, a stronger soul," he wrote on a Web site that seeks prison pen pals.

Scheduled to die next - on June 20 - is Lamont Reese, 28, who authorities say is a former street gang member convicted of gunning down three people outside a Fort Worth convenience store in 1999.

There have been more than 1,000 executions in the United States since a moratorium on the death penalty was overturned in 1976.

Pair Charged With Fraud In Homeless Hit-And-Run Cases (LAT)

Two women in their 70s were arraigned today on nine counts of fraud in connection with multimillion-dollar life insurance policies they took out on two homeless men who were later killed in hit-and-run accidents.

The women, Olga Rutterschmidt and Helen Golay, pleaded not guilty to the charges, which include mail fraud and aiding and abetting a crime in connection with life insurance statements.

Authorities have said that the women are suspects in the 2005 death of Kenneth McDavid and the 1999 death of Paul Vados. The women allegedly took out 19 life insurance policies on the men and eventually cashed in more than $2.2 million in claims after the transients died in hit-and-run pedestrian accidents in Los Angeles.

No charges have been filed in the men's deaths.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Paul L. Abrams ordered a July 25 trial date for Rutterschmidt and Golay, who remain in federal custody.

The two women did not speak to each other while waiting in a glass-curtained area for defendants, and barely looked at each other during the proceedings.

Golay, dressed in an orange jumpsuit, her blond hair teased dramatically upward, spoke softly when Abrams asked her if she understood her rights, her voice barely audible in the federal courtroom.

Her attorney, Roger John Diamond, asked Abrams whether his client could be moved from San Bernardino, where is she is being housed, to a more central location. Authorities made the decision last month to keep the women in separate facilities.

Diamond also questioned why his client was the one of the duo to be housed farther away. "We have no idea why we have to go to San Bernardino every day," he said.

Abrams denied the request, saying another judge had ordered the women to be held at different facilities. "For whatever reason he did it, I have no reason to second-guess it," he said.

Rutterschmidt, in a pale green jumpsuit, a dark green windbreaker pulled down around her waist, was represented by deputy federal public defender Kim Savo. After the hearing, Savo told reporters that her client's case has been sensationalized by the media.

"No one should be talking about this case in the press, including the government," she said.

"Right now, it's a mail fraud case, and frankly, federal mail fraud cases are about as boring as they get," Savo said.

Also in court were Golay's daughter Kecia Golay and Stella Vados, daughter of Paul Vados. Kecia Golay refused to speak with reporters after the hearing.

But Vados told reporters that "seeing those two women up there was very upsetting."

Her attorney, Gloria Allred, said that Stella Vados hopes to learn everything she can about the women's relationship with her father.

Witnessing Guilt, Ignoring Innocence? (NYT)

By David Feige

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

THE police lineup — in which the anxious eyewitness casts an accusing gaze on a string of sullen men (or women) on the other side of one-way glass — is as much a staple of actual law enforcement as it is of "C.S.I." and "Law & Order." It is also highly flawed. Yet because of a poorly designed study of lineups in Illinois, much-needed improvements to the process may not be forthcoming.

For some time now, scientists, criminologists and defense lawyers have advocated ending the tradition of having the witness view potential suspects all at once and going instead to a sequential method, in which the witness views suspects (or photographs of them) one at a time. Better still is the "double-blind" sequential test, in which the law-enforcement official administering the lineup does not know who is the suspect and who are "fillers."

A pilot project in Minneapolis and a generation of peer-reviewed laboratory experiments have concluded that the sequential method has a smaller error rate than old-fashioned simultaneous lineups. New Jersey now uses sequential lineups, and legislatures or commissions in California, North Carolina, Virginia and Wisconsin have endorsed them.

In April, however, Illinois officials released a study showing the new method was less reliable than the traditional one, based on results in three police districts. According to the study, witnesses using the sequential method picked out an innocent person — someone brought in as a filler — 9 percent of the time, compared with a 3 percent rate for simultaneous lineups (both figures are oddly below the typical error rate in such studies of 20 percent or more).

While these results have heartened police officials and prosecutors who have resisted changing to sequential tests, the study was so rife with methodological errors and biased analysis that it crossed the line between science and advocacy.

It's hard to understate the power of eyewitness testimony in criminal cases. In thousands of cases every year, testimony of a single eyewitness, uncorroborated by forensic or any other evidence, is used to sustain serious felony charges, including robbery and murder. For years, district attorneys have resisted calls to reform lineups, arguing that because double-blind sequential protocols had never been tested on "real" victims outside the laboratory, they shouldn't be adopted in the field. The Illinois project, properly conducted, would have provided an outstanding opportunity to deal with this concern.

The one thing the Illinois experiment did prove was that adoption of double-blind sequential protocols is fairly simple. It also gave more evidence that sequential lineups result in fewer overall identifications: witnesses made ID's in 53 percent of such lineups, versus 62 percent for old-fashioned simultaneous ones. Whether this is an improvement is open to debate.

But the idea that the sequential lineups were less accurate was based on a false premise: that any time the actual suspect was chosen, the result was "accurate." Doing justice in criminal cases is not a matter of identifying the suspect; it's a matter of identifying the actual perpetrator — who may or may not be the suspect. And while the police are often confident in their judgments, the constant stream of exonerations based on DNA testing and other evidence has starkly demonstrated the gulf between their confidence and scientific accuracy.

Significantly, the Illinois study had no way to control for actual guilt. Indeed, because many of the identified suspects are still wending their way through the system, scientists cannot even assess whether the criminal justice process determined that they were guilty. Nor, apparently, did the researchers have access to the case files, making it impossible for them to determine whether there was any forensic or corroborating evidence at all to support the validity of any particular identification.

Thus to assert that the instances in which the witness singled out the suspect were in fact correct identifications of a criminal is akin to the Alice in Wonderland notion of "sentence first — verdict afterwards."

Another problem with the Illinois pilot project was that it wasn't a true blind study: it allowed police officers who knew the actual suspect's identity to be in the room with the eyewitnesses in the simultaneous lineups, but not in the sequential ones.

And nobody with experience in the justice system would deny that there are plenty of ways, some subtle and some not, for an officer to telegraph to a witness which person in the lineup is the actual suspect. Consequently, comparing an unblinded simultaneous sample to a blinded sequential one is like comparing apples to dolphins.

And then there is the fact that the supposed superiority of simultaneous lineups was detectable in the study's cases in Chicago but not in the nearby Joliet police district. Could it be that big city officers were pushing witnesses toward identifications in circumstances in which their smaller-town brethren are more circumspect?

As with so many aspects of the Illinois pilot study, there is no way to know the truth. But that will not stop police officials and district attorneys from using its pseudo-scientific results as a basis on which to resist the mounting calls for change.

Prosecutors often tell us defense lawyers that they, too, want the fairest possible trials. But when it comes to identifications, it seems they want precisely what the current flawed lineups give them: suspect identifications.

Cybercrime Spurs College Courses In Digital Forensics (USAT)

By Jon Swartz

USA Today, June 6, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — One of the hottest new courses on U.S. college campuses is a direct result of cybercrime.

Classes in digital forensics — the collection, examination and presentation of digitally stored evidence in criminal and civil investigations — are cropping up as fast as the hackers and viruses that spawn them.

About 100 colleges and universities offer undergraduate and graduate courses in digital forensics, with a few offering majors. There are programs at Purdue University, Johns Hopkins University, the University of Tulsa, Carnegie Mellon University and the University of Central Florida. Five years ago, there were only a handful.

“I teach students to be like (TV supersleuth) MacGyver,” says Sujeet Shenoi, a computer science professor at the University of Tulsa.

Traditional students, police officers, government employees and aspiring security consultants are taking the courses as more crooks stash ill-gotten data and goods on PCs, PDAs, cellphones, network servers, iPods and even Xboxes.

Students learn where to find digital evidence and handle it without contaminating it. Once preserved, students are shown how to examine evidence and present it clearly during court testimony. “If you revert to geek speak, you can lose a judge, jury and prosecutor,” says Mark Pollitt, a digital forensics professor at Johns Hopkins University who retired in 2003 after 20 years as an FBI agent.

Digital forensics is considered a crucial weapon in law enforcement's escalating war against computer-related crimes. The science is used in criminal investigations; civil cases such as employment lawsuits where personnel records and e-mail correspondence are sought; and by companies faced with cyberattacks. Plus, there are evolving state and federal laws that define how evidence is handled in civil cases.

The evidence is particularly important in the seizure of data for child pornography cases, which comprise a majority of criminal investigations in the USA, says Marcus Rogers, an associate professor who heads the computer forensics program at Purdue University's College of Technology.

The FBI handled more than 9,500 computer forensics cases in fiscal year 2005, which ended in September, compared with about 3,600 in fiscal 2000, according to an FBI briefing.

The crush of cases has domestic intelligence agencies such as the National Security Agency and the CIA, local law-enforcement officials and companies clamoring for experts in finding and preserving digital evidence, security experts says. “There is a thirst in government agencies for (cyberinvestigators),” Pollitt says. There appear to be no shortage of suitors. Since he enrolled in Purdue's master's program last fall, Blair Gillam says he has been approached by recruiters representing government agencies and the private sector.

Taken By Mom, Sought By Dad, Left In A Life Of Uncertainty (WP)

Thinking back on it now, Carl Dodd realizes he expected too much, but who could blame him? He had waited 13 years to see his daughter again. He wanted to hug her and take her home with him.

But the teenager who greeted him at the police department in April was distant, doubtful. She asked him pointed questions: Why had her mother been arrested? Why were so many reporters around? Sunglasses partially hid her eyes, and when Dodd asked her to take them off so he could really see her, she refused. She made it clear she intended to stay with her grandmother in Wilmington, Del.

The reunion may have ended Dodd's determined search for his daughter, Marilyn Byrd, who disappeared with her mother from Southeast Washington when she was 4. But it was just the beginning of the long road back to a relationship with his only child, now a young woman of 17.

For people who spent their childhoods hiding out with a distraught parent, taking on new identities, the hardest part comes when the child is recovered and so-called normal life resumes. That is when they finally can afford to get angry about being used as a pawn in a nasty battle between the two people they loved the most.

Few understand Marilyn Byrd's conflicting emotions better than three people who spoke recently about their lingering bitterness over childhoods on the lam:

Â· Rebekah Ford, 28, a Wisconsin resident, still shudders as she recalls the most shocking moment of her childhood. It was the day the FBI came to her elementary school and showed her a flattened milk carton with her picture on it. Until then, she did not know that she was a missing child and that her name was not Heather Ann Brown.

Â· Sam Potash of Philadelphia, who just turned 19, can finally speak publicly about the 8 1/2 months he spent on the run with his father when he was 10. He got used to pretending his name was Ben Davis and repeating the lie that his mother -- who was desperately searching for him -- was dead.

Â· One of Liss Hart-Haviv's most vivid memories is trying to comfort her sobbing mother in a phone booth outside a California women's shelter after they had fled from her father. She was 10 and felt so old and alone. She even had a different name. "They called roll call at school, [and] the first thing I did every morning was lie," said Hart-Haviv, now 38 and living in Kalama, Wash.

Three years ago, Hart-Haviv started Take Root, the first national organization for adults who went through such experiences as children. The cases continue to grow: More than 200,000 children are taken each year by a parent or other family member, according to the Justice Department.

Often, the outcome for families is tragic, with feelings damaged beyond repair. "Many of our members end up losing both parents," Hart-Haviv said.

Even their memories feel like mockery.

"We spend a portion of our lives on the run from a parent, then we spend the rest of our lives on the run from our childhood," she said.

Hart-Haviv was 10 when her mother told her that her father was so volatile that they had to run away from their New York City home. "I was a daddy's girl," she said. "I never once thought of him as dangerous until Mom told me on my way out of town."

Life in hiding was lonesome, she said. Her mother worked all the time to support them. "So I raised myself," Hart-Haviv said. "She would come home at the end of the day, leave a microwave dinner for me and go to bed."

Meanwhile, her father was "obsessively" searching for her, she said. A drinking habit worsened, and he developed mental problems. By the time he found her two years later through medical records, too much had changed.

"I was scared of him," she said. "I saw my mother live in extreme fear. We were in hiding. We were afraid of being followed and our phones being tapped and people wondering who we were."

She and her father never fully reconciled. They did not have time; his health failed, and he later died. "I was his entire world," she said. "But he was looking for a little girl I just wasn't anymore. And there was no one to tell us this was understandable."

Twenty-five years later, she calls her relationship with her mother "a work in progress."

"I'm trying to get to the point of forgiveness," she said.Becoming 'Ben'

Today, Sam Potash is a tall, healthy-looking 19-year-old with a friendly manner -- and a matter-of-fact attitude about the nightmares and emotional problems he suffered after he was recovered. He recently completed his freshman year at Temple University and talks about becoming a social worker to help youths in the same predicament.

"It doesn't feel like it really happened to me anymore," he said in an interview at his mother's Philadelphia home. "It feels like a story."

His story began in July 1997 when his father, who was supposed to drop 10-year-old Sam off at a camp in New Jersey, kept driving. He drove across Canada and on to California and Texas, spending money wildly on gadgets and toys and telling Sam they were going to have a great time. Later, the boy would learn the source of the giddy display of generosity: His father had emptied Sam's $40,000 college-savings fund. After the money ran out in less than a year, Sam's father telephoned a cousin, who notified authorities.

When Abby Potash flew to Dallas to retrieve her son, she was struck by how big he had become; he had gained 30 pounds. "I never went outside," Sam says. He was so accustomed to calling himself "Ben" that, on the flight home, he told the airline attendant that that was his name. Later, he would tell his mother that he never contacted her because he was afraid of being arrested. His father, who lives in another state and phones Sam once in a while, served 16 months in jail.

Counseling was little help as Sam tried to put his life back together. He did not think the therapist could relate to what he had been through. For a long time, he was inexplicably mad at his mother, as if he wanted to make true all the negative things his father had said about her.

"He kept trying to push me to the wall," Abby Potash said. "When he first came home, I was afraid to discipline him."

Sam said he got the most comfort from talking to people who had been through a similar experience. He compares it to surviving cancer, and he is still trying to sort out his emotions.

"After seven years of struggling to find out who I am, I realize I can't," he wrote at the end of his college application essay. "All I know is, for the first time in my life, I can respond with the confident answer of at least a name: I am Sam."Finding a Way to Heal

There is hope of a happy ending. Rebekah Ford once thought that impossible, back when she found out she was not an only child, that she had a father who loved her after all.

Ford had known, deep down, that something was terribly off about her isolated life with her mother. But the truth struck her as "so unreal." The face of the 4-year-old on the milk carton was hers, but she, then 12, did not recognize herself. Her mother was under arrest, her father would be taking her home to a Chicago suburb, she had three older siblings. "I cried and cried. I was so confused," she said.

Looking back on it now, she said, her father set the standard for how to behave in such uncharted waters. He kept things light, asking her what sports she liked, telling her, "You're going to love it at our house," when she replied. Through her hurt, she liked him instantly, she said, but he was a stranger.

"We just talked," she said. "I was this awkward 12-year-old with glasses and a ponytail. I told him I wanted some L.A. Gears when I got home. . . . We talked about everything and anything, not, 'Do you know why your mom took you?' He approached things very nonchalantly, very casually."

It has taken much longer to reconnect with the mother who whisked her away. "There were times I had anger I didn't know what to do with," she said. "I was primarily angry at her. I was angry at the whole situation."

Her father made Rebekah keep in touch with her mother, but it was not until recently, when the grown-up Ford spoke on the subject of parental abduction at a Nashville convention, that her mother telephoned her with the message she had hoped to hear.

"She said, 'I'm really proud of you and what you're doing, and I'm really sorry,' " Ford said. "I think she is sorry, but she feels justified at the same time. I think she wishes it hadn't happened."Reconnecting, Slowly

For now, Carl Dodd is taking baby steps.

He and his wife, Paula, returned home to Fort Washington without his daughter after their disappointing meeting. "I guess I could have made her come by force," Dodd said, "but I didn't want her to come down here and be miserable."

He mailed her a belated birthday card with money inside. He knew it could not make up for the fact that it was her 17th birthday the day U.S. marshals finally found her and took her mother, Mary Jane Byrd, to jail. But Dodd wanted to mark the event somehow, to show his daughter he remembered.

Charged with a felony, Byrd was released from a D.C. halfway house last week, a move that indicates how tangled and sensitive this issue is. Although Dodd was awarded full custody of Marilyn a few months after she disappeared, the judge allowed Byrd to return to Delaware to live with the daughter she is accused of abducting until her trial this year. Dodd said the development would not change his game plan of taking things slowly.

Recently, he mailed Marilyn a cellphone and asked her in a note to let him know when she had received it. When she called to thank him, he considered it a small but important victory.

Now they talk on the phone once or twice a week, no big-deal topics, nothing much more than pleasantries. She is seeing a counselor, but they do not talk about that.

"The conversations are getting better," he said. "They're still like, 'Hi, how you doin'?' 'Fine.' And, 'Call me if you need anything.' But she says a couple of more words each time."

He is thinking about another face-to-face meeting. But he knows he might have to wait a little longer. "I'm still being patient," he said.

CIVIL LAW:

No Relief For Reporters Seeking To Shield Sources (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - Four journalists have lost their bid to reverse a judge's order to either disclose their confidential sources or face $500 per day in fines.

The US Supreme Court on Monday declined to take up the reporters' cases to examine whether a generally recognized "reporters' privilege" against revealing sources should extend to a civil lawsuit brought by former nuclear-weapons-lab scientist Wen Ho Lee.

The action marks the second time in a year that the justices have let stand a judicial order seeking to force members of the media to renege on professional pledges of confidentiality made to government officials to obtain information for their news reporting.

The high-court action comes days after five media organizations agreed to pay $750,000 as part of a $1.6 million settlement of Mr. Lee's Privacy Act case. To some media analysts, the settlement sets a dangerous precedent of media companies paying to protect their reporters' pledges to keep confidential sources anonymous.

"It is going to make it much more difficult for reporters to cover stories about issues that might end up in federal court," says Lucy Dalglish of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press. Recent developments, she adds, highlight the need for a federal reporters' shield law.

In June 2005, the Supreme Court declined to hear an appeal by New York Times reporter Judith Miller and Time correspondent Matt Cooper. Ms. Miller spent 85 days in jail before agreeing to testify to a grand jury investigating who leaked CIA employee Valerie Plame's identity.

The action Monday at the high court arises from a civil suit filed by Lee, a former computer scientist at Los Alamos National Laboratory. In news reports in 1999, Lee was identified by unnamed officials as a potential target of a government investigation into Chinese efforts to obtain US nuclear secrets. No espionage charges were ever filed. Lee was charged with mishandling classified information and eventually agreed to plead guilty to one count.

But the matter didn't end there. Lee sued, claiming that officials at the Justice and Energy Departments and at the FBI violated his privacy rights by revealing private details of his life from government files to members of the press. Lee's lawyers questioned 20 officials - and called upon journalists to disclose who told them the private details they reported. The journalists refused to reveal their sources, and a federal judge found them in contempt of court.

The journalists were from The New York Times, the Los Angeles Times, the Associated Press, and CNN.

A US appeals court panel upheld the ruling. While reporters enjoy a privilege against forced disclosure of their sources in some circumstances, it said, Lee's suit required their cooperation to uncover the source of the alleged wrongdoing.

Free-press advocates saw the appeals court ruling as a setback.

"This decision has far-reaching implications for the ability of journalists to inform the public about the operations of its government and misconduct in the private sector," wrote Washington lawyer Lee Levine, in a legal brief urging the high court to take up the reporters' case.

Supreme Court Turns Down Reporter Appeals In Lee Case (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Supreme Court rejected an appeal from news organizations fighting to protect confidential sources, refusing to consider the case of four reporters in legal trouble over their stories about former nuclear weapons scientist Wen Ho Lee.

The court's action, released Monday, was taken without comment. Late last week, Mr. Lee, who had sued the government for violating his rights under the Privacy Act, settled the lawsuit. He will receive $1.6 million from the government and five news organizations.

Journalists had been in civil contempt of court for refusing to disclose who leaked them information about an espionage investigation of Mr. Lee. The four reporters are H. Josef Hebert of the Associated Press, James Risen of the New York Times, Bob Drogin of the Los Angeles Times and Pierre Thomas, formerly of CNN and now working for ABC News.

The $750,000 payment by the news agencies is the first of its kind in recent memory, and perhaps ever, legal and media experts said. The companies bluntly said they agreed to the sum to forestall jail sentences for their reporters, even larger payments in the form of fines and the prospect of revealing confidential sources.

Justices could have dismissed the appeal based on the out-of-court settlement. Instead, they flatly rejected the appeals, which had been filed on behalf of the reporters during the legal wrangling with Mr. Lee.

Justice Stephen Breyer did not participate.

The cases are Drogin v. Lee and Thomas v. Lee.

In Wen Ho Lee Case, A Blow To Journalists After The Fact (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

Adding a coda to the legal battle between Wen Ho Lee and the media, the Supreme Court announced yesterday that it would not hear the appeals of reporters facing court orders to testify in Lee's lawsuit against the U.S. government.

The court spoke even though the case was over. Lee's lawsuit was settled on Friday, with the government and five media organizations supplying more than $1.6 million to Lee and his attorneys.

The reporters no longer face contempt-of-court penalties for not naming their confidential sources, and their attorneys had been expected to file papers with the court asking it to dismiss the matter as moot.

But the justices had met to consider the appeals last Thursday. They knew by then that settlement talks were underway and postponed a decision to allow time for negotiations.

Indeed, a day before the court's conference, a court aide contacted Lee's attorney, Brian A. Sun, to check on the progress of settlement talks. Sun said that agreement was very close, according to lawyers knowledgeable about the case. Sun declined to comment. The court was informed of the settlement on Friday.

The court's action leaves intact a ruling by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, which found that the reporters had no legal right to shield the names of their sources.

Yesterday's order is not a ruling on the legal issues in the case, but it does make it clear that the court saw no reason to review the D.C. Circuit's decision. Permitting the case to fade away at the request of the reporters who brought it would have left that point unmade.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer did not participate in the case, for reasons that, as is customary when justices recuse themselves, he did not detail.

Media Sources Need A Shield (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 6, 2006

FIVE NEWS ORGANIZATIONS — including the Los Angeles Times — agreed last week to pay a total of $750,000 to Wen Ho Lee, a former nuclear scientist who was arrested in 1999 and jailed for nine months as part of an espionage investigation at the Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico.

The payments, part of a negotiated settlement of Lee's lawsuit accusing the U.S. government of leaking information to the media from his personnel files, mean that reporters for The Times and the other news organizations won't be punished for declining to identify confidential sources.

Some free-press advocates expressed concern that the payments would encourage the subjects of other stories based on confidential sources to seek similar payments.

But that slippery slope can be avoided if Congress follows the example of two-thirds of the states (including California) and enacts a "shield law" providing limited but real protection to journalists' confidential sources.

The Senate and the House are considering different versions of the Free Flow of Information Act. Both bills would require that journalists be questioned about confidential sources only after investigators or other parties have exhausted attempts to obtain the information elsewhere — a codification of current Justice Department guidelines.

Equally important, both bills also would allow judges to weigh the reporter's privilege against the importance of the government's interest in breaching confidentiality. The Senate bill eloquently emphasizes that two public interests must be balanced: "the public interest in compelling disclosure and the public interest in news gathering and maintaining a free flow of information to citizens."

Where the bills differ is in the definition of those who could assert the confidentiality privilege.

The Senate bill, supported by Judiciary Committee Chairman Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), defines a journalist as someone who "for financial gain or livelihood" reports, writes or takes photographs for a newspaper, book publisher, radio or television network or "Internet news service."

The House bill extends the privilege to anyone who "publishes a newspaper, book, magazine or other periodical in print or electronic form" — a formulation that is friendlier to bloggers and student journalists but is too sweeping for some members of Congress.

We favor this broader approach, but not to the point of blocking legislation that could bring federal protections at least in line with those offered by California and states with similar laws.

The California law, which is part of the state Constitution, protects "a publisher, editor, reporter or other person connected with or employed upon a newspaper, magazine or other periodical publication, or by a press association or wire service, or any person who has been so connected or employed." (Recently a state appeals court extended the law's protection to online news services as well.)

The day may come when Congress or the states will provide greater legal protection for bloggers and "nonprofessional" journalists. For now, the priority is to make federal law at least as protective of traditional journalists' confidential sources as the laws of most of the states

Justices Limit Companies' Use Of Racketeering Lawsuits (AP)

By Toni Locy, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) The Supreme Court on Monday limited the use of civil anti-racketeering laws by companies seeking damages for allegedly illegal acts by their competitors.

In two separate cases, the high court tackled the growing controversy over the increased use of civil provisions of a federal law that was designed to root out organized crime from legitimate businesses.

By an 8-1 vote, justices reversed an appeals court decision that had allowed Ideal Steel Supply Corp., a New York steel mill product supplier, to sue its chief competitor, National Steel Supply Inc., owned by Joseph and Vincent Anza.

The high court also dismissed a case it had heard arguments on in April involving Mohawk Industries Inc., a Georgia floor-covering company sued by a group of its workers for allegedly suppressing wages by hiring illegal workers.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, writing for the majority in the steel company case, said the victim of racketeering must suffer ``direct'' injury from illegal acts.

Ideal Steel Supply alleged that National Steel Supply defrauded New York state tax authorities by offering lower prices minus taxes to customers who paid in cash.

But Kennedy said the direct victim of the fraud was not Ideal Steel Supply but New York state.

In the other case, justices backed out of deciding the Mohawk Industries appeal, in which they heard arguments in April.

At that time, several justices voiced skepticism over whether the floor-covering company can be sued under anti-racketeering laws for allegedly using recruiters to find and hire illegal immigrants.

The Bush administration had sided with the workers, urging justices to allow the lawsuit to go forward.

Both cases were sent back to the appeals courts to resolve minor issues.

The high court's action is significant because it probably will affect both criminal and civil uses of the anti-racketeering law, particularly by the Justice Department. Federal prosecutors have long used the law to seek money damages from crooked unions and pension funds.

In a dissent in the steel company case, Justice Clarence Thomas said the high court's decision goes too far and is likely to have unintended consequences.

Thomas said he agreed with the majority's goal of limiting the use of the civil provisions of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act of 1970.

But Thomas said the high court's decision also will block ``honest businessmen'' from seeking redress in the courts when a competitor plays unfairly.

Often, he said, there are multiple victims in a racketeering scheme and it would be unfair for courts to say that only some of them have a right to file a lawsuit.

As a result, Thomas said, the majority decision is at odds with Congress' intent in passing the civil anti-racketeering provisions of the law.

The cases are Anza v. Ideal Steel Supply, 04-433, and Mohawk Industries v. Williams, 05-465.

Justice Department Monitors Elections In Seven Calif. Counties (AP)

AP, June 6, 2006

Washington, D.C. (AP) -- The U.S. Department of Justice said Monday that it will monitor Tuesday's primary election in seven California counties to make sure officials adequately serve voters who don't speak English.

Alameda, Orange, San Benito, San Diego, San Mateo, Santa Clara and Ventura counties all are required to provide election information, ballots and voting assistance information in one or more minority languages under the 1965 federal Voting Rights Act.

In San Diego County, for instance, officials settled a federal lawsuit in 2004 by agreeing to provide voting materials in Spanish, Tagalog and Vietnamese, along with poll workers who can translate in those languages.

Alameda County is using paper ballots in Tuesday's primary because its 4,000 Diebold Election Systems touchscreen machines failed to meet federal and state standards. That is expected to cause delays in reporting the election outcome because the county does not have enough optical scanners to count the ballots at all polling places.

Alameda could help determine the outcome of tight Democratic races, including the nominee for governor, because it is home to 5.7 percent of the state's registered Democrats.

In each of the seven counties, observers directed by lawyers from the department's Civil Rights Division will watch and record voting activities at polling places. The department also will monitor elections in Alabama, New Jersey, New Mexico and South Dakota, all of which have primary elections on Tuesday.

Last year the department monitored 47 elections in 14 states. It fielded a record nearly 2,000 observers in 2004 to monitor 163 elections in 29 states.

Congress and California both increased voting standards and monitoring after problems in Florida during 2000 delayed the outcome of the presidential election.

The federal government will monitor polling place activities during primary elections in Hale County, Ala., on Tuesday to ensure compliance with the Voting Rights Act, the Justice Department announced Monday.

Hale County is one of 18 counties in Alabama, California, New Jersey, New Mexico and South Dakota to be monitored during Tuesday's voting.

Federal observers will watch and record activities during voting hours at polling locations to ensure that the rights of voters to participate in the election is not denied on the basis of their race. The department sends hundreds of observers each year to monitor elections across the country.

Debate On Gay-marriage Ban Splits Senate, Public (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate began debate Monday on a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage, as President Bush told supporters at the White House that marriage should not "be redefined by activist judges."

Advocates on both sides say there's virtually no chance the Senate will muster the 67 votes needed to approve the amendment when the Senate votes Wednesday. Backers could get just 48 votes on a preliminary vote when the Senate debated it in 2004.

With five months to go before Republicans try to hold on to their majority in congressional elections this November, however, the goal may not be so much to win as to raise this and other issues that energize conservative Republicans.

The Senate is also scheduled to take up a bill to repeal the estate tax and a constitutional amendment to ban desecration of the American flag. Like the gay-marriage ban, both have been debated and rejected before.

Democrats attacked the decision by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., to spend time on these issues. "The reason for this debate is to divide our society," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. "It is this administration's way of avoiding the tough, real problems."

"The Senate needs to act now," Frist said recently. "The American people deserve a full debate … before marriage is redefined for everyone."

Debating issues such as gay marriage appeals to core voters Republicans will need this fall, says Jennifer Duffy, an analyst at the non-partisan Cook Political Report. "It plays into their fear" that if more Democrats are elected, issues like this will fare even worse, she says.

A Gallup Poll last month found the public divided over whether to change the Constitution to ban gay marriage: 50% favor an amendment, and 47% oppose it.

The White House also is split. Vice President Cheney, whose daughter Mary is gay, says the issue should be left up to the states.

A federal amendment would reverse a 2003 Massachusetts court ruling that legalized gay marriage and head off similar decisions by judges in other states. It also would halt legal challenges to amendments in 19 states that bar same-sex marriage in their constitutions. Last year, a federal judge overturned Nebraska's amendment, which was approved by 70% of voters in 2004.

"Marriage is under attack," said Sen. Wayne Allard, R-Colo., the federal amendment's chief sponsor. "As a legislature, I don't think we should stand back and surrender this issue to the courts."

A constitutional amendment must be approved by two-thirds of both the House and Senate and then ratified by 38 of 50 states to become law. Allard said he won't get the 67 votes to approve it in the Senate, but he predicted a "significant milestone": a majority approval for the first time. Allard and the Human Rights Campaign, a gay advocacy group, expect a 52-48 vote. Almost all Senate Democrats oppose the measure, as do several moderate Republicans.

Amendment supporters say that the issue cuts across party lines and that Democratic African-American ministers and inner-city Hispanic activists favor a ban. But some in Bush's own party are dissatisfied with his commitment to the issue.

“He needs to twist some arms” to get the needed votes, says Paul Weyrich of the conservative Free Congress Foundation. “There's no evidence he's doing that.”

Senate Debates Measure To Ban Gay Marriage (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds And James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate opened debate Monday on a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage, an issue Republican strategists hope will help drive conservative voters to the polls during fall congressional elections.

At the White House, President Bush tried to rally support for the amendment, even though its backers said it was expected to fall well short of the 67 votes needed for passage.

"Marriage is the most fundamental institution of civilization, and it should not be redefined by activist judges," Bush told supporters. It was the second time in three days that the president spoke in favor of the amendment, a topic he had barely touched since he energized conservative loyalists with his support for the measure during the 2004 presidential campaign.

In a 10-minute address interrupted 11 times by applause, the president repeatedly referred to courts and judges — calling them "activist" and "over-reaching." If a court overturns the federal Defense of Marriage Act, Bush said, "every state would have to recognize marriage as redefined by judges in, say, Massachusetts or local officials in San Francisco, no matter what their own state laws or their state constitutions say."

The 1996 law says that states are not required to recognize same-sex marriages contracted in other states. But supporters of the constitutional amendment say the law faces challenges in several states, making the amendment necessary. They say the country's social foundation is threatened by moves in Massachusetts and elsewhere to expand the definition of marriage to include same-sex couples.

Opponents say that marriage laws are the purview of the states, not the federal government. They complain that the amendment would formalize discrimination against a social group.

On the Senate floor, supporters of the amendment echoed Bush's arguments.

"We're here today at the threshold of the democratic process — that is, a constitutional amendment — because marriage is under attack," said Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.), the amendment's sponsor. "I believe that because the institution of marriage is too precious to surrender to the whims of a handful of unelected activist judges, now is the time to send to the states a constitutional amendment that protects traditional marriage and prevents judges from rewriting our traditional marriage laws."

A procedural vote on the measure is slated for Wednesday. Democrats accuse Republicans of scheduling the debate to help organize voter turnout in November, when Republicans appear to face the toughest election challenge since they won a majority in Congress in 1994.

"For me it is clear the reason for this debate is to divide our society, to pit one against another," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.). "This is another one of the president's efforts to frighten, to distort, to distract and to confuse America. It is this administration's way of avoiding the tough, real problems that American citizens are confronted with each and every day."

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow acknowledged there was a "political dimension" to Bush's speech, because the measure was before the Senate, but said in response to a question, "I don't think it's posturing."

As for making same-sex marriage a priority at a time when issues such as the war in Iraq have hurt Bush's poll numbers, Snow said the president could "deal with more than one issue at a time."

Bush spoke at the Eisenhower Executive Office Building, next door to the White House. Some of those invited had been told the session would take place in the White House Rose Garden, a location that would have elevated the status of the meeting, but without explanation the venue was shifted.

Bush Rallies Gay Marriage Opponents (AP)

By Laurie Kellman

The Associated Press, June 5, 2006

Cheered by conservative supporters, President Bush gave a push Monday to a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage as the Senate opened debate on an emotional, election-year measure that has little chance of passing.

"Our policies should aim to strengthen families, not undermine them," Bush said in a speech. "And changing the definition of marriage would undermine the family structure."

All Senate Democrats, except Ben Nelson of Nebraska, oppose the amendment, and critics say Bush's efforts are primarily aimed at energizing conservative voters for the November elections. Together with moderate Republicans, the Democrats are expected to block a yes-or-no vote, killing the measure for the year.

"This proposed constitutional amendment is being used to satisfy the most extreme right-wing supporters and politicians," said Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record), D-Vt. "The Constitution is too important to be used for such a partisan political purpose."

Sen. Wayne Allard (news, bio, voting record), R-Colo., who sponsored the measure, acknowledged that politics played a part in the timing of the debate, but for a different reason: to force senators to take a stand and answer for their votes on the campaign trail.

"We ought to have a vote on the amendment every year," Allard said.

The amendment would prohibit states from recognizing same-sex marriages. To become law, it would need two-thirds support in the Senate and House, and then would have to be ratified by at least 38 state legislatures.

The White House played down the significance of the 10-minute presidential event, saying Bush was simply speaking out on an issue being debated on Capitol Hill. Press secretary Tony Snow said the president was not personally lobbying senators to pass the amendment.

Bush also pressed for it in his radio address on Saturday.

"I'm not sure this is a big driver among voters," Snow said.

Bush said a constitutional amendment is needed because laws that state legislatures have passed defining marriage as being between a man and a woman are being overturned by a few judges.

"When judges insist on imposing their arbitrary will on the people, the only alternative left to the people is an amendment to the Constitution — the only law a court cannot overturn," the president said.

Bush also rebuffed critics who argue that the amendment conflicts with the GOP's opposition to government interference and the importance of states' rights.

"A constitutional amendment would not take this issue away from the states, as some have argued," Bush said. "It would take the issue away from the courts and put it directly before the American people."

First lady Laura Bush said recently that while Americans want to debate the issue, "I don't think it should be used as a campaign tool."

Vice President Dick Cheney, whose daughter, Mary, is a lesbian, splits with Bush on the issue. Cheney said he thinks Americans should do everything they can to accommodate any type of relationship, and that there should not necessarily be a federal policy in this area.

Human Rights Campaign President Joe Solmonese said Bush was favoring an amendment that would give Americans license to discriminate against homosexuals.

"The fact that he's out of step with the first lady and the powerful vice president tells me who he's answering to today," Solmonese said.

DOJ_NMG_0031850

More than half of Americans, 58 percent, said in an ABC News poll released Monday that same-sex marriages should be illegal. But only four in 10 said they support amending the Constitution to ban gay marriage, while a majority said states should make their own laws on gay marriage.

With Bush taking center stage on the issue, advocates on both sides of the issue rushed to comment.

On the left, Caroline Fredrickson, director of the ACLU legislative office in Washington, said lawmakers rightly rejected the amendment in 2004 and should do so again. "Discrimination has no place in America, and certainly not in our founding document," she said.

On the right, Matt Daniels, president of the Alliance for Marriage, argued that same-sex marriage advocates are trying to circumvent the democratic process and redefine marriage through the courts. "Marriage is the social glue that unites the two halves of the human race to share in the enterprise of raising the next generation," Daniels said.

Bush Reiterates Support For Amendment Banning Gay Marriage (KRT)

By William Douglas

Knight Ridder, June 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - For the second time in three days, President Bush implored the Senate to pass a constitutional amendment banning gay marriage, saying Monday that the issue needs to be wrestled away from "overreaching judges" and placed in the hands of the American people.

Critics on both sides of the debate accused the president of playing politics with the socially sensitive issue by seeking to rouse social conservatives to support Republicans in this congressional election year even if the cause has no realistic hope of enactment. Bush's talk came as the Senate continued debate on a measure that isn't likely to win the two-thirds majority vote in both the Senate and House of Representatives that the Constitution requires.

"Marriage is the most fundamental institution of civilization and it should not be redefined by activist judges," Bush said following a meeting with amendment supporters in the White House. "Our policies should aim to strengthen families, not undermine them. And our changing the definition of marriage would undermine the family structure."

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said the White House is using the gay marriage issue to try to divert attention from the war in Iraq, high gasoline prices and other issues that aren't going the administration's way.

"This is another one of the president's efforts to frighten, to distort, to distract and to confuse America," Reid said. "It is this administration's way of avoiding the tough, real problems that American citizens are confronted with each and every day."

The Log Cabin Republicans, a Republican gay and lesbian organization, called the amendment a "politically motivated" effort to "write discrimination into the U.S. Constitution."

"The president's call for `tolerance and civility' while advocating discrimination rings hollow," Log Cabin President Patrick Guerriero said in a written statement.

Bush told conservative religious leaders, educators and social activists that he's supporting the Marriage Protection Amendment in the Senate because traditional marriage - between a man and a woman - is under fire.

"This national question requires a national solution," he said. "An amendment to the Constitution is necessary because activist courts have left our nation with no other choice. When activist judges insist on imposing their arbitrary will on the people, the only alternative left to the people is an amendment to the Constitution, the only law a court cannot overturn."

The Senate measure states: "Marriage in the United States shall consist only of the union of a man and a woman. Neither this Constitution, nor the constitution of any state, shall be construed to require that marriage or legal incidents thereof be conferred upon any union other than the union of a man and a woman."

Sponsors of the amendment say it gives room for state legislatures to approve civil unions for same-sex couples.

Bush's unequivocal support of the act impressed some in his audience who have questioned his commitment to conservative causes.

"I was very pleased with what the president said," said James Dobson, founder of Focus on the Family, a conservative Christian organization. "I would prefer the amendment prohibit civil unions, but we will take what he can get."

Paul Weyrich, chairman of the conservative Free Congress Research and Education Foundation, was less impressed.

"He is not serious about the amendment," Weyrich said. "He's reluctantly gotten back in the fight, but he doesn't like it. The rhetoric is fine, but to get anywhere he's got to twist arms and he's not doing it. You know the U.S. Senate - they won't do anything unless extraordinary pressure is put on them."

The amendment faces daunting odds in the Senate. Only one of the 44 Senate Democrats - Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska - has expressed support for the measure. Support among the Senate's handful of moderates among 55 Republicans is scant. The Senate's lone independent, James Jeffords of Vermont, tends to vote with Democrats.

The Constitution requires approval by two-thirds of both the House and Senate to forward a constitutional amendment to the states, and three-quarters of state legislatures also must approve it to change the nation's fundamental legal charter.

Bush said the Senate proposal reflects the will of Americans who "have spoken clearly on this issue" through state referendums and the 1996 passage of the Defense of Marriage Act, which then-President Clinton signed.

But a recent Gallup Poll shows that issues such as same-sex marriage are a low priority for most Americans at this time. In the poll, conducted last month, 42 percent of Americans said Iraq should be the top priority for the president and Congress, while only 1 percent said ethics/moral, religious/family decline issues should top their agenda.

(EDITORS: The survey mentioned in the last graf was conducted May 22-24 with 1,003 adult respondents ages 18 and older. The margin of error is plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Bush Promotes Amendment To Define Marriage, Ban Same-Sex Unions (BLOOM)

By Richard Keil

Bloomberg, June 6, 2006

June 5 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush, facing record low job-approval ratings, renewed his support for a constitutional ban on same-sex marriages as he and his Republican Party seek to rally supporters ahead of the November congressional elections.

``You are here because you strongly support a constitutional amendment that defines marriage as between a man and a woman," Bush told a group of activists and supporters today at the White House. ``I am proud to stand by you."

Speaking just before the Republican-controlled Senate opened debate on the issue, Bush said amending the U.S. Constitution would prevent ``activist judges" from redefining the institution of marriage by striking down state laws limiting state-sanctioned unions to heterosexual couples.

The president was addressing for the second time in three days an issue that had dropped on his agenda since the 2004 election. While White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said Bush was simply following a common practice of commenting on legislative matters pending before Congress, Bush's Democratic opponents said the timing has more to do with politics.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada said in an e-mail to supporters that Republican Senate leaders should be addressing gasoline prices, health care costs and the Iraq war.

``But there's an ugly truth: it's election season and down-in-the-polls Republicans are turning to their same old playbook - fear and division," Reid wrote. Senate Majority Leader ``Bill Frist, in an attempt to appease extreme right wing elements of the Republican Party, has promised that the Senate will vote on the Federal Marriage Act."

Shoring Up Support

Republicans are reviving the same-sex marriage ban as part of an effort to ``shore up their base" before the congressional elections, said L. Michael Seidman, a Georgetown University law professor. As written, the Senate's amendment proposal wouldn't overturn state laws like one in Massachusetts that broadened the definition of marriage.

Snow said the timing was a product of the Senate's legislative schedule, set by Frist and other Republican leaders without input from Bush.

While Bush's views on gay marriage haven't changed, he and his party have paid greater attention to the issue during election years.

On Feb. 24, 2004, as his re-election campaign was getting underway, Bush called for a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage, a position also taken by his 2004 opponent, Democratic Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts.

Senate Support

Shortly after winning re-election, Bush told The Washington Post in a January 16, 2005, interview that while he still supported the amendment, he would not lobby heavily for its passage because he believed that until a federal court overturned the Defense of Marriage Act, there would not be enough votes to ensure its passage in the Senate.

There is some evidence that the issue helped Bush in 2004; even though the amendment died in Congress during the run-up to the election, 11 states had measures related to the same-sex marriage ban on their ballots. Bush won nine of those states, including Ohio, which ensured he would serve a second term.

So far, voters in 19 states have approved amendments to their state constitutions that define marriage as being between a man and a woman.

The initiatives were approved by ``decisive majorities," Bush said today. ``The American people have spoken clearly on this issue."

Amending the Constitution requires approval of a 2/3 majority in the House and Senate. The amendment must then be ratified by 3/4 of the states.

``The question is, whether there are the votes in the U.S. Senate to push forward," Snow said.

Another is how hard Bush will press lawmakers. On past legislative priorities, such as the $1.85 trillion in tax cuts passed during his first term and immigration legislation now under consideration, Bush has telephoned lawmakers or invited them to the White House for personal lobbying.

``I'm not aware of any planned phone calls," Snow said. ``Too much is being made of this."

Bush's job approval rating was at a record-low 33 percent in an ABC News/Washington Post poll published May 16, with 65 percent of the 1,103 respondents disapproving of the way Bush is handling his job. That was matched by public disapproval of the way Congress is doing its job.

Debate Begins On Gay Marriage (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

President Bush renewed his call yesterday for Congress to approve a constitutional amendment defining marriage as the union between a man and a woman, saying such a step is necessary to keep courts from undermining traditional marriage.

As the Senate began debate on the amendment barring same-sex marriage, the president summoned supporters to the White House to hear his plea that marriage "not be redefined by activist judges." The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court has legalized same-sex marriage, and courts in other states have nullified voter-approved referendums that would ban it.

The president's comments cheered conservative activists, coming after a long period of relative quiet from him on an issue many analysts believe was critical to his reelection victories in Ohio and other states in 2004.

But Bush's latest foray on this emotional terrain dismayed Democrats and gay rights advocates, who accused the president of using a wedge issue to regain political momentum after setbacks from Iraq and Hurricane Katrina. They said Bush's political motives were transparent, given that even backers acknowledge the amendment has virtually no chance of being approved in the current Congress.

Aides have portrayed the president as a somewhat reluctant warrior in a battle forced on him by judges who have struck down laws against same-sex marriage in Maryland, New York and other states. The White House itself has been unusually divided on the issue, with Vice President Cheney making it clear that he disagrees with the president and first lady Laura Bush saying the issue should not be made a political tool.

"He does not want to be wrongly seen as driving this debate," said Matt Daniels, president of the Alliance for Marriage, a leading advocate of the constitutional amendment and part of a small group of activists who met privately with Bush before his speech.

Daniels and other conservatives professed themselves content with the president's statement, despite complaints from some of their allies that Bush should be doing more. "I was very pleased with what the president said -- I don't think he could say it much stronger than he did," said James C. Dobson, chairman and founder of Focus on the Family, a prominent conservative voice.

Minutes after Bush's remarks on marriage, the Senate opened debate on the proposed amendment. Democratic leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) rebuked Republicans for devoting time to the issue rather than addressing high gasoline prices, the national debt and other matters.

"For me, it is clear the reason for this debate is to divide our society, to pit one against another," Reid said. "This is another one of the president's efforts to frighten, to distort, to distract and to confuse America."

The politics of same-sex marriage are complex: Polls suggest the country remains solidly opposed, but the public is more ambivalent about a constitutional amendment. The issue galvanized conservative voters in 2004, but pollsters believe the issue simultaneously weakens Bush's efforts to rebuild ties to moderate voters, who have abandoned him in recent months and have helped drive down his approval ratings.

Republican leaders appear to be betting that a new thrust against same-sex marriage could help the party in this year's midterm elections, especially in such states as Pennsylvania, Montana, Missouri and Ohio, where Senate GOP incumbents face stiff challenges.

But Bush appeared mindful of the minefield he was navigating yesterday. He appeared at a room in the Eisenhower Executive Office Building rather than the more symbolic Rose Garden, where activists were first told he would make his statement. The debate over the amendment, he said, should be conducted with "tolerance and respect and dignity."

Bush also took pains to note the limitations of the proposed amendment, which reads, in its entirety: "Marriage in the United States shall consist only of the union of a man and a woman. Neither this Constitution, nor the constitution of any State, shall be construed to require that marriage or the legal incidents thereof be conferred upon any union other than the union of a man and a woman."

That language, he said, leaves the states free to define other legal arrangements for gay couples -- such as civil unions, proponents of the amendment said. Bush also framed the issue as one being created by courts, an approach that could appeal to conservatives concerned about what they consider judicial excesses though not necessarily same-sex marriage.

Joe Solmonese, president of the Human Rights Campaign, the leading gay rights lobby, rejected that explanation. "When I hear this whole thing talked about in terms of activist judges, to me it says [they] have got to find another way to talk about discrimination," he said.

With Democrats largely opposed, congressional leaders say neither the House nor the Senate has the two-thirds majority in favor that would be necessary to send the amendment to the states for ratification.

Still, Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.) defended the effort. "Marriage is under attack," he said at a news conference. "The Constitution will be amended whether we pass this amendment or not. The only question is whether it will be amended through the amendment process or by unelected activist judges."

But another Republican -- Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (Pa.) -- spoke against the amendment, calling it "a solution in search of a problem." Like Reid and some other senators, Specter said he opposes same-sex marriage but feels states can handle the issue.

With Gay Marriage Ban, Conservatives Keep Score (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 5 — President Bush's push for the constitutional ban on same-sex marriage that is being debated in the Senate this week comes as many Republicans and religious conservatives are beginning a campaign to help lawmakers who support it during this year's elections — and to punish those who do not.

Though people on both sides of the debate say they do not expect the amendment to come anywhere near winning approval this week, both sides say they expect it, and an anticipated version in the House, to be used as a conservative litmus test in elections this fall.

"It is true what this vote will do will be to help the voters identify who is and is not supportive of the family," Dr. James C. Dobson, founder of Focus on the Family, said in an interview on Monday. "And I think those that are not are going to have to answer for it."

Dr. Dobson's group is already running advertisements against senators who do not plan to support the amendment, including one against Senator Ken Salazar, Democrat of Colorado, that says, "Why doesn't Senator Salazar believe every child needs a mother and a father?"

Republican Party officials in several states have released statements attacking Democrats who are not expected to vote for the amendment. And another conservative group, the Family Research Council, is planning to ask lawmakers to take "a marriage protection pledge" and then tell voters who signs it and who does not.

Dr. Dobson and other proponents of the ban got a boost on Monday afternoon, when Mr. Bush called on the Senate to approve the measure. "The constitutional amendment that the Senate will consider this week would fully protect marriage from being redefined," Mr. Bush told a room of religious leaders and advocates.

His speech came as the Senate began to debate the proposed amendment, which would define marriage as being between a man and a woman and would prohibit judges from requiring states to grant same-sex couples the legal benefits of marriage.

It was the second time in three days that Mr. Bush made an address supporting the measure. His speeches were part of an effort by the White House to re-energize culturally conservative voters who have long supported Mr. Bush and his Congressional allies, but who are expressing frustration that their issues have not been pushed strongly enough since 2004.

Pollsters have cited demoralization as a major reason for the low opinion ratings for the president and his party this election year, when Republicans are trying to keep control of the Senate and the House.

Republican officials are hoping that the marriage debate will help them as it did in 2004, when 13 state ballot initiatives banning same-sex marriage or civil unions were credited with drawing many conservative voters to the polls and propelling Mr. Bush and Congressional Republicans to victory.

Democrats have called the Republican push for the amendment a diversionary tactic that will not work this year, when voters are focused on other matters like rising gas prices and the war in Iraq. And some pollsters say the issue may not resonate as it did in 2004.

"People are so disillusioned with Iraq and $50 tanks of gas that I don't think it's as much of an attention grabber," said Andrew Kohut, president of the Pew Research Center.

But Republican officials note that up to eight states may have ballot measures to ban same-sex marriage, including Alabama, South Dakota, Virginia and Tennessee, where a court decision on a referendum is pending.

Chris Devaney, executive director of the Tennessee Republican Party, said a ballot measure would help drive turnout for whoever wins the Republican Senate primary in August. "People voting for this are generally more conservative," he said. "It will definitely have an effect."

The Democrat seeking the open Senate seat, Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., supports the amendment being debated this week.

Elsewhere, some moderate Republicans, including Senators Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and Olympia J. Snowe and Susan Collins of Maine, have not supported the amendment and are also coming under fire from conservative groups.

The Senate debate on Monday showed just how contentious the issue could become.

"Our nation would be better served if we refrained from divisiveness that is wielded like a weapon in order to score political and emotional points before an election," said Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the senior Democrat on the Judiciary Committee.

Republicans argued that the state of marriage and the American family was exactly the sort of fundamental issue that Congress should take up. "It is not bigotry to define marriage as a union of a man and a woman," said Senator Sam Brownback, Republican of Kansas.

GOP Targets Gay Marriage (CSM)

DOJ_NMG_0031855

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - Gay marriage is back in the political spotlight, as the Senate begins debate on a constitutional amendment banning it and President Bush speaks out on behalf of the measure.

But from the outset, the outcome is nearly certain: There are probably not enough votes in the Senate to build the two-thirds majority needed to pass a constitutional amendment, members of both parties agree. And so, as debate began Monday, analysts were hard put to see any other motive than political for putting the issue forward now.

"It's connected to the fall elections and the situation in the Republican Party," says James Guth, a political scientist at Furman University in Greenville, S.C. "There's no way around that."

With Mr. Bush struggling to win back support of fellow Republicans who have grown discouraged, the president has been under increasing pressure to advocate forcefully on an issue that religious conservatives consider of utmost importance, especially with state court cases under way that could lead to legalization of same-sex marriage. Congress faces even larger political stakes: low public approval ratings, and, unlike Bush, danger of low voter turnout this fall in the midterm elections among social conservatives that could hurt Republicans seeking to maintain their majority.

At the same time, the GOP's efforts at creating a "big tent" image will be put to the test. Some of the most vulnerable members of Congress - many of them moderate Republicans from the Northeast - could be hurt by the debate, as it highlights a point of view less resonant in that part of the country than in others.

The debate could also reverberate further into the future, into the 2008 presidential contest. Sen. John McCain of Arizona, a likely GOP contender, opposes a constitutional amendment defining marriage as between a man and a woman, arguing that the issue should be left up to the states. He has long faced hostility from social conservative leaders over this and other positions, and his recent efforts at reconciliation with this activist wing of the party could be set back by the debate.

Sen. Bill Frist (R) of Tennessee, who is retiring from the Senate at the end of the current term, also may run for president, and so his advocacy for the Marriage Protection Amendment is also seen through the lens of his own possible ambitions. Senator Frist has also scheduled a vote this week on a constitutional amendment banning flag-burning, another measure seen as highly political.

For Bush, after a flurry of action this week on gay marriage, the question could be, what next? If the amendment fails in the Senate, as presumed, he will face continuing pressure to push for this and other measures important to religious conservatives. During his presidency, his pattern usually has been to hold positions consistent with those of religious conservatives, but not to advocate for them as fiercely as religious leaders would like. On constitutional amendments, the president plays no formal role - his signature is not required - so any power he may wield would come through the bully pulpit.

The amendment consists of two sentences: "Marriage in the United States shall consist only of the union of a man and a woman. Neither this Constitution, nor the constitution of any State, shall be construed to require that marriage or the legal incidents thereof be conferred upon any union other than the union of a man and a woman."

Speaking to a bipartisan group of amendment supporters at the White House on Monday afternoon, Bush repeatedly castigated what he called "activist judges" for thwarting the will of the people on same-sex marriage. "Marriage is the most fundamental institution of civilization, and it should not be redefined by activist judges," Bush said.

But not all religious conservatives are happy with the amendment's wording. One opponent, the Rev. Louis Sheldon of the Traditional Values Coalition, says the amendment amounts to a "hollow gesture" when it comes to protecting marriage and argues that the second sentence, in particular, would in fact allow civil unions and other forms of "counterfeit marriage" in the states.

"Saturday the president said in his [weekly radio] message that this Marriage Protection Amendment does fully protect marriage. It doesn't," says Mr. Sheldon. "So why would you want to break your back and spend millions of dollars in 38 states passing it, even if it did pass the Congress, if it gives the states the right to do the thing that has totally brought all this to a head, civil unions and domestic partners?"

Sheldon represents a minority view among social conservatives, however, and for now, Bush and supporters of the current language are pressing ahead. But even if the measure dies for now in the Senate, the issue will remain alive at the state level. At least six states will have measures on the ballot this year, most of them banning gay marriage, and activists in other states are working on fulfilling requirements for similar measures. In New York, the state's highest court is considering an appeal that could end up legalizing gay marriage there.

Unlike public opinion on other hot-button social issues, such as abortion, Americans' views of gay marriage have been evolving. In March 1996, 27 percent of Americans believed homosexual marriage should be recognized by the law as valid, according to the Gallup Poll. Today that number is 39 percent. Amendment history

Most recent amendment: 1992, the 27th, limiting congressional pay raises.

Last two serious attempts:

• The Equal Rights Amendment, proposed in 1972. It read in part: "Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex." It cleared both chambers of Congress and at one time was ratified by 35 states - short of what was needed.

• The District of Columbia Voting Rights Amendment, proposed in 1978. It would have granted Washington, D.C., the full voting rights in Congress of a state. It expired unratified in 1985.

Republicans Reignite Hot-Button Issues (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck And Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Senate Republicans are pushing ahead with votes this week to repeal the estate tax and to ban gay marriage. Neither measure is likely to pass. But party strategists say both issues could help Republicans maintain control of Congress, by rallying demoralized social and economic conservatives, and by forcing divisions between liberal and conservative Democrats.

First up is a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage, which the Senate is expected to consider tomorrow. President Bush, who has been largely silent on the issue since pushing it during his 2004 re-election campaign, urged passage yesterday in a speech near the White House to religious leaders and other backers of the measure.

Supporters concede they are unlikely to get the 60 votes necessary to cut off debate, much less the two-thirds vote needed to clear the Senate. But they hope the bill can help some embattled candidates at the polls.

One is Ohio Republican Sen. Mike DeWine. A gay-marriage ban on the 2004 ballot in the Buckeye State is widely credited with drawing evangelicals to the polls and helping Mr. Bush narrowly carry that state. But Mr. De-Wine opposed that measure, citing objections to language that he said would invite lawsuits. That is one reason he appears to have trouble rallying social conservatives. This year, Mr. DeWine is a sponsor of the Senate amendment, which doesn't include the language he objected to previously.

In Pennsylvania, where Republican Sen. Rick Santorum is in a close contest to keep his seat, Republicans have highlighted his support of the gay-marriage amendment to help separate him from Democrat Bob Casey Jr. Mr. Casey has blurred his differences with the incumbent on social issues, since he is one of the few prominent Democrats who, like Mr. Santorum, opposes abortion. Mr. Casey said in an April debate that he opposes gay marriage but wouldn't support a constitutional ban, according to the Philadelphia Inquirer.

Republicans "are playing to that smaller group, that group of conservative, Republican, religious people," says John Green, a political-science professor at the University of Akron in Ohio and a senior fellow at the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life. "In a close election, those people could make a very big difference. If it wasn't a close election, I don't think you'd see it being much of an issue."

Definition of Marriage

The measure would define marriage as a union of a man and woman and declare that constitutions at the state and federal levels shouldn't be interpreted as requiring that marital status be available to gay couples. The drive for a federal ban gained momentum when the Massachusetts Supreme Court ruled in 2003 that the state's constitution did forbid restricting same-sex marriages.

DOJ_NMG_0031857

"This flushes out senators who try to have it both ways," says Tom Minnery, senior vice president of government and public policy at Focus on the Family, which in a recent ad campaign has turned up pressure on Senate Democrats and moderate Republicans to vote for the amendment. "If they don't vote for this amendment, they don't support traditional marriage. It comes down to that."

Indeed, while Democratic leaders oppose the measure, at least one senator facing re-election in a Republican-leaning "red state" is breaking with the party over the issue. Nebraska's Ben Nelson is dropping his opposition and says he will now support the constitutional amendment. He says he changed his mind after a federal judge last year overturned a state-level ban.

Mr. Nelson also plans to split with the majority of fellow Democrats when the Senate takes up estate-tax repeal, likely on Thursday. He won't be the only Democrat on the ballot in a state carried by President Bush making that choice. Bill Nelson of Florida also plans to vote to repeal the tax. Republicans say they may be able to pick up support from two other Democrats running for re-election: Washington's Maria Cantwell and North Dakota's Kent Conrad.

Like the gay-marriage amendment, the estate-tax measure is likely to draw support from a majority of senators, but also to fall short of the 60 votes required to shut off a Democratic filibuster.

Estate-tax repeal could be salvaged by an election-year compromise between a Republican facing a re-election fight in a state that appears to be trending Democratic, and a Democrat in a heavily Republican state.

Republican Sen. Jon Kyl of Arizona has opened talks with Montana Democrat Sen. Max Baucus, the top Democrat on the Senate Finance Committee. New York Democrat Sen. Charles Schumer, who is chairman of the Senate Democrats' campaign arm, is also part of the discussions. Aides say they hope to reach a deal in the next couple of days.

Rather than repeal the tax, the senators are working on legislation that would exempt all but the super-wealthy from paying taxes on their estates at death by exempting as much as $10 million of estates from the tax. The senators are also talking about lowering the tax rates that individuals pay on the value of their estates when they die.

Republicans rolled back the estate tax in President Bush's 2001 tax bill. The tax is being lowered each year from the 55% rate of 2001 until it is abolished in 2010. The rollback expires the following year, returning to 55% in 2011.

A Vote Before Elections

House Republicans vote each congressional session to wipe out the tax. But the Senate has fallen short of the 60 votes needed to follow suit. If senators reach a compromise, Republican leaders in the House are likely to bring it to a final vote before the elections.

But it is unclear if Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist would allow a compromise to come to a vote on the Senate floor. The possible 2008 presidential contender has positioned himself as a champion of abolishing the tax. Giving his blessing to the compromise could hurt his chances with the party's base in primaries two years from now.

Beyond the marriage and tax measures, Republicans in Congress and the White House are looking for other issues to lure conservatives to the polls. The Senate also is likely to debate, perhaps as soon as this month, an anti-flag-burning amendment and might consider a prohibition on transferring a minor across state lines to get an abortion unless her parents give permission.

Republicans need a boost from within their party if they are to maintain their majorities in the House and Senate. As of April, just 27% of conservatives approved of Congress, compared with 53% in January 2005, according to a Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll. That is even lower than Mr. Bush's approval rating among conservatives, which was 60% in April compared with 71% in January 2005.

Bush Pushes Hill On Marriage Measure (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

President Bush yesterday told Congress to pass an amendment defining marriage in the U.S. Constitution and send it to the states for ratification, saying that's the only way to decide the issue through the democratic process rather than the courts.

"Take this issue out of the hands of overreaching judges and put it back where it belongs -- in the hands of the American people," he told dozens of leaders from religious and pro-family groups in a speech yesterday.

He said an amendment is the most democratic solution because it requires two-thirds approval in the House and Senate and ratification by legislatures in three-fourths of the states.

The president is staking out a position while trying to avoid being seen as driving the issue for political purposes, and in his 10-minute speech, he blamed "activist judges" and "activist courts" four times for forcing the issue.

But politics is exactly what Democrats said was going on as the Senate took up the Marriage Protection Amendment yesterday, following through on a promise by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican.

"They intend to stir up an election-year fight and use it as a campaign tool and a political strategy," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat. "Right now, we should be addressing America's top priorities, including ways to make America safer or the war in Iraq, or the rising gas prices."

The amendment is not expected to pass -- or for that matter even to garner the 60 votes needed to overcome a Democratic filibuster. A vote is scheduled for tomorrow.

Both Republicans and Democrats are using the debate to try to score political points with supporters.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) used the Senate's marriage-amendment debate to criticize the Democratic challenger to Sen. Rick Santorum, a Pennsylvania Republican facing a tough re-election battle.

They chided Democrat Bob Casey Jr. for not speaking at a Saturday meeting in Pittsburgh of the Stonewall Democrats, a homosexual rights group that supports him. Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean did speak to the group.

"The fact that Casey Jr. is having Howard Dean stand in for him speaks volumes about his political courage," said NRSC spokesman Dan Ronayne. "When given a chance to stand up for something, Casey Jr. comes up empty again."

From the other side, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee sent out an e-mail to supporters yesterday from Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, blasting Republicans.

"It's election season and down-in-the-polls Republicans are turning to their same old playbook -- fear and division," wrote Mr. Reid, Nevada Democrat. "We need a president and a Congress that doesn't play divisive politics."

The amendment being debated in the Senate reads: "Marriage in the United States shall consist only of the union of a man and a woman. Neither this Constitution, nor the constitution of any State, shall be construed to require that marriage or the legal incidents thereof be conferred upon any union other than the union of a man and a woman."

Mr. Bush said it would create a national definition of marriage but would leave to state legislatures the issue of civil unions or other legal benefit arrangements for unmarried partners.

He called marriage "the most enduring and important human institution" and said changing the definition would undermine it.

Before speaking in an auditorium in the Eisenhower Executive Office Building, the president met in the White House Roosevelt Room for more than a half-hour with a small group of leaders.

Matt Daniels, president of the Alliance for Marriage, which helped craft the Senate language, attended the meeting and said the president and leaders present all agreed marriage should be a unifying issue, not a divisive one.

Mr. Daniels said he told the president that he was raised on welfare by a single mother in Spanish Harlem in New York. He said Mr. Bush marveled at that, saying, "That's a long way from where I grew up."

Mr. Daniels said he responded that the issue of marriage "bridges the gap of where you come from and where I come from."

Conservative leaders said they were happy with Mr. Bush's emphatic endorsement of the amendment.

"It left no room for misinterpretation," said Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council.

One key question for conservatives is how much effort the president will put into working senators on the issue.

Both Mr. Perkins and James Dobson, founder of Focus on the Family, said they expected the White House to make phone calls to senators on the issue as a way of showing their commitment, but the White House did not rule that in or out.

White House press secretary Tony Snow cautioned against reading too much into Mr. Bush's efforts both yesterday and Saturday, when he devoted his weekly radio address to the issue.

"I don't know [that] this counts as lobbying. The president has issued a radio address restating his position, and he is meeting with some supporters of the amendment," he said.

Base Assumptions (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

This month's offensive by President Bush and his allies in Congress against gay marriage and flag burning proves one thing: The Republican Party thinks its base of social conservatives is a nest of dummies who have no memories and respond like bulls whenever red flags are waved in their faces.

The people who should be angry this week are not liberals or gays or lesbians, but the president's most loyal supporters. After using the gay-marriage issue shamelessly in the 2004 campaign, Bush and Republican leaders left opponents of gay marriage out in the cold as they concentrated on the party's real priorities: privatizing Social Security and cutting taxes on rich people.

When Bush was at his position of maximum strength after the 2004 election, did he use his political energy on behalf of a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage? Not at all. In an interview with The Post on Jan. 14, 2005, he dismissed the question, arguing that since many senators felt that the Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA) was already an effective bar to the spread of gay marital unions, there was no point in fighting for a constitutional change.

"Senators have made it clear that so long as DOMA is deemed constitutional, nothing will happen," Bush said then. "I'd take their admonition seriously."

On Jan. 24, 2005, Republican Senate leaders announced their top 10 legislative priorities. The marriage amendment was nowhere to be seen.

At the time, social conservatives knew they were getting rolled. In mid-January, a group of them expressed their dismay in a letter to Karl Rove, Bush's top political adviser.

"We couldn't help but notice the contrast between how the president is approaching the difficult issue of Social Security privatization . . . and the marriage issue," they wrote. "Is he prepared to spend significant political capital on privatization but reluctant to devote the same energy to preserving traditional marriage? If so it would create outrage with countless voters who stood with him just a few weeks ago."

The marriage amendment is unlikely to pass (and it shouldn't, since marriage is an issue for the states to decide). What's changed is that the president and his friends in the Senate fear that their disillusioned base will stay home on Election Day. So they are about to engage in an exercise that George "Nothing Will Happen" Bush once acknowledged to be meaningless.

The constitutional amendment to ban flag burning is also about electoral politics. As a Senate Republican leader said happily, a vote against the amendment "would make a good 30-second spot." An official of the National Republican Congressional Committee said that "if Democrats choose to vote against a Constitutional amendment" banning flag desecration, "I think they'll pay a price."

Both quotations appeared in a New York Times story that ran 16 years ago -- from Bob Dole, the Republican leader, and Ed Rollins, the GOP official. Does wedge politics have to be so boringly predictable?

At least Scott Reed, Dole's 1996 campaign manager, has a sense of humor about all this. He told Knight Ridder's James Kuhnhenn last week: "If you're a gay who likes to burn flags, it's going to be a long year."

Ah, but there is one issue in the Republican Senate's June Pandering Trifecta that the party really cares about: the repeal of the inheritance tax on large fortunes. The Republicans go hot and cold on the social conservatives, but they're always solicitous of the really, really privileged.

Current law would keep the estate tax falling (eventually to zero) until the end of 2010, so there is no urgency to act now. Or is there? The Los Angeles Times quoted Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) this weekend as acknowledging that the position of the estate tax abolitionists is "eroding" and "could be dramatically negatively impacted this fall and after the next presidential election."

So the real question is whether moderate Democrats and Republicans choose to hand the friends of the truly wealthy a victory at the very moment the tide is starting to turn toward fiscal sanity. The one thing worse than opportunistically using wedge issues is cravenly selling out the nation's financial future to appease the powerful.

Social conservatives, who are a lot smarter than their leaders think, should watch the Senate closely this month. My bet is that their so-called champions will fight much harder on behalf of the interests of the affluent than for the "values" that conservative politicians proclaim with such pious urgency whenever they're in danger of losing an election.

Distracter In Chief (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

What uncharted realm lies beyond brazen cynicism? A wasteland of utter shamelessness, perhaps? A vast Sahara of desperation, where principle goes to die? Someday George W. Bush and the Republican right will be able to tell us all about this barren terra incognita, assuming they ever find their way home.

The Decider's decision to whip up a phony crisis over same-sex marriage -- Values under attack! Run for your lives! -- is such a transparent ploy that even conservatives are scratching their heads, wondering if this is the best Karl Rove could come up with. Bush might as well open his next presidential address by giving himself a new title: The Distracter.

Let's check in on what's happening in the real world:

Iraq has become a charnel house for the victims of escalating sectarian slaughter. On Saturday, a car bomb killed 28 people in Shiite-dominated Basra, and hours later gunmen killed nine Sunni worshipers in a mosque. On Sunday, on a road near Baghdad, assassins pulled travelers out of their minivans, sorted them by faith, killed nearly two dozen Shiites and let the Sunnis go. Yesterday, men wearing police uniforms grabbed at least 56 people from bus stations and travel agencies in Baghdad and took them away -- no one knows why, no one knows where.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's new government remains toothless and ineffectual, despite his pledge to end the sectarian violence. On Sunday, he failed yet again to reach agreement on who will run the only two ministries that matter -- the ones in charge of the army and the police. The butcher Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the most prominent figure in the armed Sunni insurgency and the most hunted man in Iraq, remains at large and periodically manages to issue messages inspiring his followers to continue their jihad. (Just like his hero, Osama bin Laden.) Yet the president spent his weekend radio address pushing "a constitutional amendment that defines marriage in the United States as the union of a man and woman."

Immigration, the last artificial crisis, at least is a genuine issue. But the president and his allies did such a job of rabble-rousing that the best outcome, at this point, is probably for Congress to deadlock and end up doing nothing. The National Guard is headed for the frontier, apparently under orders not to do much of anything. Immigrants are still marching north, employers are still hiring them and self-appointed sentries are still patrolling the border, where something really bad is bound to happen sooner or later.

Yet the issue of "profound importance" the president urgently wants to highlight is "protecting the institution of marriage."

The diplomatic maneuvering over Iran's nuclear program, which looks like the next crisis, is at a critical point. Defiant words from Iranian leaders on Sunday rattled the world's financial markets yesterday and sent oil prices soaring -- threatening even the modest relief most analysts had predicted from $3-a-gallon prices at the gas pump. Just in time for summer vacation.

The president, however, would rather we all reflect on the fact that "marriage is the most enduring and important human institution." Not satisfied that he had gotten his message across in his Saturday radio address, Bush gave another speech in support of a marriage amendment yesterday.

It's almost surreal. For one thing, the president has no role in amending the Constitution. Proposed amendments must be passed in both the House and Senate by two-thirds majorities, and then they must win approval from the legislatures of three-fourths of the states. The president doesn't have to sign it. He doesn't even have to read it.

People who are close to the president are always telling us what an essentially decent man he is, without a bigoted bone in his body. But that doesn't square with all this demagoguery in support of a measure whose only effect would be to write discrimination against gay men and lesbians into the United States Constitution.

Bigotry, pure and simple.

But of course the president knows that there's essentially no chance an amendment to ban gay marriage will make it out of the Senate -- that in fact it might not even get out of the House. All he can possibly accomplish is to energize activists on the religious right, who otherwise might be tempted to sit out the November midterm elections.

It's risky to raise expectations you have no intention of fulfilling, but maybe enough of the Republican base can be fooled by this charade to make a difference in the fall.

Meanwhile it keeps us from talking about things that are real, and that really matter.

Justices To Look At Race-based School Policy (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court agreed Monday to decide whether public elementary and high schools can use race in determining where students go to school.

The move means that the court will re-enter the debate over affirmative action during the 2006-07 term with two cases that could affect districts that seek diversity in schools.

The cases from Seattle and Louisville will be the first of their kind taken up by the court led by new Chief Justice John Roberts. They also will be the first disputes over race-based policies to be heard since the retirement of Sandra Day O'Connor, a moderate justice whose support of some forms of affirmative action became the court's standard. In 2003, O'Connor cast the decisive vote in a 5-4 ruling that allowed minority preferences in higher education to increase diversity.

Justice Samuel Alito, whose record is generally more conservative than O'Connor's, succeeded her in January. Three months earlier, Roberts succeeded fellow conservative William Rehnquist as chief. Alito and Roberts opposed some types of affirmative action when they were lawyers in the Reagan administration.

The Seattle and Louisville cases test whether the Constitution's guarantee of equality allows schools to use race as a factor in admissions. In both disputes, lower courts backed the school plans, and parents of white students appealed.

“The scope of a ruling would be widespread,” says Francisco Negrn, general counsel of the National School Boards Association. He says many public school districts have policies to boost diversity.

The Seattle and Louisville area districts say considering race in assignments can have social benefits and offset racially polarized housing patterns. The Pacific Legal Foundation counters that such affirmative action policies place “racial identification” above individual rights.

Seattle allows students to choose their high school. Officials aim for each school to have about 40% white students and 60% racial minorities. When there are more applicants than openings at a particular school, students with a sibling there get priority. Officials use race as a “tiebreaker” to decide who is admitted.

In the Louisville area, most Jefferson County schools have tried to keep most schools' black enrollment at 15%-50%. A challenge was brought by a white student who could not go to the school across the street from his home.

The cases are Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1 and Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education.

Court To Weigh Race As Factor In School Rolls (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

WASHINGTON, June 5 — The Supreme Court agreed on Monday to rule on what measures, if any, public school systems may use to maintain racial balance in individual schools.

The eventual decision on whether they can take race into account could affect hundreds of school systems in all areas of the country. The court accepted challenges to plans in Louisville, Ky., where the schools were once racially segregated by law, and in Seattle, where segregation was never official but was widespread because of residential patterns.

Federal appeals courts upheld these plans, both of which offer students a choice of schools while taking race into account in deciding which transfer applications to accept. Variations of this approach are common, and have been under legal attack around the country.

The Supreme Court's decision to add the cases to the calendar for its next term, a step that by all appearances was controversial within the court and unexpected outside it, plunged the new Roberts court into one of the country's deepest constitutional debates.

The action came three years after the court upheld a racially conscious admissions plan at the University of Michigan Law School. Writing for the majority in that 5-to-4 decision, Grutter v. Bollinger, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor suggested that, at least in higher education, affirmative action might be necessary for another 25 years.

The new cases do not ask the court to revisit that decision, and the justices are unlikely to do so. But the implications are far-reaching nonetheless. The eventual decision, roughly a year from now, could not only set the court's path in this area but could also shape the climate in which government policies with respect to race will be debated.

One difference between the Michigan decision and the new cases is that while the University of Michigan sought to use affirmative action to achieve a measure of racial balance, the school districts are trying to maintain such a balance.

In December, with Justice O'Connor still on the court, the justices refused to hear a challenge to a racially conscious student assignment plan in the public schools of Lynn, Mass. That plan, which a federal appeals court had upheld, is basically indistinguishable from the plans at issue in the new cases: Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District, No. 05-908, and Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education, No. 05-915.

What has changed is the Supreme Court itself, with the retirement in January of Justice O'Connor and her replacement by Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. One lawyer involved in the challenges to the Seattle and Louisville plans, Sharon L. Browne of the Pacific Legal Foundation, a conservative public-interest law firm, expressed the view that this change made the difference.

"I think the writing's on the wall, or at least I hope it is," Ms. Browne said in an interview Monday.

The plans under review in the new cases differ in details that are unlikely to prove constitutionally significant. The Jefferson County, Ky., school board adopted the Louisville plan in 2001, shortly after the school system was declared desegregated and was released from 25 years of federal court supervision.

The "managed choice" plan applies to all schools, kindergarten through 12th grade. In a district that is one-third nonwhite, every school is required to seek a black student enrollment of at least 15 percent and no more than 50 percent.

The Louisville case was taken to the Supreme Court by Crystal D. Meredith, a white parent whose son, Joshua McDonald, did not receive a requested transfer to attend kindergarten in a school that was trying to maintain a sufficient number of black students.

The plan in Seattle, which has struggled for decades to deal with the effects on its school system of segregated housing patterns, applies only to the city's 10 high schools. The policy is one of "open choice," subject to various "tiebreakers," one of which is race. Other factors include geographic proximity and whether a student has a sibling at the desired school, both of which count in favor of an application.

Under the "integration tiebreaker," high schools that deviate by more than 15 percent from the systemwide balance, which is 60 percent nonwhite, must take account of an applicant's race in order not to deviate further.

A group of parents organized as a nonprofit corporation called Parents Involved in Community Schools to fight the plan, and filed the Supreme Court appeal after losing by a vote of 7 to 4 in the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.

Both appeals reached the court in January and evidently provoked a vigorous internal debate among the justices, who considered the Seattle case six times and the Louisville case seven times before issuing the one-line order accepting both. Prolonged review of this sort is unusual.

Briefs are now likely to pour into the court in advance of a November argument; the University of Michigan case drew more than 100 briefs. But one of the more influential analyses may prove to be a brief concurring opinion in the Seattle case by Judge Alex Kozinski, the Ninth Circuit judge whose views carry great weight among legal conservatives.

Describing the Seattle plan as one "that gives the American melting pot a healthy stir without benefiting or burdening any particular group," Judge Kozinski addressed the Supreme Court justices directly, on the assumption that they would soon be reviewing the decision.

"There is much to be said for returning primacy on matters of educational policy to local officials," he said.

These were among the other developments at the court.

DOJ_NMG_0031863

Speedy Trial

The court ruled unanimously that a federal defendant's rights under the Speedy Trial Act of 1974 were violated when, while seeking more time to prepare his defense to counterfeiting charges, he signed a statement presented by the trial judge in which he waived any future right to a speedy trial.

With certain exceptions, the federal law requires criminal trials to begin within 70 days after a defendant is charged. The trial for this defendant, Jacob Zedner, did not begin for seven years. Mr. Zedner eventually tried to assert his rights under the law and sought dismissal of the indictment, but two lower federal courts in New York enforced his waiver. He was convicted by a jury and sentenced to five years in prison.

In an opinion by Justice Alito, the Supreme Court ordered the indictment dismissed. The statute does not permit such a waiver, Justice Alito said, noting that the public as a whole, and not only an individual defendant, has an interest in the speedy administration of justice.

The significance of this decision, Zedner v. United States, No. 05-5992, is likely to transcend the particular case. Justice Antonin Scalia refused to sign the paragraph of the opinion in which Justice Alito cited the legislative history of the Speedy Trial Act as further evidence for his interpretation of the statute.

"The use of legislative history is illegitimate and ill advised in the interpretation of any statute," Justice Scalia's concurring opinion declared in what has become a familiar theme from him.

The fact that Justice Alito's paragraph of legislative history remained in the majority opinion, and that Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. signed the opinion without comment, indicates that Justice Scalia remains isolated in his view.

Sentencing

The court agreed to decide whether to give retroactive application to a 2004 decision that sharply limited judges' discretion to impose sentences above the thresholds set by sentencing guidelines systems.

The question is whether that decision, Blakely v. Washington, established a "new rule," in which case it is not retroactive, or whether it was a straightforward application of an earlier sentencing ruling, Apprendi v. New Jersey. The deeper issue in the new case, Burton v. Waddington, No. 05-9222, is how to tell a "new rule" from one that is not, a question that comes up with some frequency in habeas corpus cases.

Supreme Court To Hear Schools Race Case (AP)

By Gina Holland, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court agreed Monday to decide whether skin color can be considered in assigning children to public schools, reopening the issue of affirmative action. The announcement puts a contentious social topic on the national landscape in an election year, and tests the conservatism of President Bush's two new justices.

The outcome could mark a new chapter for a court that famously banned racial segregation in public schools in Brown v. Board of Education in 1954.

Since then, race questions have been hugely divisive, both for the court and the public.

Three years ago, more than 5,000 people demonstrated outside as the justices considered whether public universities could select students based at least in part on race. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor broke a tie to allow it in a limited way.

The court's new interest is in public schools, far more sweeping than universities. And O'Connor is gone, replaced by conservative Justice Samuel Alito.

The justices will hear appeals this fall from a Seattle parents group and a Kentucky mom, who argue that race factors improperly penalize white students.

Doug Kmiec, a Pepperdine University law professor and former Reagan administration lawyer, said the case will affect students everywhere. "This is not quite at the level of Brown v. Board, but it will be argued in the style of that case," Kmiec said.

Justices will look at the modern-era classroom, no longer under court desegregation orders but in some places still using remnants of those policies.

At its heart, the court will consider whether school leaders can promote racial diversity without violating the Constitution's guarantee against discrimination.

The court's announcement that it will take up the cases this fall provides the first sign of an aggressiveness by the court under new Chief Justice John Roberts. The court rejected a similar case in December when moderate O'Connor was still on the bench. The outcome will most likely turn on her successor, Alito.

Both Roberts, 51, and Alito, 56, worked as Justice Department lawyers during the Reagan administration to limit affirmative action.

Alito was asked during his Senate confirmation hearings in January about the 2003 case. Without stating his views on affirmative action, he said he taught a college seminar on civil liberties to a diverse class. "Having these people in the class with diverse backgrounds and outlooks on the issues that we were discussing made an enormous contribution to the class," he said.

The court's announcement followed six weeks of internal deliberations over whether to hear the appeals, an unusually long time.

"This is a very dramatic move. I expect it will create a big national discussion," said Gary Orfield, who heads the Harvard University Civil Rights Project and supports affirmative action.

A ruling against the schools "would be pretty devastating to suburban communities, small towns that have successfully maintained desegregation for a couple of generations," he said. "The same communities that were forced to desegregate would be forced to re-segregate."

In one of the cases, an appeals court had upheld Seattle's system, which lets students pick among high schools and then relies on tiebreakers, including race, to decide who gets into schools that have more applicants than openings. Seattle put the system on hold during the legal fight.

The Supreme Court also will also consider a policy in Kentucky, also upheld by lower courts. That case is somewhat different, because the metropolitan Louisville, Ky., school district had long been under a federal court decree to end segregation in its schools. After the decree ended, the district in 2001 began using a plan that includes race guidelines.

The Kentucky parent, Crystal Meredith, asks the court to overturn its 2003 affirmative action rulings. Her son's district still requires most schools to maintain a black enrollment of 15 percent and prevent it from going above 50 percent.

"It's a quota arrangement," said her lawyer, Ted Gordon. "The blatant segregation we once had is long gone."

The cases are Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District, 05-908, and Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education, 05-915.

High Court To Hear Public School Affirmative Action Cases (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 6, 2006

The Supreme Court on Monday agreed to use cases from Seattle and Louisville, Ky., to re-enter the contentious debate over affirmative action.

Three years after the Court upheld race-conscious admission policies in higher education in the Grutter v. Bollinger decision, the new cases will test whether that precedent carries over into the different setting of public elementary and high schools.

"This is the occasion to see how far Grutter can go," said John Payton, a partner at WilmerHale, part of the legal team that won Grutter, which upheld admission policies at the University of Michigan Law School.

Adding uncertainty to the new review of race-conscious public-education policies is the fact that Justice Samuel Alito Jr. has replaced Sandra Day O'Connor, who was a crucial vote in favor of affirmative action and the author of the Grutter ruling. During Alito's confirmation hearings, some civil rights groups concluded from his record that Alito would be a strong opponent of affirmative action programs.

"This will be a major test for the Roberts Court," said Pepperdine University School of Law professor Douglas Kmiec, who argues that Grutter should not be extended to pre-college public schools.

"We are excited about the possibility that the Court may limit Grutter to its facts or even overrule it," said Sharon Browne, principal attorney at the Pacific Legal Foundation, which has filed briefs opposing race-conscious programs in both cases before the Court. "In elementary and secondary schools it makes no sense for school districts to assign students to schools by race."

The cases granted review on Monday, Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1 and Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education, will be argued together this fall, possibly injecting the affirmative action debate into the election season. In both cases, white parents challenged programs that used race as a factor in school placements in ways that they say disadvantaged white students.

In Seattle, where students have broad choice as to which high school they will attend, race is a "tiebreaker" factor in deciding which students will be assigned to a high school that is oversubscribed and racially imbalanced. The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, in an en banc ruling citing Grutter, upheld the program last October.

The other case involves schools in Louisville and the surrounding area, a district that was under a federal court desegregation decree from 1975 to 2000. After the order was lifted, a new plan was adopted that allowed for a wider range of student choices but required all schools to seek a black student enrollment of between 15 percent and 50 percent of the student body. In June 2004, Judge John Heyburn II of the Western District of Kentucky upheld the program in general, though he disapproved of some of the racial categorizing involved.

Citing Grutter, the judge found that "the benefits of racial tolerance and understanding are equally as important and laudable in public elementary and secondary education as in higher education." The 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the decision last July.

But before the high court, opponents of affirmative action argue that the compelling interest in diversity that may exist in higher education, which prepares students for a diverse workplace, may be outweighed in lower grades by the importance of teaching racial equality to young students.

"Jefferson County's schools are sending the wrong message to our children -- that racial identification is more important than respect for individual rights and liberties in today's society," the Pacific Legal Foundation argues in its brief.

The Council of the Great City Schools, in a brief filed at an earlier stage of the Kentucky case, argues by contrast that "the interests that school districts may promote by seeking racially and ethnically diverse school enrollments ... are broader and even more compelling in the context of public elementary and secondary education" than in higher education.

High Court To Examine Race-balancing Schools (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - Nearly three years after its landmark ruling upholding a race-based admissions plan at the University of Michigan Law School, the US Supreme Court has agreed to consider to what extent race may be used to balance white and nonwhite enrollment in public schools.

On Monday, the high court agreed to examine cases involving two school districts attempting to maintain racially integrated schools.

One involves a school board plan in Seattle that seeks to achieve a rough balance of 40 percent white and 60 percent nonwhite enrollment at each of the city's 10 public high schools.

The second is a school district in Louisville, Ky., that set broad guidelines that the black student population of any particular school should range between 15 percent and 50 percent.

Both cases will be closely watched for indications of how the new lineup of justices - including the replacement of Justice Sandra Day O'Connor with Justice Samuel Alito - may shift the court's jurisprudence on the constitutionality of affirmative action plans.

Justice O'Connor provided the key swing vote and authored the landmark 5-4 decision upholding the University of Michigan Law School's admissions plan. The majority opinion recognized that diversity in education can be a compelling interest, justifying the use of race in the student selection process.

The decision drew sharp dissents from four members of the court's conservative wing, who wrote that the Michigan plan violated the Constitution's equal protection mandate by relying too heavily on race as a factor in the admissions process.

At issue in both the Seattle and Louisville cases is how the high court's 2003 Michigan Law School decision should be applied in public school districts seeking to achieve diversity.

The Kentucky plan relies in large part on school administrators drawing boundaries for each school that extend into both white and black neighborhoods. School enrollment is then determined in part by randomly selecting students from an integrated pool of prospective students.

As an additional boost to integration efforts, school officials tracked prospective students by classifying each as "black male," "black female," "white male," or "white female." This aspect of the Kentucky plan was struck down by a federal judge as an impermissible use of race and gender for public school admissions.

The judge and an appeals court panel upheld the rest of the Kentucky plan.

A parent filed an appeal to the Supreme Court claiming that school officials violated the constitutional guarantee of equal protection when they refused to allow her son to attend his neighborhood school and later refused to allow him to transfer to another elementary school because there were no more slots available at that school for white students.

The judge said the boy was not unduly harmed by the denial of the transfer under the racial guidelines. Because the school district maintains equal and integrated schools, prospective students enjoy no particular benefit by attending one school rather than another, the judge ruled.

But the district's schools are not all equal, argues Teddy Gordon, a Louisville lawyer who represents the mother of the student denied admission to his neighborhood school. Mr. Gordon says in his brief to the Supreme Court that the school district should be focusing on the quality of neighborhood schools rather than the skin color of children attending them.

A similar debate is under way in Seattle. Its school board plan was designed to counter the impact of racially segregated housing patterns on the city's school system. School officials were concerned that reliance on neighborhood schools would simply mirror the city's segregated housing market and translate into a similarly segregated public school system.

To try to break that cycle, the district adopted its "Open Choice" plan in which parents were permitted to send their children to any school within the city. The school board established "tiebreakers" to help determine enrollment at the most popular high schools in the system.

If a student had a sibling at a particular school, that student would be given priority to attend the same school. But if there were no siblings, the "integration tiebreaker" would kick in. In effect, students who were members of an "oversubscribed" race would be given a lower priority for admission than any students of the desired race.

At high schools in the city's largely white north side, that generally meant that minority students were given preference, while at schools in Seattle's largely minority south side, white students were given preference.

Critics of the plan formed a group called Parents Involved in Community Schools. They sued the school district, saying the plan was an unconstitutional form of racial discrimination.

The school district defended the plan as a justifiable effort to achieve racial diversity in the public school system. The plan was adopted in 1998, but has been suspended since 2002 pending the outcome of the litigation.

A federal judge, the Washington Supreme Court, and the Ninth US Circuit Court of Appeals have all upheld Seattle's Open Choice program.

The state supreme court in a 2003 decision rejected the parents' arguments, saying that a racially diverse school population provides educational benefits for all students.

Justices To Hear Cases Of Race-Conscious School Placements (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

The Supreme Court announced yesterday that it will rule on the race-conscious assignment of students to public schools, in a pair of cases that could produce some of the most important decisions on school integration since the busing battles of the 1960s and '70s.

DOJ_NMG_0031867

The court agreed to hear arguments in separate lawsuits by white parents in Seattle and Jefferson County, Ky., which encompasses Louisville, who say each public school system unconstitutionally discriminates based on skin color. The jurisdictions' programs differ, but each seeks to maintain racial balance with the help of numerical targets for minority enrollment.

Although the court has addressed race-conscious admissions for diversity in higher education, upholding them on a 5 to 4 vote in 2003, this would be the first time it has addressed the "diversity rationale" as it affects the country's 48 million public elementary and secondary school students. It will also be the first race-related constitutional case for President Bush's two appointees, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr.

The court's decision to take the cases was something of a surprise, since all three federal appeals courts to rule since 2003 sided with the school systems. The court usually intervenes to settle lower-court conflicts.

Six months ago, before Alito replaced Sandra Day O'Connor, who wrote the 2003 opinion, the court declined to hear the challenge of a parent in Lynn, Mass., to a race-conscious plan.

"It's bad news for desegregation advocates," said Goodwin Liu, a Clinton administration education official who teaches constitutional law at the University of California at Berkeley. "It looks like the more conservative justices see they have a fifth vote to reverse these cases."

But lawyers for the Seattle and Louisville parents argued there was a circuit split because the post-2003 lower-court rulings clashed with three pre-2003 rulings against race-conscious policies.

Sharon Browne, principal attorney of the Pacific Legal Foundation, which supports the parents' lawsuits, said she "was pleased that the Court has decided to hear these cases. Together, these cases could put an end to schools using race as a factor to decide where children can attend public school."

Yesterday's decision returns the court to an area of American life that it revolutionized in 1954 with Brown v. Board Education -- and the lower-court desegregation orders, including busing in many cities, that flowed from that decision.

In the intervening years, however, direct court supervision of public school racial composition has generally lapsed, and schools face student demographics determined not only by the country's historic black-white divide, but also by immigration from around the world.

Embracing diversity not as a legal requirement but as an educational objective, school districts frequently offer alternatives to geographical assignment, including school choice and magnet school options. But these, in turn, can result in competition for spots at the most-sought-after schools.

"The decision and the opinions will be impactful," said Francisco Negron, general counsel of the National School Boards Association, which has supported the school districts in the lower courts. "We're in the post-integration era. Many desegregation lawsuits filed in the '70s have come to a natural ending point. . . . Schools are trying to implement policies that recognize the need for diversity."

Seattle and Louisville say their plans are consistent with the Supreme Court's 2003 ruling -- which allowed universities to consider race as one of many factors when assembling diverse colleges and graduate schools.

They say their use of race is necessary to meet compelling educational goals, and accounts for a modest number of school assignments.

But the plaintiffs argue that school officials have gone beyond what the court permitted in 2003, because they ultimately rely on fixed numerical targets for assigning students.

Each system adopted its plan voluntarily, but against the backdrop of different social and legal histories.

In Louisville, the 97,000-student public school population is 34 percent black, with the rest predominantly white. In 1973, a federal court ruled that it was officially, and unlawfully, segregated. This led to court-ordered busing from 1975 to 1984. The system remained under court supervision until 2000.

The current Louisville plan says that all schools, including magnets, must have a minimum black enrollment of 15 percent and a maximum of 50 percent.

The only exceptions are for pre-kindergarten, kindergarten, alternative and special schools -- and four magnet schools covered by a federal judge's ruling barring the use of race to allocate educational opportunities not widely available.

Parent Crystal D. Meredith, however, argues that the plan cost her son admission to the school in his neighborhood.

In Seattle, which has substantial Asian and Hispanic populations as well as large numbers of whites and African Americans, no court has ever found the 47,000-student school system guilty of official segregation. Instead, the school board says that diversity is a key educational value and that segregated housing patterns must be changed.

The city began busing in 1977 but stopped in 1988. Under an "Open Choice" plan adopted in 1998, the goal was to have schools close to the city's overall racial composition: 60 percent minority, 40 percent white. Children can attend any school. At schools where demand for spaces exceeds supply, however, siblings of current students have priority -- and an "integration tiebreaker" favors students whose race would tip a school toward 60-40.

The tiebreaker has not been in use since 2002 because of the litigation, which was brought by Parents Involved in Community Schools, a group of white parents who say it cost their children admission to the popular Ballard High School.

The tiebreaker was initially invalidated by a three-judge panel of the San Francisco-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit. But an 11-judge panel granted a new hearing and upheld it 7 to 4.

The cases are Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1 , No. 05-908, and Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education , No. 05-915. Argument will take place in December, with decisions due by July 2007.

Court To Revisit Race In Schools (LAT)

By David G. Savage

The Los Angeles Times, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court agreed Monday to take up two cases that could mark a historic shift in the role of race in education and spell the end of official efforts to integrate the nation's public schools.

The justices said they would hear appeals from parents in Seattle and Louisville, Ky., who say it is unconstitutional for officials to consider race when deciding which school a student will attend.

The cities adopted voluntary integration programs in recent years that put limits on how many white or black students may be enrolled in some schools.

The Seattle and Louisville cases could put the court on the opposite side of an old issue. Having told school officials in the landmark 1954 Brown vs. Board of Education ruling that they must desegregate their classrooms, the high court will now consider whether the Constitution forbids official efforts to maintain integration.

A ruling outlawing such efforts would have a wide effect on schools that continue to use race even after desegregation orders have expired.

The Los Angeles Unified School District uses magnet schools to achieve integration, but it does so partly by enrolling students based on their race or ethnicity.

Just three years ago, the court upheld affirmative action in colleges and universities, but two new conservative justices have joined the court since then. Monday's announcement is the second this year that could indicate a shift to the right in a major area of law. The court agreed to hear a case this fall that will determine whether Congress can outlaw a late-term abortion procedure.

Beginning with the Reagan era of the 1980s, conservatives have insisted it is unconstitutional for the government to use a person's race as a factor in hiring, awarding contracts, admitting college students, or, in this instance, assigning students to public schools.

In 2003, however, the Supreme Court dealt conservatives a defeat in a University of Michigan law school case. The court, in a 5-4 decision, said higher education had a "compelling" need to consider a student's race if it was to maintain diversity in classes.

That decision was written by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who retired in February.

Her replacement, Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., is seen as likely to take a more conservative stand on race and affirmative action. In 1985, as a lawyer in President Reagan's Justice Department, he said he was "particularly proud" of the administration's efforts to persuade the Supreme Court that "racial and ethnic quotas should not be allowed."

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., who also worked in the Reagan administration, wrote memos that criticized the overt consideration of race by the government.

Lawyers for the parents in the school cases say a student's race or ethnicity should not affect their chances of attending a school.

"The issue here is: Can public schools voluntarily discriminate among students to achieve racial balance?" said Sharon L. Browne, a lawyer for the Pacific Legal Foundation in Sacramento, which had urged the court to hear both cases. "They are teaching our kids that race still matters. If they can continue to do that, we will never get to a place where the country is colorblind."

She said as many 1,000 school districts nationwide seek to integrate some schools by enrolling or not enrolling students based on their race. Last year, her group sued the Los Angeles Unified School District in state court, contending its magnet school program is unconstitutional because it seeks "a racially balanced enrollment."

Seattle has 10 high schools, and it allows students to choose which one they want to attend. The district's integration plan calls for trying to maintain a racial balance in each high school that is within 10 percentage points of its overall enrollment, which is 60% minority and 40% white. But if too many students choose a certain school and it is "over-subscribed," officials put limits on who may enroll. One factor they consider is race.

In 2001, for example, 300 students were denied their first choice of a high school because of their race. Of these, 210 were white and 90 were minorities. The minorities include students who are black, Latino, Asian and Native American.

The Seattle plan has been tied up in litigation for years. In October, the U.S. 9th Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the plan on a 7-4 vote and applauded the school system for achieving "racial diversity" despite the city's segregated housing patterns.

Harry Korrell, a lawyer for the Seattle parents, insisted the city was not segregated. "This is becoming a very diverse city. Even the whitest neighborhoods are integrated," he said. Because of this natural integration, he said, the racial balancing plan is not needed.

He said he hoped the high court would say that "absent a history of past discrimination, it is impermissible to use race in making government decisions."

Louisville had a history of official racial segregation. In 1975 it was ordered to bus students to achieve desegregation, but that court order ended in 2000.

A year later it adopted a voluntary integration plan that seeks a black enrollment of at least 15% and no more than 50% in each school. Crystal Meredith, a white parent, challenged the plan, charging that it violated her son's rights; he was blocked from attending his neighborhood elementary school because it had too many white students.

But a federal judge and the U.S. appeals court in Cincinnati upheld the integration plan, based in part on O'Connor's opinion in the law school case.

The Supreme Court said it would hear both cases, Parents Involved in Community Schools vs. Seattle School District and Meredith vs. Jefferson County Board of Education, in the fall.

The cases are likely to attract unusual attention because of the Supreme Court's historic role in ending school segregation.

After declaring segregation unconstitutional in Brown vs. Board of Education, the court said school officials should proceed "with all deliberate speed" to end segregation.

Many chose to be deliberate, but not speedy.

In 1968, the court said it would wait no longer for schools to achieve real desegregation, and by the early 1970s, many school systems were under federal court orders to bus students across town to achieve desegregation.

That effort met strong public resistance nearly everywhere it was tried. In one Reagan-era memo, Roberts referred to busing for desegregation as a "failed experiment."

"We're glad the Supreme Court is taking an opportunity to clarify for school districts the issues around diversity and school attendance. Right now, there is a lot of uncertainty," said Francisco Negron, counsel for the National School Boards Assn.

The school cases join another that could reveal a shift to the right by the high court.

In late February, the same week that Alito took his seat as O'Connor's replacement, the court agreed to hear a case that could revive the federal law forbidding the abortion procedure known as intact dilation and extraction — which opponents label "partial-birth" abortion — performed during the second trimester of a pregnancy. That law was struck down by a lower court based on a 5-4 Supreme Court ruling, joined by O'Connor, which said the ban on this surgical method could threaten the health of some women seeking an abortion.

Court To Review School-Race Issues (WSJ)

By Jess Bravin And Ben Winograd

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Three years after upholding affirmative action in university admissions, the Supreme Court agreed to review whether elementary and secondary schools also may consider race in voluntary efforts to maintain desegregated classes.

Separately, the justices rolled back the reach of federal racketeering law, ruling that to prevail in a civil lawsuit, a plaintiff would have to show it was directly injured by a competitor's illegal actions, not only that such acts may have created a competitive disadvantage.

The school cases are the latest progeny of Brown v. Board of Education, the 1954 opinion declaring that "separate educational facilities are inherently unequal." The Brown case opened decades of litigation to integrate U.S. schools. In the 1960s and '70s, courts ordered busing and other desegregation methods that prompted a backlash among white parents unwilling to see their children bused to black neighborhoods. Other court-ordered plans were dissolved after school officials demonstrated they had succeeded in creating the required "unitary" systems.

The two cases accepted yesterday concern whether schools can still consider race to promote desegregation after court orders have been lifted -- or if they had never been imposed at all.

One case comes from Louisville, Ky., where in 1973, a federal court required schools to eliminate "all vestiges of state-imposed segregation." A variety of court-imposed plans followed, including mandatory busing, until the decree was dissolved in 2000. School officials, seeking to promote campus integration, then adopted a plan to maintain each school's black enrollment between 15% and 50%.

The other case comes from Seattle, which never had legally imposed racial segregation, but nevertheless saw schools effectively segregated by neighborhood housing patterns. Seattle students can choose to attend any of the city's 10 high schools. Under a plan adopted in the late 1990s, race is a "tie-breaker" for admission to oversubscribed schools so that their enrollment approximates that of the city as a whole: 40% white, 60% non-white.

Several parents of white children challenged the plans, but appellate courts upheld them, finding they complied with two 2003 Supreme Court opinions involving admission policies at the University of Michigan. Those decisions found student diversity a compelling governmental interest and that race could be a factor considered by admissions officers. The court did not say, however, how its doctrine might apply to lower education.

Since those 2003 opinions, the court's composition has changed, with the arrival of conservative Justice Samuel Alito. His predecessor, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, wrote the 5-4 majority decision upholding an affirmative-action program at Michigan's law school.

(Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education; Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1)

Separately, the justices dismissed a suit filed under the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organization Act by a New York steel-supply company alleging that a competitor had undercut prices by failing to collect sales tax. The opinion by Justice Anthony Kennedy found the scheme primarily defrauded New York state and said the plaintiff didn't establish a sufficient link to its own decline in sales.

"The decision today just knocks out a broad swath of potential claims under civil RICO," said Gene Schaerr, who filed a friend-of-the-court brief in the case for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Following the decision, the justices ordered a federal appellate court to reconsider a RICO suit alleging a Georgia carpet manufacturer depressed wages of legal employees by conspiring with a recruiter to hire illegal aliens. In light of the ruling in the steel case, the lower court must determine whether the hiring fraud was the "proximate cause" of the plaintiffs' decline in wages.

(Anza v. Ideal Steel Supply Corp. and Mohawk v. Williams)

The justices also agreed to decide whether prisoners may retroactively apply a 2004 decision preventing judges from imposing sentences far beyond established guidelines. A judge in Washington state sentenced Lonnie Burton to 47 years in prison after a 1994 conviction for robbery, burglary and rape. His lawyers said the sentence exceeded sentencing guidelines by more than 20 years. In the 2004 case, the court struck down a 7½-year sentence for a man who kidnapped his wife. His plea bargain called for a 4½-year sentence.

(Burton v. Waddington)

The school and sentencing cases will be heard in the court's next term, which begins in October.

Court Takes 2 Race-based School-assignment Cases (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

The Supreme Court said yesterday it will hear appeals of two cases that could determine if race can be used in assigning students to public schools for the purpose of enhancing enrollment diversity in situations where court orders are not involved.

The court announced that it will take up the case this fall of a Louisville, Ky., woman who says the Jefferson County Public Schools' desegregation plan is unconstitutional because it barred her son from transferring to a better school. Her son is white.

In the second case, a Seattle parents' group charges that a policy of the Seattle school district that allowed students to select their high schools but used race as a tiebreaker to decide who fills limited spots, was unfair. The district ended the policy as a result of parents' complaints, but the litigation has continued.

Both the Seattle and Kentucky cases challenge a school system's ability to desegregate schools voluntarily without a court order.

These will be the high court's first rulings on diversity plans. The outcome is likely to hinge on the vote of the newest justice, conservative Samuel A. Alito Jr. In a 5-4 decision last week, Justice Alito was the tiebreaker in a case that found that public employees -- including whistleblowers -- do not enjoy free-speech rights when they discuss work-related matters.

Last December, when Justice Sandra Day O'Connor was still on the bench, the Supreme Court rejected another case involving the use of race as a factor in school admissions to achieve diversity. The case involved a small public school system in Lynn, Mass., which has a tiebreaker system similar to the one used in Seattle.

Critics of such policies said the court's announcement that it will accept the appeals of the Seattle and Kentucky cases hints at a new aggressiveness by the court under Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr., who is also conservative, in dealing with race issues in public schools.

Either that's the case, "or the former court simply knew these other cases were in the pipeline," said Ted Gordon, the attorney for Crystal Meredith, who is suing the Jefferson County school district for denying her son the right to attend a school in his immediate neighborhood.

Mr. Gordon said he and his client are thrilled that the Supreme Court will examine the two cases.

"This is a surreal experience," he said.

The Jefferson County school district's policy allows parents and students some choice among schools. But it requires that most schools keep black enrollment from rising above 50 percent or dropping below 15 percent. The system, which has 100,000 students, is about 35 percent black.

In a telephone interview yesterday, Mr. Gordon said Jefferson County's enrollment policy is "absolutely based on racial quotas" and is "unconstitutional."

"We want kids to be admitted to schools because of merit, not race," he said.

Verizon Bias Suit Deal Sets Record (WP)

By Amy Joyce

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

Verizon Communications Inc. will pay almost $49 million to 12,326 current and former female employees as part of a landmark class-action lawsuit alleging pregnancy discrimination.

The U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission reached a settlement in 2002 against Verizon predecessors Nynex Corp. and Bell Atlantic Corp. But the total amount of the settlement was not made public until yesterday, when the EEOC completed its projections of how much would be paid in future benefits.

The final figure makes the case the largest pregnancy discrimination settlement in EEOC history. It covers women in 13 states and the District.

Nynex and Bell Atlantic were accused of violating federal law by denying women pension and other benefit accruals when they spent time on pregnancy or maternity leave.

The total compensation paid thus far is more than $25.3 million. The EEOC told a U.S. District Court in New York yesterday that it projected that an additional $23.6 million would be paid in future benefits. The announcement came after years of calculating which women were denied benefits when on leave.

"This comes out of a different era," said Eric Rabe, a Verizon spokesman. "The people who were here then by and large don't work for the company anymore. We think our record today is exemplary, and this was not an admission of having done anything wrong. It is simply a matter of trying to get this behind us to move on."

The suit alleged that the predecessor companies violated the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the Pregnancy Discrimination Act of 1978 and the Equal Pay Act of 1963 by denying women service credits for leaves of absence taken between July 1965 and April 1979. The companies also denied pension credits for child-care leaves of absence until December 1983.

Pregnancy discrimination claims filed with the EEOC rose by 31 percent from 1992 to 2005, to 4,449 from 3,385. Some of that increase reflects a growing number of women working during and after their pregnancies, but not all of it. In the same period, the percentage of working women with children younger than 18 rose by about 5 percent.

"There really remain tremendous issues concerning pregnancy discrimination in the workplace," said Elizabeth Grossman, regional attorney with the EEOC in New York. "More and more women are continuing to go forward to assert their rights in a way past generations were not. Some employers are getting educated and changing practices, but many are not."

Grossman's office last year sued and won a settlement for a waitress who was removed from a managerial career track, denied work assignments and told to "consider her options" after she revealed she was pregnant. Ultimately, she was fired. The woman received $145,000 in a pregnancy discrimination settlement with her former employer. The same office last month also sued Bed Bath & Beyond Inc. on behalf of a pregnant employee at a Bridgewater, N.J., store who says she was denied modified work assignments that were given to other employees with temporary disabilities.

The EEOC was joined in filing the class-action lawsuit against the phone companies by the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Communications Workers of America, unions representing Verizon workers. "This case represents an important victory for working women who should not have had to sacrifice their pension benefits because they had children," Christopher M. Shelton, a CWA vice president, said in a statement.

Adobe Vs. Microsoft: The Battle Over The .pdf (MERCN)

By John Boudreau

The San Jose Mercury News, June 6, 2006

Adobe Systems and Microsoft have seemed to co-exist in a mutually beneficial ecosystem for years.

But their cause for common ground, a little piece of software millions have used but may have hardly noticed -- the Adobe PDF -- is now the reason the gloves are coming off.

At the core of the tension is Microsoft's move to create technology to compete with Adobe's PDF franchise, and difficult negotiations around incorporating Adobe's mostly open standard PDF software into the next generation of Office programs.

While Microsoft makes software such as Word and Excel that lets people create documents, Adobe can turn those documents you might print out on paper into digital, ready-to-be-e-mailed files through its Portable Document Format (.pdf).

Last week, behind-the-scenes friction between the two became public when Microsoft said it expected Adobe to file a lawsuit against the Redmond, Wash. company, possibly in the European Union, which recently has become more receptive to Microsoft antitrust concerns than U.S. regulators.

The dispute underscored the Silicon Valley axiom: Companies that cooperate often can end up trying to devour each other's business.

``Adobe is one of many long-time partners of Microsoft that have now turned into competitors of Microsoft," Jupiter Research analyst Joe Wilcox said.

Adobe makes money from its business-document processing software Adobe Acrobat, which is part of its Intelligent Document division and accounted for 36 percent of its revenue, or $708 million, in 2005. A person must own a copy of Adobe Acrobat to make a PDF, but only needs to download a free version of Acrobat Reader to view a PDF that has been sent to them.

The two sides failed to reach an agreement on how the PDF would be used in the new version of Microsoft Office. As a result, Microsoft announced it was canceling plans to include an automatic ``save to PDF" feature in its new release of Office. So those who buy Office 2007 will have to download free software that will allow them to save PDF documents created in Office applications, such as Word, Excel and PowerPoint.

Microsoft indicated that negotiations broke down over fees Adobe wanted for licensing its software, which could make Office more expensive.

Observers say the larger issue is both companies view the other warily.

For Microsoft, the ubiquitous PDF format could indirectly result in fewer sales of its software updates because those who receive the digital documents can access Excel or Word without owning either. For example, a person making a resume in Word can turn that file into a PDF and send it to a colleague, who can then open and edit it in Adobe Acrobat -- without even owning Word.

``Adobe introduced very cool technology that extends PDF to other formats. You can now take documents from almost any source, mix them together, save them to a PDF, send them to your buddy. Just by using Adobe Reader, you can annotate that document and send it back," Wilcox said. ``If you are Microsoft, whose success was built on format dominance, that's a scary prospect."

Adobe, on the other hand, sees Microsoft trying to move in on its turf in multiple areas: Microsoft is launching its own version of PDF software, code-named Metro, which the software giant will be offering as an optional bundle to computer makers. (All computer makers are sure to include the application.) Microsoft is also making a move to compete with Adobe's creative software, Photoshop, and is a competitor in Internet and mobile video-playing technology.

In the recent tussle, Adobe might be concerned that Microsoft, while including its PDF technology with Office, could make the PDF less appealing than its own document-sharing software.

Microsoft ``can create a preference for their version," said Howard University law professor Andrew Gavil. ``That's the argument Google has been making." (Google has complained an upcoming update of Microsoft's Internet Explorer Web browser contains a search box that in some cases defaults to the MSN search engine.)

Adobe has said little so far. In a statement, the San Jose company said it had not decided whether to take legal action against Microsoft.

``I'll never trivialize Microsoft. They are a $40 billion company with virtually unlimited resources and they are a monopoly," Adobe chief executive Bruce Chizen said in an interview last year.

Still, Adobe has successfully protected its PDF franchise against earlier incursions by Microsoft.

``They've defended themselves really well against Metro," said Pacific Crest Securities analyst Steve Lidberg. ``One of the reasons you have seen such good acceptance of PDF is the ubiquity of the Reader -- Adobe giving that away for free and the fact they have opened up the platform to other partners to build applications around it."

The PDF, for instance, is now the standard digital document for federal agencies, from the IRS to the FDA.

``It would seem like they've pretty much won out," said Tony Henning, analyst at Future Image in San Mateo. ``There was a time, a decade-and-a-half-ago, when there were three or four contenders. They've won."

Microsoft, though, may not believe the war is over.

``Even though PDF has become a de facto document standard, Microsoft has clearly made noises in recent months about how they'd like to change that," Jupiter Research analyst Michael Gartenberg said.

Why Adobe And Microsoft Hit Delete On PDF Deal (WP)

By Rob Pegoraro

DOJ_NMG_0031874

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

If you want to know why so many computer programs are so bad these days, take a look at the Adobe-Microsoft mess.

These two powerful software developers have gotten into an argument over whether Microsoft can include a new feature in its upcoming Office 2007 productivity suite -- the ability to save your work as a Portable Document Format (PDF) file.

In the process, they're showing how old-fashioned greed and the more modern ailment of lawsuit phobia can turn a promising program sour.

Judged strictly on its merits, there's nothing to argue about that feature. It would end the worry that your Word, Excel or PowerPoint document might look weird or be unreadable on someone else's computer. PDF files preserve their appearance -- from fonts to footnotes to photos -- wherever they're read, so long as a recipient has a PDF-reader program. These programs, almost all free, are available for nearly every kind of computer, down to "smart phones" and handheld organizers.

Competing productivity suites, such as Corel's WordPerfect Office and the free and open-source OpenOffice.org, have offered this option for years. So does Apple's Mac OS X, which offers PDF output as a systemwide feature. When Microsoft announced in October that it would follow suit in its next release of Office, it seemed like a refreshing acknowledgment of reality in Redmond, Wash.

You'd think that would have delighted Adobe as well. The San Jose, Calif., firm has worked for years to establish the PDF as a standard way to share data, having written versions of its free Adobe Reader for all the major desktop and handheld operating systems. And while the company charges $299 for its Adobe Acrobat PDF-creation toolkit, it's encouraged other developers to release their own.

For some reason, however, Adobe saw things differently when Microsoft wanted to join the PDF party. As Microsoft explained, in February, Adobe asked it to sell this feature as a separate add-on for Office 2007.

"We needed to break it out, offer it separately and charge a price for it," recounted David Heiner, Microsoft's deputy general counsel, in a phone interview. Adobe also asked Microsoft to yank support for a Microsoft-developed, PDF-like format called XPS. Lastly, Adobe wanted XPS support removed from Windows Vista, the successor to Windows XP that is due in January.

If those demands were not met, the implication seemed clear: See you in court.

Adobe publicists would not answer questions about this. The company released a short, vague statement that said that Adobe's "sole motivation is to maintain a fair, competitive landscape in the software industry" but that it "has made no determination to take legal action against Microsoft."

Heiner said Microsoft wanted to avoid any legal entanglement and offered to yank the PDF-export option from Office, instead making it available as a free download (although, he added, Adobe still wants Microsoft to charge extra for it). Microsoft also would allow computer manufacturers to omit XPS software from the copies of Vista pre-loaded on new machines.

With Adobe clamming up in public, it's hard to figure out what this company is trying to accomplish. If Adobe wants to stop Microsoft's XPS from replacing its own PDF, what better way than to get PDF support in the single most-used productivity suite?

A more reasonable theory holds that Adobe is worried that Microsoft's own PDF software will produce files that aren't strictly PDF-compatible, thus poisoning this standard. But that makes little sense on examination; the best way for Microsoft to quash Adobe's format is to keep Office PDF-illiterate.

Then there's the thought that Adobe's Acrobat, at $299, will compete poorly with any free save-as-PDF option. But Adobe had to have foreseen that possibility when it issued a blanket invitation to the world to write PDF-compatible software. As its own documentation reads, "Adobe gives anyone copyright permission, subject to the conditions stated below, to . . . Write drivers and applications that produce output represented in the Portable Document Format."

Further, for any company to start telling another how it should charge for its products is at best arrogance, at worst price collusion -- a violation of basic antitrust law.

All that and more about this story refuses to add up. It doesn't help that neither company has earned much right to wear a halo.

Adobe has its own monopolistic instincts: Last year it bought what was by far its biggest competitor in the graphics-software business, Macromedia. And it's been happy to exploit the demand for its free Adobe Reader to push unrelated software on users -- the Windows version normally comes with a Yahoo toolbar and Adobe's Photoshop album photo organizer.

Microsoft, meanwhile, has a history of taking standards developed by other companies, then writing software that somehow makes them work best, or only, on Microsoft operating systems. That conduct helped Microsoft lose many of its antitrust battles in the past decade; it's easy to see why the company wants to avoid a return to those days.

Still, from what we do know, it's hard not to wish that the bad old Microsoft would reemerge for this one occasion and tell Adobe to go pound sand.

Brookfield, Blackstone To Buy Trizec (WSJ)

By Jennifer S. Forsyth

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

In a $4.8 billion deal confirming that the real-estate market for office space remains hot despite rising interest rates, Brookfield Properties Corp. and a private-equity partner agreed to buy Trizec Properties Inc.

The purchase, announced yesterday, of the Chicago-based office real-estate investment trust is one of the biggest deals yet in a continuing frenzy of mergers and acquisitions in the public real-estate world. Brookfield, based in Toronto and New York, is pairing with the Blackstone Group, a private-equity firm that has been involved in a number of high-profile acquisitions over the past few months, including a $2.8 billion buyout of CarrAmerica Realty Corp. in March.

The Trizec acquisition gives Brookfield -- already one of the largest players in office real estate in North America -- an even bigger profile in the hot markets of Washington and Manhattan, and provides an entry into Los Angeles, another market that has caught fire in the past few quarters.

Included in the deal is the acquisition of Trizec Canada Inc., a mutual fund traded on the Toronto Stock Exchange that has a 38% interest in Trizec Properties. Brookfield will acquire the shares of Trizec Properties and Trizec Canada for a combined cash transaction of $4.8 billion and the assumption of about $4.1 billion in debt -- $29.01 a share for all Trizec Properties common stock not owned by Trizec Canada, and $30.97 a share for the Trizec Canada stock.

The cash for Trizec Properties' stock represents an 18% premium over its closing price of $24.60 Friday on the New York Stock Exchange.

The difference underscores the complaint of many REIT chief executives, including Trizec's Tim Callahan, that Wall Street undervalues their companies. Trizec Properties rose 17%, or $4.08, to $28.68 in 4 p.m. composite trading yesterday. Brookfield gained 19 cents to $31.17.

Trizec Chairman Peter Munk, noting that a number of potential buyers prequalified for the deal, said the combination of historically low yields for high-quality property with so much available liquidity made this the perfect time to sell. "To find a number of competing buyers who can show you they have the ability to write a check for $8 billion, that is a very rare circumstance," he said in an interview.

Blackstone has said previously that it has raised about $10 billion to invest in real estate. Brookfield also had cash available. "They've got money burning a hole in their pocket," said John Guinee, managing director of Stifel Nicolaus & Co. of Baltimore. Executives with Brookfield didn't return calls and Blackstone declined to comment.

Jay Rosenberg, co-portfolio manager of Minneapolis-based FAF Advisors, said many private-equity funds raised their money last year when interest rates were lower. "We know there's still a lot of money on the sidelines in terms of private equity," he said.

As part of the joint venture, Brookfield will manage properties in New York, Washington, downtown Los Angeles and Houston. Blackstone will manage properties in west Los Angeles, San Diego and some of the New York City properties. Also, Blackstone "or other parties" are expected to acquire additional properties in Atlanta, Dallas, Los Angeles, San Diego, Chicago, Charlotte, N.C., and Minneapolis, according to Brookfield. Blackstone traditionally sells off weaker performing properties.

Brookfield, a real-estate operating company, already owned 9.6 million square feet of office space in downtown Manhattan. If it keeps One New York Plaza, it will add another 2.5 million. Because that building is already almost fully leased, the acquisition isn't expected to make a significant impact on downtown leasing in the short-term, said Lawrence Tannenbaum, executive director of real-estate services firm Cushman & Wakefield. However, it further entwines Brookfield in the future of downtown Manhattan, for which it has already played a prominent advocacy role.

China's Citic Makes A Play For Canadian Oil (WSJ)

By Shai Oster, Laura Santini And Henny Sender

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

Citic Group, a state-owned conglomerate in China, is in talks to buy a closely held Canadian oil company whose main asset is a field in Kazakhstan, according to people familiar with the matter. If completed, the $2.2 billion deal would be China's third-largest overseas oil acquisition.

The talks to buy Nations Energy Co., based in Calgary, Alberta, reflect the continuing efforts of Chinese energy companies to push abroad in their quest for energy. A deal isn't certain, according to one of the people familiar with the matter.

A deal would be China's second-largest acquisition in oil-rich Kazakhstan. Last year, China National Petroleum Corp., China's biggest oil producer by output, beat out Russian rivals to acquire an oil field in Kazakhstan for $4.2 billion and built a pipeline to carry Kazakh crude to China.

In April, Cnooc Ltd., China's biggest offshore oil producer, bought a $2.7 billion stake in an oil field off the coast of Nigeria.

Nations Energy's main asset is the Karazhanbas oil field in Kazakhstan, which pumped 41,000 barrels of oil a day last year, according to the company's Web site. Both Cnooc and CNPC had passed up on buying the company.

China's need for oil is increasing, with its domestic oil fields are producing less as its growing economy and rising middle class have made China the world's second-biggest consumer of oil, after the U.S. China has been a net importer of oil since 1993.

Buying the Kazakh field would be in line with China's policy of locking in oil supplies. Analysts said oil from the field could be brought to China via a pipeline that has already been built to carry crude from an adjacent field bought by CNPC.

Citic Group, a sprawling concern with interests that include trade and banking, has little experience in managing a project as complicated as the Kazakh field and would probably have to bring in partners.

Listed in Hong Kong, Citic Group was set up in 1979 by former Vice President Rong Yiren to function as the overseas investment arm of the government. It has interests in an oil field in China and is exploring for oil in Chad.

Nations Energy has been trying to sell itself for at least a year. It has proven reserves of 400 million barrels, according to the company's Web site, and has smaller operations in Azerbaijan. The company is owned by Indonesian investors. Production in the Karazhanbas field, discovered in the 1970s, was in decline until Nations Energy bought it in 1997.

Cathay Seeks Control Of Dragonair To Expand Access To China Routes (WSJ)

By Bruce Stanley And Laura Santini

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

HONG KONG -- Cathay Pacific Airways is in talks to acquire a controlling stake in Hong Kong Dragon Airlines, people familiar with the matter said, in a long-anticipated deal that would greatly expand Cathay's access to China's sizzling aviation market and plug the biggest hole in its global network.

A deal for Hong Kong-based Dragonair, as the company is known, could be valued at more than 8 billion Hong Kong dollars (US$1 billion) in cash and stock, according to a person knowledgeable about it. An agreement could be announced within days, but the terms aren't yet clear and the deal could still unravel, said the people familiar with the matter.

Cathay Pacific would purchase the controlling stake from two mainland Chinese companies that together own 71.8% of Dragonair, these people said. It would also purchase a 7.7% stake held by Swire Pacific Ltd., part of the London-based Swire Group and Cathay's largest shareholder. The moves would simplify the complex relationship between the companies. Cathay already owns a 17.8% stake in Dragonair.

Cathay once controlled Dragonair but lost its influence, and relations between them soured. Now, in spite of its home base in Hong Kong, Cathay operates a thin passenger service to just two Chinese cities. While Dragonair flies to 23 destinations in China, more than any other airline based outside the mainland, Cathay has had to watch from the sidelines as many of its toughest foreign competitors have started and expanded their own lucrative networks in China.

A deal would be "an historical event for Cathay Pacific...perhaps the most important corporate event for Cathay for the next five to 10 years," said Michael Wu, an analyst in Hong Kong for Fitch Ratings.

It would have the added significance of establishing much closer links, in the form of cross-shareholdings, between Cathay Pacific and Air China, which could bolster the performance and international standing of the Chinese flag carrier. Cathay Pacific already owns 10% of Air China and provides management support and training for the Beijing-based airline's cabin crew, engineers and other staff.

A person familiar with the talks said that after the deal, Cathay and Air China would each hold less than 20% in the other.

By marrying Dragonair's routes in China with Cathay's profitable long-haul network and by strengthening Cathay's ties with the strongest of China's state-run carriers, the deal could create a new powerhouse in international aviation.

The HK$8 billion price would be worthwhile for Cathay, so long as it gave the airline "meaningful access" to the mainland, said analyst Kevin O'Connor of investment bank CLSA Asia-Pacific Markets.

"The devil really is in the details here," he said, noting that the agreement might stop short of giving Cathay unfettered operational control of Dragonair's flights in China.

Cathay Pacific, Dragonair and Air China declined to comment on the talks, as did a spokeswoman for Swire Pacific. Sara Sze, an official of China National Aviation Co., or CNAC -- which has a 43.3% stake in Dragonair -- said she didn't know of a transaction. Chinese conglomerate Citic Pacific Ltd., which owns 28.5% of Dragonair and 25.4% of Cathay Pacific, didn't respond to requests for comment.

Trading in the shares of the five Hong Kong-listed companies -- Cathay, Air China, Swire Pacific, CNAC and Citic Pacific -- were suspended yesterday after publication of a report on the deal in the Hong Kong newspaper the Standard.

Cathay Pacific controlled Dragonair from 1991-96, when it scaled back its stake in the airline as part of a strategic rearrangement ahead of Britain's handover of political power in Hong Kong to China. Cathay and Dragonair have since become sometimes rancorous competitors on flights to Taiwan and other regional routes, and Cathay has had to make do in China with limited passenger service to Beijing and Xiamen and cargo service to Shanghai.

Cathay tried to widen its footprint in the mainland, first by partnering unsuccessfully with state-run China Eastern Airlines and then, in 2004, with a strategic investment in Air China. Cathay has yet to reap big benefits from its alliance with Air China, which complicated their relations by committing last month to joining the Star airline alliance instead of the oneworld group, to which Cathay belongs.

Under the new deal, Cathay would buy the stakes that Citic Pacific and CNAC hold in Dragonair, as well as Swire's holding. In return for the loss of mainland control of Dragonair, Air China or possibly CNAC would likely receive a stake in Cathay Pacific, two people with knowledge of the deal said.

Cathay should be able to generate cost savings by integrating Dragonair's back-office departments and management with its own and by using their combined fleets more efficiently, said UBS analyst Damien Horth. Cathay probably has already lined up regulatory approval of the deal from China's aviation authorities, he added.

An official of the Civil Aviation Administration of China said that no matter what shareholding changes might occur, "Dragonair will retain its nature as a Hong Kong carrier," adding as an example, "Cathay is controlled by a British company, but it is a Hong Kong carrier."

Avian Flu News Tracker (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal Online, June 6, 2006

Monday, June 5

3:55 p.m.: Japan said it will nominate WHO Western Pacific chief Shigeru Omi to succeed the late Lee Jong Wook as head of the U.N. health agency, the AFP news agency reported1. 2

2:05 p.m.: Wall Street Journal Video:3 Health and Human Services Secretary Michael Leavitt and Agriculture Secretary Michael Johanns discuss the latest news regarding a person-to-person transmission of the avian flu and what it means.

11:40 a.m.: Skinvisible Pharmaceuticals4 said its new hand sanitizer was 98% effective in deactivating or killing the bird-flu virus on skin for up to four hours during a recent test at a subsidiary of London's Queen Mary School of Medicine. The Las Vegas company developed the hand sanitizer primarily for health-care professionals. The active ingredient is Chlorhexidine.

9:05 a.m.: Less than one-sixth of the $1.9 billion pledged in January by donor countries to prepare developing nations for a flu pandemic has been dispersed, despite calls for a rapid escalation of efforts, the Financial Times reported6 Monday, citing the World Bank. The news of scant fund distribution comes as U.N. bird-flu chief David Nabarro is set to call for additional bird-flu funding, according to the report.

USDA Secretary Sets Strategies for Avian Flu

The U.S. Department of Agriculture can tap an emergency fund of about $30 billion to fight an outbreak of lethal flu in poultry, Secretary Mike Johanns said yesterday.

Any colony of birds in which a positive test occurred would be destroyed and the owners would be compensated, Johanns said.

"We would quarantine that flock, and we would humanely destroy those birds," he said. "Our goal would be to eradicate. We don't want to mess around with it."

Johanns said he might use rarely exercised emergency powers to access funds without congressional intervention if a lethal form of the H5N1 avian flu began spreading through domestic U.S. flocks. Health and agriculture officials are concerned that the virus may enter the United States through migratory, smuggled or imported birds and perhaps mutate into a form contagious among people that might set off a lethal worldwide human pandemic.

"You start considering the multitude of opportunities here and it's very important to be prepared," Johanns said.

At least 127 of the 224 people confirmed to have been infected with the H5N1 avian flu have died since 2003, the World Health Organization said May 29. Although the virus has primarily infected people through contact with sick or dead birds, some possible human-to-human transmission has been reported when people have come in close contact with sick, coughing patients.Medicaid to Require Proof of Citizenship

Tens of millions of low-income Americans will soon have to show their birth certificates or U.S. passports if they want to obtain health care through their state Medicaid programs.

The requirement that beneficiaries provide proof of citizenship goes into effect July 1. It's designed to root out cases of illegal immigrants getting their health care paid for by the government.

Health analysts say they fear the provision could prevent some citizens from getting health care.

Advocacy groups for the homeless and mentally ill have asked the Bush administration to presume that beneficiaries seeking care are eligible for the health insurance program for the poor. Then, they would be given time to get the necessary documents.

"They may not have kept the best records, particularly those with serious mental health disorders," said Kirsten Beronio, senior director of government affairs for the National Mental Health Association. "For them, there needs to be some accommodations made that other types of records could be used."Conferees Seek to Seal Deal on War Funding

Hoping to speed approval of war funds, House-Senate negotiators were to meet this evening on legislation to pay for the missions in Iraq and Afghanistan and for hurricane relief along the Gulf Coast.

After missing a Memorial Day deadline, negotiators hope to seal an agreement this week. The White House says a money crunch is threatening military operations and training accounts, especially for the Army, and could slow training and equipping of Iraqi soldiers.

"It's imperative that Congress finish its work and get this to the president to sign," said Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman. "This supplemental went up in February. It's now June." He said the Army will impose a civilian hiring freeze Tuesday and has cut spending on spare parts, transportation and travel.

New London Approves Evictions In Eminent Domain Dispute (BOS/AP)

By Stephen Singer, Associated Press Writer

The Boston Globe, June 6, 2006

NEW LONDON, Conn. --City officials voted Monday night to begin eviction proceedings against residents who refuse to leave their riverfront homes, signaling the end may be near in an eminent domain dispute that reached the U.S. Supreme Court.

The City Council approved the action 5-2, authorizing the city attorney to take the necessary steps, including possible court action, to evict the remaining two families and obtain the properties. A lawyer for the families said they are considering continuing their battle with the city.

About 100 people packed the meeting room, a hallway and an adjacent room.

The small city has been trying for a decade to redevelop the once vibrant Fort Trumbull neighborhood along the Thames River. Seven homeowners challenged the city's plans to seize their properties and build a hotel, convention center and upscale condominiums, saying eminent domain can't be used to make way for private development.

But a 5-4 Supreme Court ruling last year upheld the city's right to take the homes. The court, however, said states were free to restrict eminent domain seizures, and many already have. A proposal to change Connecticut's law died in this year's state legislative session.

Since the Supreme Court ruling, all but two families have settled with the city and agreed to leave.

Michael Cristofaro, one of the Fort Trumbull holdouts, spoke out against the property seizures.

"Just give us back our deeds," Cristofaro said. "You are not being straight with us or the public. You are not listening to the general public."

Cristofaro singled out five of the seven council members who favor taking the property.

"You are a disgrace to the city, the state and the nation," he said.

One Fort Trumbull resident, William Von Winkle, agreed to a settlement with the city Monday, just minutes before the City Council meeting began, The Day of New London reported. The terms were not disclosed.

Scott Bullock, a lawyer for the Arlington, Va.-based Institute for Justice who represents the residents, said the homeowners can still fight the city. He said they'll be considering appeals to state government to ask that state funding for the development be pulled. He said they also may engage in civil disobedience.

"This is a civil rights struggle to save poor and working class people from eminent domain abuse," he said.

City Councilor Robert Perro supported the effort to remove the families. He said the issue has been through state agencies and three courts.

"This was a plan that was well thought out," he said. "The development of this peninsula needs to move forward."

But Charles Frink, one of the two councilors who opposed seizing the properties, criticized supporters, saying they should admit they made a mistake.

"I can't accept a possible reduction in taxes by having neighbors thrown out of their property," he said. "This is morally abhorrent to me. I refuse to profit from my neighbor's pain."

Gov. M. Jodi Rell had proposed letting the holdouts remain in their homes but giving the city the right of first refusal if the houses ever were sold.

New London Mayor Elizabeth Sabilia predicted before the meeting that Rell's proposal would not be approved.

"The balance of councilors are staying the course," said Sabilia, who also votes on the council.

The vote came five days after a deadline for settlements to be reached with the remaining property owners.

One local resident who spoke Monday night, Donald Harrington, was against Rell's plan.

"What right has she got to tell the city of New London what to do?" he asked.

The eviction process, which may include another court fight, could take a month to three months. But that's negligible in a land dispute that has been up and down the court system over several years.

"You know how some things take on a life of their own?" Sabilia said. "This thing is like a cat. It's taken on nine lives."

Bullock said he didn't think the city wants the publicity that will come with razing the homes.

DOJ_NMG_0031880

"It would be a disaster, evicting Susette Kelo from that pink house that nearly everybody in the nation recognizes by now, when you've got a proposal from the governor on the table," he said.

Kelo, a 49-year-old nurse who bought her home in 1997, became the lead plaintiff in the court battle and has refused to sell, as has Cristofaro.

Debate Over Wind Power Creates Environmental Rift (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

OAKLAND, Md. — Dan Boone has no doubt that his crusade against wind energy is the right way to protect the Alleghenny highlands he loves. Let other environmentalists call him deluded at best, traitorous at worst. He remains undeterred.

For four years or more, Mr. Boone has traveled across the mid-Atlantic to make every argument he can muster against local wind-power projects: they kill birds and bats; they are too noisy; they are inefficient, making no more than a symbolic contribution to energy needs.

Wind farms on the empty prairies of North Dakota? Fine. But not, Mr. Boone insists, in the mountainous terrain of southwestern Pennsylvania, western Maryland or West Virginia, areas where 15 new projects have been proposed. If all were built, 750 to 1,000 giant turbines would line the hilltops, most producing, on average, enough electricity to power 600 homes.

Wind projects are in the midst of a huge growth spurt in many parts of the country, driven by government incentives to promote alternatives to fossil fuels. But Mr. Boone, who wields a botanist's trowel and a debater's knife with equal ease, wants to slow them down with community activism, regulatory action and legal challenges.

His crusade harks back to the campaigns against nuclear power plants, toxic-waste dumps and dams on scenic rivers that were building blocks of the modern environmental movement. But the times, and the climate, are changing. With fears of global warming growing more acute, Mr. Boone and many other local activists are finding themselves increasingly out of step with the priorities of the broader movement.

National groups like Greenpeace and the Sierra Club used to uniting against specific projects are now united for renewable energy in general. And they are particularly high on wind power — with the caveat that a few, but only a few, special places should be turbine-free.

"The broader environmental movement knows we have this urgent need for renewable energy to avert global warming," said John Passacantando, executive director of Greenpeace U.S.A. "But we're still dealing with groups that can't get their heads around global warming yet."

Indeed, the best winds, especially in the East, tend to blow in places that are also ideal for hiking, sailing, second homes and spirit-soothing views. These include the Green Mountains, the Adirondacks, the Chesapeake Bay, Cape Cod and the ridges of northern Appalachia. Local opposition to unwanted development remains a potent force.

So when it comes to wind, the environmental movement is riven with dissonance and accusations of elitism. Robert F. Kennedy Jr.'s very public opposition to the 130-turbine Cape Wind energy facility proposed off Nantucket Sound has driven a wedge between activists. Dan Boone's circuit riding against wind projects, while not attracting the same celebrity notice, has exasperated many Sierra Club compatriots even more.

Like Mr. Kennedy, Mr. Boone says the areas he wants to protect are uniquely vulnerable. His family owns property near the proposed projects, just as Mr. Kennedy's does near the Cape Wind site.

But Mr. Boone says that wind supporters are the ones pursuing their own agenda at the expense of the public interest.

"I'm not sure that wind turbines in this region will significantly reduce the outcome of global climate change or actually have any role," Mr. Boone said. "The very limited benefit doesn't justify the risk of wiping out a lot of interior forest habitat."

National environmental leaders reject this argument.

"There's no free lunch," said Paul Hansen, executive director of the Izaak Walton League of America, a venerable sportsmen's group. " 'Not in my backyard' is not environmentalism."

The Alleghenies are a big backyard, with views that are both spectacular and problematic. Flowering shrubs like shadbush and preening flowers like trillium are framed by oaks, maples and longleaf pines. But intermittent industrial tree farming has repeatedly denuded some mountainsides. On both sides of the border near here in far western Maryland, second-home development is booming. The air has often been fouled by the Mount Storm coal-fired power plant.

If Ned Power, a wind-energy development company, puts up 100 or so turbines along 14 miles of ridgeline near Mount Storm, wind-energy supporters say, how much does that further spoil the landscape?

Kevin Rackstraw, a regional manager of Clipper Windpower whose proposed 40-turbine project in western Maryland has drawn Mr. Boone's fire, said opponents lacked perspective.

"Dan looks at all the impacts of a given wind project," Mr. Rackstraw said, "but doesn't say: 'If we didn't have wind, what would we have?' Coal. Think of the impact of acid rain and mountaintop removal."

The Ned Power project is just one target of Mr. Boone, 49, a former state wildlife biologist who now works as a consultant. In interviews, he said he first focused on the issue when working as a botanist on a study related to an early wind power project. The environmental-impact statements, he said, were grossly inadequate.

Now he drives from Highland County in western Virginia (where 38 turbines are proposed on Tamarack Ridge) to Bedford, Pa. (where early discussions of an unnamed project are under way) to talk to local groups or crystallize their objections for them. In Annapolis, Md., and Charleston, W.Va., he uses state utility regulators' licensing hearings to throw up roadblocks before wind projects. He is eager to argue with industry officials in any venue, questioning their facts, assumptions and motives.

"The rush is on now because a lot of the places they've targeted have no zoning, and it's easy to get in that kind of large-scale development," he said. "This part of the country has really good energy prices. Developers are keying in on that."

Mr. Boone's quiver of anti-wind arguments includes economic analyses, but his first line of attack is biological: he contends that they are a threat to bats and potentially to migratory birds and that they break up forest habitat.

Scores of raptors and other birds were killed by the first generation of wind turbines set up at Altamont Pass in Northern California. Since the Altamont Pass turbines were erected in the early 1980's, turbine design has been altered, and most subsequent studies have shown that birds tend to fly above the height of most turbines though some experts say more studies are needed.

But the turbines south of here in Thomas, W.Va., have been lethal to bats. More than 2,000 were killed in 2003 at the Mountaineer project, whose 44 turbines are owned by FPL Energy, a big power company that is the wind industry's dominant player.

Industry officials agree that the bat mortality measured at the Mountaineer site is unacceptable, and they are studying the benefits of deterrent devices and the best ways to modify turbine operations in bat-rich areas.

To Mr. Boone, wind energy will never make a big enough difference to justify its impact in the region. "You have to remember that these tax advantages are so huge," he said, "that these developers are keen to latch onto all the mythology — whether it's global warming or something else."

Asked if he thought global warming was a myth, he said: "No, I'm not calling it mythology." But industry officials, he contended, will "take things out of context."

Mike Tidwell, the director of Chesapeake Climate Action Network and one of Mr. Boone's adversaries, bristles at the attack. "Wind industry guys are the straightest-shooting people," Mr. Tidwell said. "Most got into it because they had an environmental ethic."

But Mr. Boone has plenty of allies, too. "He's the greatest naturalist I've even known," said Betsy Johnson, chairwoman of the Maryland chapter of the Sierra Club. "Dan has been very helpful in educating us with what problems there can be with an energy source like wind."

The industry Mr. Boone regards so suspiciously is on a roll. The total share of energy that wind farms generated nationwide in 2004 was tiny — about one-third of 1 percent, according to the Energy Department. But by 2020, according to industry estimates, wind's share of the county's energy portfolio could grow ten- or twentyfold.

For the environmental movement, wind supporters say, the transition from the protection of place to the protection of planet is bound to be wrenching.

"Wilderness conversations are spiritual," said David Hamilton, the Sierra Club's national director of global warming and energy programs. "We've always been a place-based organization, protecting places," but "protecting our climate" is "just looking at it from a different angle and a different elevation."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

You Trust This Guy? (RC)

By Mary Ann Akers

Roll Call, June 6, 2006

It appears there may be an even more bizarre genesis to the FBI's already unusual attempt to seize the papers of the late journalist Jack Anderson, who was 83 when he died in December. The Senate Judiciary Committee is set to hear about the allegedly sordid past of a former Anderson reporter who tipped off the FBI when it convenes this morning to hold a hearing on the controversy.

According to a Senate Judiciary Committee source, a witness will testify that the entire Anderson investigation was triggered by a tip from a man convicted and imprisoned for sodomizing a young boy and who allegedly admitted to having a history of mental illness.

The witness who will make these charges is Mark Feldstein, a journalism professor at George Washington University, where the Anderson papers are stored.

Feldstein is working on a book titled "Poisoning the Press: Richard Nixon, Jack Anderson and the Rise of Washington's Scandal Culture," which is due out next year. So the FBI went to him to seek Anderson's papers.

The FBI reportedly said it wanted Anderson's files, going back as far as the early 1980s, as part of its criminal probe of two former lobbyists for the American Israel Public Affairs Committee who are accused of violating espionage laws. The FBI came knocking even though, as The Chicago Tribune noted in an editorial last month, Anderson "had been ill with Parkinson's disease since 1986."

Don Goldberg, a veteran spinmeister for the Clinton administration who is now a managing director for Qorvis Communications, says he and other former Anderson associates find the FBI's attempt to seize Anderson's papers "outrageous."

For one, Goldberg said, Anderson had not been an active journalist for at least 15 years before his death. More importantly, he said, "the First Amendment ability of journalists to protect their confidential sources regarding legitimate issues relating to how our government works is sacred. It doesn't evaporate when a journalist dies. This is nothing more than an attempt to intimidate reporters by threatening them even in death."

Several close-knit Andersonites plan to attend today's hearing. One of them, author James Grady, whose spy novel "Six Days of the Condor" was made into the '70s suspense classic "Three Days of the Condor," has a notion to corral the Anderson gang to sing the "The Star-Spangled Banner" at the start of the session.

"I think that would be appropriate to remind people where they are," he said.

Speaking of Investigative Reporters ... Robert Redford's trip to the nation's capital next week has nothing to do with Deep Throat.

The liberal group Campaign for America's Future has snagged the one-time star of "All the President's Men" (and, as it happens, the aforementioned "Three Days of the Condor") to add a little Hollywood gleam to its "Take Back America" conference.

Toby Chaudhuri, the group's spokesman, wrote in an e-mail that Redford, who is 69, will join Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and other activists to officially launch the group's Apollo Challenge to urge the White House and Congress to "kick our nation's oil habit." The conference starts June 12 at the Washington Hilton.

Attendees will also hear from Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), John Kerry (D-Mass.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.).

Be Cool. Hey, softball players, keep those beers down if your team is playing down on the Mall this week. Police are out in full force in light of three recent muggings and one sexual assault.

DOJ_NMG_0031883

Last week, a police officer issued a verbal warning to a couple of members of the Shays Lounge and the Swinging Johnsons — the softball team of Reps. Christopher Shays and Nancy Johnson, both Connecticut Republicans — before the start of their game last Wednesday against the Hoosier Daddys.

The two teams were warming up, and some of their players were swilling brewskis, when police on bicycle, horseback and motorcycle showed up. “I was wondering when they were going to bring in Scotland Yard,” one eyewitness said dryly.

The informant said he thought some members of the Shays-Johnson team were issued a warning, but not an official ticket. He was right. Sarah Moore, a spokeswoman for Rep. Shays, says an officer simply asked them to put the beer away and gave them “a verbal warning.”

Drug Czar Announces Bad Heroin Supply Bust (AP)

By Carla K. Johnson

AP, June 5, 2006

CHICAGO -- U.S. agents, working in cooperation with the Mexican government, have closed down a lab in Mexico that might be the main source of a powerful painkiller that has killed at least 100 heroin users in eight states, the federal drug czar said Monday.

John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said it's still not clear whether the painkiller, fentanyl, was mixed with heroin at the lab in Mexico or after it entered the United States.

"There may be more than one source," Walters said. "We think this is the principal source."

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration is testing samples of fentanyl seized in a May 28 raid of a suspected fentanyl-manufacturing operation near Guadalajara but has not yet confirmed that the drug is linked to the U.S. deaths, DEA spokesman Steve Robertson said.

"We hope to have a break in the case, but we're not sure this is it," Robertson said.

Five Mexican citizens were arrested during the May bust, including one Walters described as the chemist.

Walters said that the dealers may have started using fentanyl because they were looking for a competitive advantage on the street, but that inept mixing _ or cutting _ of the drug combination made it deadly.

He also warned that millions of deadly doses of the fentanyl-laced heroin might still be on the streets. Fentanyl-laced cocaine had turned up in some cities, as well, he said.

Deaths caused by fentanyl-laced drugs have occurred in Illinois, Michigan, Missouri, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland, Walters said.

Doctors prescribe fentanyl as a painkiller for cancer patients and others in chronic pain. It's about 80 times more potent than morphine.

The drug is also many times stronger than heroin. An overdose can slow breathing to the point of death.

Lethal Drug Likely Came To Area From Mexican Lab (AP)

Authorities believe raid hit source of pain-killer used in deadly heroin

CHICAGO - U.S. and Mexican authorities have closed a Mexican lab that might have been the main source of a powerful pain-killer that has killed heroin users in the Harrisburg and Philadelphia areas and six other states.

Those authorities also warned yesterday that millions of deadly doses of fentanyl-laced heroin might still be on America's streets.

The mixture has caused at least 100 confirmed deaths from Philadelphia to Chicago in recent months. The Harrisburg area had two deaths and at least 20 overdoses from heroin cut with fentanyl in April, authorities said.

The lethal mix was sold locally in packages marked "Apollo" and was sought by users looking for powerful highs, authorities said.

Deaths caused by fentanyl-laced drugs have also occurred in Michigan, Missouri, Ohio, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland, said John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy.

DOJ_NMG_0031884

Fentanyl, medical authorities said, is prescribed for cancer patients and others in extreme pain. The drug is considered 80 times more powerful than morphine. An overdose can cause a suffocating feeling similar to an asthma attack, slowing breathing to the point of death.

Organizations that run needle exchanges and other health programs for drug users are trying to spread the word. "Is your friend turning blue?" reads one flier that describes what to do in an emergency.

But to some drug users, seeking a more powerful high, the warnings become an advertisement.

In the Detroit area -- the apparent hub of the problem with more than 100 confirmed cases since last fall -- officials from the national Centers for Disease Control and Prevention were investigating, and community organizations were still scrambling at the end of May to get the word out to users.

Walters said it was not clear yesterday whether the fentanyl was mixed with heroin at the lab in Mexico or after it entered the United States. Fentanyl-laced cocaine also has turned up in some cities, he said.

He warned that fentanyl might be coming from other sources as well.

"There may be more than one source," Walters said. "We think this is the principal source."

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration is testing samples of fentanyl seized in the raid near the western city of Guadalajara, but it does not yet have confirmation that the drug is linked to the U.S. deaths, DEA spokesman Steve Robertson said.

"We hope to have a break in the case, but we're not sure this is it," Robertson said. "This is an ongoing investigation, and we're working very closely with local authorities."

Five men, all Mexican citizens, were arrested in the May 28 raid, Robertson said. Walters described one of them as "the chemist."

"Through standard detective work we're looking to make ties into what's going on up here" in the United States, Robertson said.

Walters said the fentanyl-laced heroin might have been used by dealers looking for a competitive advantage on the street, but inept mixing -- or cutting -- of the drug into heroin made it deadly.

The DEA plans to gather police officers and drug enforcement agents for a national meeting on the fentanyl problem June 14-15 in Chicago, Robertson said.

Major Bust In Bad Heroin Supply (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen And Tonya Maxwell, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, June 5, 2006

A clandestine laboratory in Mexico capable of producing millions of doses of the potent, sometimes lethal, drug fentanyl has been shut down, the U.S. drug czar announced Monday in Chicago, but not before it may have contaminated supplies of street drugs here and across the country.

Heroin mixed with the powerful painkiller has been blamed for hundreds of deaths across the U.S. in the last year, including at least 60 in Chicago. The synthetic narcotic is being added to heroin to give a more powerful high to users, authorities have said. Some users have sought the combination and others may not have known what they were buying.

Just over the weekend in Cook County, there were 13 fatal overdoses that now are being investigated for connections to fentanyl, the county's chief medical examiner said Monday.

John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said it is too soon to know if the Mexican lab was the biggest source of the illicit drug, which has killed people in eight states.

But authorities believe it may have been running long enough to push a major amount of fentanyl, used legally for pain management, into the illegal drug market, he said.

"In effect, to be quite clear, the drug traffickers have substantially poisoned the drug supply in the United States," Walters said.

"These are already dangerous substances, but obviously we're now seeing in more places the effects of this incredibly powerful drug in levels that are causing deaths."

The U.S. Embassy in Mexico City reported the lab was located May 21 by Mexican authorities in Toluca, north of the capital. The Mexican attorney general's office reported authorities found a climate-controlled room in the company's space in an industrial park, with tools and precursor chemicals used in the making of the drug.

Federal investigators said five Mexican nationals were arrested, including a man acting as the chemist for the group.

Investigators are working to determine how much fentanyl could have been made at the production site before it was discovered. And agents are seeking records on the site that might provide clues as to its production capacity and distribution channels, they said.

Deaths have been reported in Illinois, Michigan, Ohio, Missouri, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland.

Testing is under way to find a common chemical signature in samples from those states that might link them to the Mexican lab, Walters said, confirming the fears of some that crime networks will move heavily into fentanyl production.

Investigators said they are working to determine if Chicago street gangs are moving the drug locally. Walters said no clear national picture had emerged that would explain which criminal networks are transporting fentanyl around the country.

Cook County Medical Examiner Edmund Donoghue said blood from 13 victims of fatal overdoses in the county over the weekend would be tested for fentanyl. The drug is among the most powerful illicit substances seen on Chicago's streets, he said. The narcotic, originally produced as a surgical anesthetic, shuts down the respiratory system, he said.

Among those suspected of overdosing over the weekend was Herman Elmore, 31, who died at the home of a family he was staying with in the 7400 block of South Morgan Street.

Vicky Love, who described herself as Elmore's godmother, said he was in and out of the house early Sunday, and then came in and said he was sleepy at about 3 p.m.

"I told him to sit down and take a nap," Love said. Several hours later children in the house tried to wake Elmore from a chair, but he was not breathing.

Donoghue said it would take weeks for testing to determine whether fentanyl was in Elmore's system. Love said she did not know Elmore to be a drug user, and said she doesn't know why anyone would try heroin now.

"They know [fentanyl] is out there, so why go out here and purchase it when it's all over the news?" she said.

Eddy Borrayo, director of substance-abuse services at the Pilsen-Little Village Mental Health Center, said many addicts do look for fentanyl-laced heroin.

"If someone is getting a good high, such as with fentanyl, then addicts will go out and say, 'Where can I get some?'" he said. "That's what keeps them going. They're trying to find something else that gives them their first high.

"The potency is the issue," he said. "If a dope dealer says, 'I've got the good stuff,' that means it'll knock [the addict] out. It might make the addict feel tranquil and go to sleep. That's what they want. It's a pseudo-suicide, if you want to call it that."

Garrison Courtney, spokesman for the Drug Enforcement Administration in Washington, said there could be a number of illegal sources for the drug, including other laboratories. Some of it has been stolen from medical facilities where it is often used in a patch for cancer patients and others with severe pain, Courtney said.

On June 14, Chicago police and the Drug Enforcement Administration in Chicago will meet with law enforcement representatives from other states in hopes of finding patterns in how the drug is distributed.

Drug czar Walters said fentanyl also would become a focus of his office's new U.S. Synthetic Drug Control Strategy, which will target precursor materials entering the country.

Walters, speaking after a news conference in Chicago that introduced a new ad campaign to keep Hispanics from experimenting with crystal methamphetamine, said for now he could only urge users not to go looking for fentanyl.

At a treatment clinic in the mental health center, Borrayo said he was not optimistic most addicts would listen to official pleas to stay away from fentanyl. In his experience, he said, dealers will often give out free samples of a new mixture to see if they have a winning formula, and users will be in line waiting for it.

"The [dealers] will try to test it out to see if it's that good," he said. "Then they'll increase their price."

Effects Of Fentanyl (CHIT)

By Judith Graham, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, June 5, 2006

Fentanyl is an extraordinarily effective drug when it comes to pain relief. But abuse it and the chance of deadly complications is high.

A synthetic medication, fentanyl belongs to a class of drugs known as opioids. Others in the class include morphine, heroin, methadone, hydrocodone (Vicodin) and oxycodone (OxyContin).

Opioids work by binding to parts of nerves responsible for perceiving and transmitting pain. These opioid receptors are found primarily in a person's brain and spinal column.

For people in distress, relief can come in a matter of seconds after a fentanyl injection. For others, a feeling of euphoria is common, said Dr. Allen Burton, an associate professor of pain medicine at M.D. Anderson Cancer Center in Houston.

Potency is fentanyl's hallmark: It is between 80 to 100 times more powerful than morphine.

Whereas heroin and morphine are dosed in milligrams, fentanyl is dosed in micrograms—one 100th of a milligram, said Linda Bressler, a clinical associate professor at the University of Illinois at Chicago's College of Pharmacy.

Underscoring the need for caution, fentanyl has a narrower "therapeutic window"—the difference between a safe dose and a dangerous dose—than other opioids. "Overshoot the dose by just a little bit, and you can go from euphoric to unconscious or dead pretty easily," Burton said.

The greatest danger comes from fentanyl's potential to depress the central nervous system and cause breathing to shut down if it is taken in excess.

Signs of an overdose include "trouble breathing or shallow breathing, extreme sleepiness or sedation, an inability to walk or talk normally, and feeling faint, dizzy and confused," according to a recent publication from the Food and Drug Administration.

Heroin users may put themselves at extreme risk with fentanyl because doses are so different and because the drugs compound each other's effects, said Dr. Bruce Goldberger, director of toxicology at the University of Florida's College of Medicine.

Fentanyl has two legitimate purposes. In hospitals and other medical settings, anesthesiologists give it intravenously to patients undergoing surgery. The drug is also available in a skin patch or lozenge for people with severe chronic pain, such as cancer patients and patients with degenerative neurological disorders.

Recently, reports from around the country indicate growing abuse of the Duragesic skin patch and an increasing number of deaths from overdoses. Users are putting on multiple patches or stripping out the drug and injecting, drinking, eating or smoking it, Goldberger said.

Heroin Users Warned About Deadly Additive (WP)

By Peter Slevin And Kari Lydersen

The Washington Post, June 4, 2006

CHICAGO -- The largest clue that something had changed in Chicago's vibrant heroin market came in February, when police found a dozen users sprawled unconscious in one place. One day in April, there were dozens more.

Toxicologists at the Cook County morgue discovered fentanyl, a powerful painkiller many times stronger than morphine, in the bodies of addicts who died. A small amount of fentanyl in a dose of heroin adds a pop that many users have come to crave.

"It's a new phenomenon. It's the latest high," said Chicago police spokeswoman Monique Bond, "but it's deadly. "

Since February, coroners have recorded 55 fentanyl-related deaths in Cook County, with 45 more cases suspected. Some were unsuspecting users taking pure fentanyl; others were users taking a mixture. Scores overdosed but recovered -- and not all regretted using it.

"There's this consumer arc. At first there's fear, but then when the fear is over, it's like: Hey, that's good stuff," said Greg Scott, a DePaul University sociologist who conducts government-funded research on injected drugs. "Most so-called street addicts can't afford more than what they're already doing, so fentanyl gives you that little extra bump. People are scouting for it."

Authorities have spotted the practice in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and it appears most serious in Detroit, where authorities suspect that more than 175 people have died in recent months from fentanyl-related overdoses. The national Centers for Disease Control and Prevention is investigating. Federal and local authorities are convening a workshop in Chicago next week to learn more.

"It's baptism by fire here," Scott said.

The Chicago Recovery Alliance runs a weekly needle exchange and barbecue in a bus parking lot in Cicero, just outside city boundaries. At recent sessions, the organization has been warning users about the dangers and teaching them how to distinguish the mint green-tinged fentanyl-laced heroin from the typical Chicago drug, which tends to be yellowish or dusty brown.

"We tell them: If it's green, you shouldn't use it," said Cheryl Hull, the group's deputy director of operations, who reported that at least seven clients have died. Staffers have been urging users to be far more vigilant and to get high in twos or threes, never alone.

Cathy Piotrowski, who showed up for last week's barbecue, said she has overdosed four times on a fentanyl-heroin mix.

"You do it, then bam, you're just right out. You don't remember anything," said Piotrowski, 42, who reported taking three hits of heroin a day. "I'm warning people about it, saying this stuff is going around, so be careful."

Despite the obvious dangers, the quest for a bigger and better high is driving users to find the more potent fentanyl-heroin blend. Universal laws of marketing and sales are similarly driving the pushers to supply it, authorities said. Even the police unwittingly contributed to the phenomenon.

"The dealers were passing out free samples to attract users," police spokeswoman Bond said. "The police department was trying to be proactive by alerting the public about the bad heroin, but we were providing free marketing, basically providing a road map."

Scott, the DePaul sociologist, said four of the five heroin-dealing crews he is tracking are now selling the drug laced with fentanyl. They sell more dope in what is a competitive market, he said, and make more money. The users, especially those who can afford only a limited amount of heroin even as their tolerance grows through habitual use, see a way to get higher.

"For the same amount of money, you can get a product that's, let's say, 10 times more potent," Scott said.

Frankie is a 43-year-old homeless man who did not want to give his last name. He said he overdosed late last month on fentanyl-laced heroin he got for free on Chicago's Southwest Side. Police took him to the hospital. A former amateur boxer, he likened the effect to being slugged in the head and knocked out.

To him, the freebies did not make much sense.

"They were handing it out," he said, "but why kill your new customers?"

Deadly Mix Entices Drug Users (DN)

Detroit News, June 6, 2006

It's sold on the street as "Suicide," and if the name doesn't signal the risk, fears that it may have caused as many as 58 overdose deaths in Wayne County since May 18 should.

But a rise in deaths linked to heroin spiked with the painkiller fentanyl hasn't deterred some hardcore addicts from seeking the drug with the deadly nickname. Desperate for a high that gets elusive with time, a dedicated batch of users is turning to the cocktail whose effects can last all day.

Addicts told The Detroit News they're trying Suicide because they think they can manage the drug and avoid overdoses that have killed more than 130 users in Wayne County since January 2005. The News verified the identities of users, but agreed not to publish their last names.

"This is the biggest advertisement ever for the dope man: A drug that gets you so (messed) up, you die," said Susan, a Bloomfield Hills woman who has used heroin on and off for 18 years but has been clean for a month.

That newfound high could soon end, however. Federal investigators announced Monday they may have found the source for the drugs last month during a raid that closed an underground lab in Mexico.

U.S. and Mexican authorities arrested five people for manufacturing a knockoff of the drug that's prescribed to cancer patients and described as 50 times stronger than morphine. Chemical tests will determine if the lab was the source of drugs sold as "Suicide" in Detroit and several Midwestern cities.

"There may be more than one source," said John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy. "We think this is the principal source."

Authorities would not comment Monday on their evidence, however, and a Drug Enforcement Administration spokesman in Chicago, Chris Hoyt, said agents "are not ready to say the lab discovered in Mexico is directly related to what's happening here."

"The raid in Mexico is good news, but it does nothing for the lethal drug supply on our streets right now," said Robert Ficano, Wayne County executive and former sheriff. "We don't know how much of this mix is out there, and we don't know how many fentanyl sources there are."

Despite the warnings, many users have come to view Suicide as a drug they can use occasionally, said Patti, a decade-long user from Detroit.

Unlike heroin, addicts don't need to use five or more times a day while they're on fentanyl and don't need a fix as soon as they wake up.

"A lot of people are trying to get their hands on it," she said. "Some people are afraid, but most want to get as high again. … The heroin around here hasn't been great lately. It's been hit or miss. This is different. The first time I used it, I didn't know what it was. I got high. It was strong."

Part of the appeal is that longtime addicts no longer get high. Instead, heroin merely curbs nausea, tremors, diarrhea and other withdrawal symptoms, said Dr. Mark Greenwald, a Wayne State University psychiatry professor who conducts studies on addicts.

"This is used a lot by drug dealers as a kind of marketing," said Garrison Courtney, a DEA spokesman. "They give it an artificial purity. Then people see a few overdose deaths, and they're going to flock to the area to get that brand."

Some do so with deadly consequences.

Two weeks ago, Patti said she revived a friend who overdosed on fentanyl and heroin. The woman passed out immediately after injecting. Friends poured ice water on her head, then ice cubes.

She began to turn blue. Desperate, after 15 minutes of failures, Patti said she blew smoke from crack cocaine on her friend and she came to.

Patti said she still uses fentanyl.

"Everyone thinks they can take it," she said. "They're not going to be the ones who are going to go out on it (and die.) I don't think anyone is changing their habits."

The anecdotes seem to confirm the worst fears of drug counselors who worried the spate of publicity about the overdoses would increase demand. Public health officials in Wayne County have dispatched drug treatment workers and even recovering addicts into some of the city's drug-plagued neighborhoods to warn users.

"I don't see a lot of people who are nervous about this (outbreak,)" said Shirlie Arrington, a program supervisor at New Light Recovery Center methadone clinic in Detroit. "When you're doing drugs, you don't know what you're doing until you get it."

That's the fear of Dominic, a 46-year-old mechanic from Eastpointe, who started using heroin again last year in part because traditional painkillers didn't ease ongoing back problems.

Dominic said he's in such pain from withdrawal that "sometimes I just want to die" but still worries about accidentally taking fentanyl. "I don't know if someone's out to kill you," he said. "I care in that perspective, but I still do (heroin)."

The Drug War: 'The Best High They've Ever Had' (NSWK)

Newsweek, June 12, 2006

June 12, 2006 issue - Street users call it drop dead, executioner, flat-liner, the exorcist, Al Capone, fefe, Teflon and diesel. Cops know it as a deadly mix of heroin and fentanyl, an anesthetic and painkiller far more potent than morphine. For cancer patients racked with pain, legally prescribed fentanyl can be a godsend. But for junkies, the fentanyl-heroin cocktail has become the hot new high, as lethal as it is alluring. It is being blamed for hundreds of deaths this year in big cities in the Midwest and Northeast. In Wayne County, Mich., home to Detroit, there have been 50 deaths in just the past two weeks, including 19 in one deadly day in May.

The problem is that cops don't know who is spreading the killer junk on the streets. It might be just one big bad batch that's been widely distributed, or it could be coming from multiple sources, say law-enforcement officials, who first began noticing a spike in fentanyl-heroin overdoses in November. One promising new lead came from the arrest of five people at an underground fentanyl lab in Mexico. "We're working to see if there's a connection, if that lab was the source," says DEA spokeswoman Rogene Waite. Federal and local police are meeting in Chicago this month to compare notes and come up with a cohesive strategy to combat the growing crisis.

Dealers are not intentionally killing their customers. Instead, it appears that in their zeal to get the new product on the street, dealers haven't perfected the recipe. Users say the blend, when snorted, injected or smoked, gives them an instant feeling of extreme euphoria. After 11 people died from the drug in one day in Chicago last month, police issued a public warning. Instead of being scared off, "people flocked to the area looking for the drug," says police spokeswoman Monique Bond. "They say," says Frank Limon, a top Chicago cop, "that it's the best high they've ever had." And the deadliest.

Suspect Shot By Police Dies From Wounds (SLPD)

St. Louis Post-Dispatch, June 5, 2006

A man believed to be peddling a potentially deadly heroin-fentanyl combination, who was shot in a confrontation with police in University City, has died from his wounds, officials said Monday.

Maurice A. Adkins, 27, of the 1200 block of Partridge Avenue in University City, died about 10 p.m. Sunday at Barnes-Jewish Hospital.

Meanwhile, U.S. drug czar John Walters said Monday that federal agents, working in cooperation with the Mexican government, closed a lab in Mexico that could be the main source of the fentanyl that has killed heroin users in eight states, including Missouri and Illinois.

Walters, the director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said it's still not clear whether the fentanyl was mixed with heroin at the lab or after it entered the U.S.

Officials suspect that 20 or more deaths in the St. Louis area are linked to the potent drug combination. Federal officials say there are at least 100 confirmed deaths nationally.

There was no link indicated between Adkins and any of the overdose deaths.

He was shot by two officers about 6 p.m. Thursday following an alleged drug deal in the 7000 block of Raymond Avenue. Police said that Adkins, when told he was under arrest, started to drive off and that an officer's leg got pinned between the open door and door jamb of Adkins' van.

That officer, of the Webster Groves Police Department, was not seriously injured.

Adkins had become a priority of the St. Louis County Multi-Jurisdictional Drug Task Force, officials said, after police heard he was selling heroin-fentanyl mix.

Before he died, Adkins was charged with first-degree assault on a law enforcement officer, possession of a controlled substance and delivering a controlled substance. Police said they found heroin-fentanyl mix in his van.

Walters, the federal drug official, said fentanyl-laced cocaine also has turned up in some cities, and he warned drug users that millions of deadly doses of the fentanyl-heroin combination might still be on the streets.

"There may be more than one source," Walters said in announcing the raid May 28 near Guadalajara. "We think this is the principal source." Lab tests were pending on whether the Mexican drug can be linked to the American deaths. In addition to Missouri, fatalities have been reported in Illinois, Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and Maryland, Walters said.

Walters made the announcement in Chicago, where he was to release a series of anti-methamphetamine advertisements in Spanish and English.

DOJ_NMG_0031890

Doctors prescribe fentanyl, a powerful narcotic, as a painkiller for cancer patients and others in chronic pain. Walters said the fentanyl-laced heroin might have been used by dealers looking for a competitive advantage on the street, but inept mixing - or cutting - of the drug into heroin made it deadly. Federal and state officials plan to confer on the problem next week in Chicago.

Lethal Form Of Heroin Takes Steep Toll Here (PPG)

By Jonathan D. Silver, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, June 6, 2006

Three deaths, 35 overdoses are blamed on the lethal form of drug plaguing the city. And the mixture has caused at least 100 deaths from Philadelphia to Chicago

City police detectives were working overtime to scoop up drug dealers and lean on users for information as a lethal batch of heroin snaked its way through city neighborhoods and beyond, causing at least 35 overdoses and as many as three deaths.

The heroin, which has cropped up in at least eight Pittsburgh neighborhoods since Saturday, is likely laced with the potent painkiller fentanyl, about 80 times stronger than morphine.

As authorities tried to make a dent locally in the heroin trade, the federal government announced yesterday that it had worked with Mexico to close a lab across the border that might be the source of the fentanyl that has killed heroin users in Pennsylvania and seven other states.

John Walters, director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, said it was still not clear whether the fentanyl was mixed with heroin at the lab in Mexico or after it entered the United States.

Mr. Walters, speaking to reporters in Chicago yesterday, warned drug users that millions of deadly doses of fentanyl-laced heroin might still be on the streets. The mixture has caused at least 100 confirmed deaths from Philadelphia to Chicago in recent months. Fentanyl might also be coming from other sources, he said.

"There may be more than one source," Mr. Walters said. "We think this is the principal source."

The U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration is testing samples of fentanyl seized in a May 28 raid of a suspected fentanyl manufacturing operation near the western Mexico city of Guadalajara but does not yet have confirmation that the drug is linked to the U.S. deaths, DEA spokesman Steve Robertson said.

City police said they have arrested five people since the outbreak began Saturday, but they declined to release any details, saying that the investigation was ongoing.

Pittsburgh police Cmdr. Thomas Stangrecki cautioned that even if officers bust the source of the bad heroin that has flooded Pittsburgh, it will take time for the batch on the streets to dwindle and finally disappear. It is not known how much of the heroin came into Pittsburgh or how it was divvied up among dealers.

"We're going to see it for a while until the supply is diminished," Cmdr. Stangrecki said yesterday during a news conference. "It's going to take more than one arrest to stop this."

Overdoses believed to be connected to the heroin, which has been found in small packets called stamp bags marked "Get High or Die Trying," have occurred in Beechview, Greenfield, Hazelwood, the Hill District, Lincoln Place, the North Side, the South Side and Squirrel Hill.

Other name brands are thought to be involved, but police have been unable to confirm that, Cmdr. Stangrecki said.

The heroin also has shown up in Bethel Park, Brentwood, Tarentum and West Mifflin. It sells for $10 to $15 a packet. Users range from 16 to 56 years old, cross socioeconomic lines, and are white. Most are men.

West Mifflin Police Chief Joseph Popovich said his department's encounter with the drug happened Sunday around 4:15 p.m. A man in his 30s who had taken heroin was found turning blue in a car parked on Lebanon Road near Miller Road.

The heroin came from Hazelwood, the man shot up in West Mifflin, and the case was turned over to Pittsburgh, Chief Popovich said.

Some arrests were made Friday involving the "Get High or Die Trying" stamp bags, but it was not until Saturday afternoon that Pittsburgh police first noticed something amiss when four overdoses were reported.

On Sunday, the number of incidents multiplied and included a fatality, Joseph Zielinski, 45, of Penn Hills, who was found in an apartment on Greenfield Avenue.

DOJ_NMG_0031891

Yesterday, anyone listening to a police scanner would have heard numerous calls throughout the day for overdoses, including two fatalities in Hazelwood.

At 9:13 a.m., Lynn A. Margavo, 30, was found dead in her home in the 5200 block of Gertrude Street. And at 10:11 a.m., Dorothy Iannone, 56, of the 5100 block of Roma Way, was found dead. The cause and manner of both deaths were pending toxicology results.

A sampling of yesterday's overdoses followed the same pattern as Sunday's, with some cases involving motorists. Just after 10 a.m. yesterday, for instance, a man who had used the heroin lost consciousness and drove his Mercury Villager minivan over the curb and into a tree in the 100 block of Flowers Avenue in Hazelwood.

The driver, who was wearing his seat belt, was leaning back in his seat, unconscious. Firefighters from a nearby station house ran to the scene and began working to revive the man, who had a strong pulse but was having difficulty breathing, according to Capt. Greg Lowman.

The man regained consciousness in about five minutes, after firefighters and paramedics administered rescue breathing and a reversal agent, Capt. Lowman said.

"He claimed to be sleeping, but it was an obvious overdose," Capt. Lowman said.

About 3 p.m., the driver of a dump truck parked at a CoGo's in the 2400 block of East Carson Street was found unconscious, slumped over the truck's steering wheel.

A store employee, who would not give her name, said paramedics pulled the man from the truck's cab and laid him on a stretcher while attempting to revive him. The man had a pulse but was struggling to breathe and appeared to be completely incoherent, with his arms flapping lifelessly at his sides, the employee said.

It could not be determined whether those incidents were linked to the potent heroin because police were unable to provide a breakdown of where and when the overdoses took place.

Late yesterday afternoon, Allegheny County's crime lab had analyzed one of three samples of heroin residue from stamp bags seized by police and determined that fentanyl was present.

Test results on the blood of the three people who died after apparently using the heroin would likely take until the end of the week, said Dr. Frederick Fochtman, director of the forensic science laboratory division and chief toxicologist of the county medical examiner's office.

"It's so very potent that it only takes a very small amount to have a toxic event," Dr. Fochtman said of fentanyl. "If somebody has this in a powdered form, how are they weighing it? How are they putting it in these packets? All you have to do is make a very little mistake and you have an overdose."

Authorities walk a thin line between the potential good of publicizing information about a heroin-fentanyl mixture and warning users of the danger, and tantalizing hard-core addicts who might seek out the bad dope for a powerful high.

"A hard-core addict, when they're using the heroin, sometimes they're only getting enough to prevent them from going into withdrawal," Dr. Fochtman said. "If they feel there is something out there they can take that will also make them high, they'll seek it out."

Drug Experts Advise Extra Precautions In Heroin Use (PPG)

By Anita Srikameswaran, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, June 6, 2006

The deaths of three heroin users and the emergency treatment of 35 more have prompted an overdose prevention expert to offer this advice: If you're going to use, have someone nearby in case you need help.

Alice Bell, overdose prevention project coordinator at Prevention Point Pittsburgh, the region's only needle exchange program, said there had been talk about drug users in other cities overdosing on a powerful combination of heroin and a narcotic painkiller called fentanyl.

Prevention Point staff had begun to inform its needle exchangers about the potential problem, but until two days ago no one had seen it here.

This could be it, Ms. Bell recalled thinking, when she heard news media reports of an unusually high number of overdoses. It's not yet certain that the fentanyl and heroin combination has arrived on local streets.

"What we know is that there's unusually strong heroin on the streets in various cities, including now in Pittsburgh," she said.

In a June 2 letter, the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services warned public health workers that fentanyl was being added to heroin or cocaine and sold to drug users.

"In just one week, an estimated 33 individuals in the Detroit area are reported to have died after using this fatal mix of drugs," the letter says. "The same drug combination may have been responsible for over 100 deaths in the same region since last September."

Philadelphia, St. Louis and Chicago have all had clusters of drug-related deaths.

Fentanyl amplifies the potency of heroin and cocaine, the HHS letter says. Routine toxicology tests will not detect it.

Dr. Daniel Brooks, chief of the medical toxicology division at UPMC Presbyterian, said that heroin usually contains fillers to make it less potent and more economical for dealers. It's possible that the recent overdoses are the result of street drug that is "cut too rich," as he put it.

Opioids such as heroin and fentanyl can kill because they depress the respiratory and central nervous systems, Dr. Brooks explained. The unconscious user loses protective airway reflexes.

Dr. Brooks was told by an overdose patient yesterday that the heroin he had used came from Philadelphia, cost about the same as it usually did, and he had used half his usual dose. But it still turned out to be too much.

More information needs to be collected to better understand the impact of the fentanyl and heroin combination, said Dr. Sharon Stancliff, medical director for the Harm Reduction Coalition in New York.

A typical heroin overdose takes a couple of hours "because people slowly nod off and essentially forget to breathe," she explained. "I can't tell you if that's what happens with fentanyl."

Doctors use a drug called naloxone, or Narcan, to reverse opioid overdoses. It's not known if more Narcan is needed for a fentanyl overdose, or if the treatment window is briefer, Dr. Stancliff said.

And it may not be obvious when heroin has been laced with fentanyl, Ms. Bell noted. Dealers may not know, or tell the buyer, and a stamp on a bag is not a reliable indicator.

So "it's really important for people to avoid using alone, if at all possible," Ms. Bell said. Also, "it's important for people to know what to do if you're with someone who overdoses, which means learning how to do rescue breathing and getting Narcan."

Since July 2005, Prevention Point's education program has included training in the use of Narcan, and physician volunteers have written about 65 prescriptions for it, Ms. Bell said.

Since then, "we have firsthand reports of 17 overdose reversals from people who have participated in the program," she said.

It's not surprising to Dr. Neil Capretto, medical director of Gateway Rehabilitation Center, that a person who had just been treated for an overdose might be back in the emergency room the next day with the same problem.

After Narcan treatment, "he's going to be sick and going through all these terrible physical withdrawal symptoms," Dr. Capretto said. "And the only way to counteract that is to use."

Ideally, overdose patients could immediately get into long-term, intensive treatment programs, but the demand far exceeds availability, he said.

There are more people using heroin in Western Pennsylvania than ever before, said Dr. Capretto, adding that if he had loved ones who were heroin addicts, he'd keep Narcan on hand.

Heroin Claims 2 More (PTR)

By Jill King Greenwood And Jennifer Bails

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, June 6, 2006

Police across Pennsylvania are working to identify the source of a recent spate of heroin overdoses and warning users about the unusually strong drug laced with the painkiller fentanyl.

DOJ_NMG_0031893

Two people died in Pittsburgh on Monday -- bringing the total fatal overdoses here to three since Sunday. At least 36 people have overdosed in Allegheny County since the drug emerged on the streets on Friday, authorities said.

"This is a very serious, major problem and we're going to be seeing it for a while, until the supply runs out," said Pittsburgh police Cmdr. Thomas Stangrecki. "We're doing all we can to get a handle on it and get it off the street."

U.S. drug czar John Walters said that federal agents, working in cooperation with the Mexican government, closed down a lab in Mexico that might be the main source of the fentanyl that has killed heroin users in Pennsylvania and seven other states.

He warned drug users that millions of deadly doses of fentanyl-laced heroin might still be on the streets.

Police are blaming the concoction for yesterday's deaths, both in Hazelwood. Dorothy Iannone, 56, was found dead inside her Roma Way home. Lynn Margavo, 30, of Greenfield, was found unconscious inside a different Hazelwood home and died at UPMC South Side hospital.

Joseph Zielinski, 45, of Verona, was found dead inside an apartment in Greenfield on Sunday, and police have linked his death to the fentanyl-laced heroin.

The heroin has been sold in stamp bags marked "Get high or die trying" and "Dynasty" and sells for $10 to $20 apiece, Stangrecki said.

While Pittsburgh seems to be the hardest hit, the drug also has surfaced in Bethel Park, West Homestead, West Mifflin, Brentwood and Tarentum, police said.

Pittsburgh police arrested five people -- dealers and users -- and investigators have seen some cases where users overdosed and were revived by paramedics only to overdose again within hours, Stangrecki said.

Pittsburgh EMS Chief Bob McCaughan said he has been talking with state and local health departments and other emergency responders in the region about the heroin crisis.

"This isn't just going to be a Pittsburgh problem," said McCaughan, who is making sure every ambulance has an adequate supply of Narcan, which is used to treat patients who have overdosed.

Five people have been treated at Mercy Hospital, Uptown, for overdoses since the deadly brand began circulating in the area, said spokeswoman Linda Ross.

Allegheny General Hospital in the North Side treated three patients Sunday and yesterday. Another patient was admitted to West Penn Hospital in Bloomfield.

Allegheny General doctors typically see one heroin-overdose patient a day during the summer, said Dr. Fred Harchelroad, chairman of the hospital's emergency medicine department.

"What happens with these people is someone will find them at home or in the street after they've been shot up," he said.

The deadlier heroin now on Pittsburgh's streets poses a risk for both recreational users and junkies, Harchelroad said.

"It's certainly a concern anytime this happens, and people are using a street drug where they don't know what the dosage is or what the concentration is," he said. "Not everyone uses heroin on a daily basis. They can end up killing themselves when they were just trying to get a little bit of a buzz."

Drug rehabilitation programs are trying to warn their patients, but heroin dependency is complicated and drug addicts don't always think rationally, said Rich Takacs, of Mercy Behavioral Health, which provides mental health services to about 500 substance abuse patients each year.

"Even though we have evidence that this is killing people in large proportions, that is not going to be enough for people just to walk away from it," Takacs said. "I wish it were as simple as telling someone they need to stop."

Pat Valentine, deputy director of the Allegheny County Office of Behavioral Health, said the county is relying on community-based substance abuse and addiction agencies to spread the message about the dangerous heroin to those at-risk.

Stangrecki said law enforcement can only do so much.

"The warnings are out there, but if they have a problem and they're determined to get this stuff, they'll do it regardless of whether they know it could kill them," he said.

Law enforcement officials in Fayette and Westmoreland counties reported no heroin-related deaths over the weekend, although police in Latrobe have found two stamp bags.

"We know it's in the area, but we're not sure to what extent," said Latrobe police Chief Chuck Huska.

DOJ_NMG_0031894

Heroin has been a problem in Westmoreland County this year. There have been 10 drug overdose fatalities and six were linked to heroin, according to the county coroner's office.

Overdoses and deaths related to heroin laced with fentanyl have spiked across the country.

Federal agents and the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention are reviewing more than 100 fentanyl-related deaths in Detroit since the fall, and 15 people were hospitalized in Chicago last month after using the drug. In Missouri, more than six people have died from overdoses in St. Louis in the past three weeks.

The CDC estimates more than 200 heroin users have died because of fentanyl across the country in the past few months. The synthetic painkiller has tainted the heroin supply in Pennsylvania, Illinois, Michigan, Ohio, Maryland, Delaware and New Jersey, authorities said.

This isn't the first time the Pittsburgh area has seen an outbreak of overdoses and deaths due to tainted heroin. Eighteen people died in 1988 when "China White" -- heroin laced with 3-methyl fentanyl -- surfaced in Western Pennsylvania.

In 1999, high-quality heroin labeled "Red Demon" began appearing in Pittsburgh and was blamed for two deaths in Westmoreland County.

6 More Die From Likely Overdoses (FREEP)

By Gina Damron, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, June 5, 2006

Unknown yet if fentanyl involved

Six people died from probable drug overdoses between Friday and Sunday morning, bringing the total number of likely drug-related deaths to 54 since May 18, Wayne County health officials said Sunday.

But it will take weeks to determine whether the recent deaths were related to a dangerous mix of the painkiller fentanyl and heroin or cocaine, said Teresa Blossom, a Wayne County Health Department spokeswoman.

She said that between January and April there were more than 70 deaths caused by the concoction. But toxicology results on drug-related deaths in May and June are pending.

The county issued a warning May 19 because 12 people died in a 24-hour span, likely from the deadly mix.

Blossom said there are two or three drug-related deaths in the county on any given day.

Officials at the Wayne County Medical Examiner's Office could not be reached for comment Sunday.

John Roach, a spokesman for the Wayne County Sheriff's Office, said the department has received several tips about the local source of the drugs but wouldn't release information about the investigation.

Detroit's Deadly Epidemic (TOLB)

Toledo Blade (OH), June 5, 2006

An epidemic is sweeping the Detroit-Wayne County area, and it has claimed the lives of about 50 people in the last couple weeks. Last month, 12 people were killed in one 24-hour period, and two died Wednesday. More have died in Chicago and Philadelphia.

But it's not a virus that's killing so many. It's tainted drugs, a suspected blend of the painkiller fentanyl - likely made in illegal laboratories -with heroin or cocaine.

A task force has been created to investigate the deaths. Known as the Detroit-Wayne County Fentanyl Work Group, it is looking into where the drugs come from and how they are getting to Michigan. The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention are helping, and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration is pursuing leads.

Given the number of confirmed overdoses - 130 in Wayne County from January, 2005, through April - the slow response is troubling.

While tracking down leads can be time-consuming and require significant manpower, particularly when labs producing these drugs may be outside the metro Detroit area, perhaps even overseas, surely more could have been done when the death toll is at such dramatic levels.

We can only imagine what the scenario would have been had the deaths been among a different demographic, perhaps in a different place. Say, 50 martini drinkers in Oakland County in the last two weeks.

That said, it is good to see that a multi-agency response is in place. While the number of deaths attributed to the tainted drugs does not approach that of homicides in Detroit - that number had risen above 100 after the first quarter this year - the fentanyl-related deaths are a public health crisis in the making.

Drug abusers share the blame, of course, and must bear a large part of the responsibility for their own fate. They understand the risks inherent in taking illegal drugs, including the obvious perils of infected needles, of uncertain purity of the drugs, and of overdosing.

But whether they deliberately sought a high delivered by a drug cocktail containing a painkiller 80 times stronger than morphine, or were unaware of the deadly mixture, they didn't deserve to die.

It's a mystery why anyone in Wayne County would risk taking an illegal drug under the present circumstances. How could they not know so many others have died? Warning flyers have been issued, so the word must be on the streets of Detroit that these drugs kill. Was their craving for the high so great that they would spin the cylinder in a terrible Russian roulette?

And what kind of people would illegally manufacture the fentanyl, knowing that when mixed with other, illegal drugs such as heroin or cocaine it would kill?

They are mass murderers and they must be hunted down and punished as such.

Colombia Says Soldiers Killed Antidrug Police (BOS)

By Indira A.r. Lakshmanan, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, June 6, 2006

Authorities probe colonel for link to major trafficker

BOGOTÁ -- Suspicions that a Colombian military unit assassinated a US-trained, elite antinarcotics team at the bidding of the drug mafia two weeks ago have proven true, officials say, in a case that has badly shaken public confidence in the military.

On May 22, 10 of the country's most successful antidrug police were killed by a military platoon in the outskirts of Jamundí, an area under the influence of narco-traffickers 195 miles southwest of the capital, near Cali.

Two military officers and six soldiers were arrested Thursday on the basis of incriminating cellphone text messages and crime-scene evidence that investigators say prove the eight men planned the killings. The suspects insist the shootings were a ``friendly fire" mistake.

``This was not a mistake, this was a crime; this was a deliberate decision, a criminal decision," Attorney General Mario Iguarán said last week . ``They were doing the bidding of a drug trafficker."

Authorities are investigating bank accounts allegedly containing $44,000 belonging to Army Colonel Bayron Carvajal, the most senior officer arrested, as well as his alleged links to Omar García Varela, according to Colombian newspaper El Tiempo. Varela is accused of being right-hand man of drug boss Diego Montoya, one of the United States' 10 most-wanted narco-traffickers, who is believed to control properties and drug laboratories near the site of fatal attack. The United States has offered $5 million for information leading to Montoya's capture.

Questions remain in the Jamundí case about the extent of alleged collusion with drug traffickers within the armed forces, and how high up it may go. The arrests came days after the US State Department certified Colombia's human rights record, ensuring the flow of most US military aid to this country. Last year, Congress withheld some military assistance on worries that the Colombian government, which has waged a nearly decade-long campaign against drug corruption, was ignoring extrajudicial killings or cooperation between the military and right-wing death squads.

The Jamundí case has sparked a national outcry that has reached up to President Álvaro Uribe, but Uribe on Friday said he was not ready to oust generals to hold them responsible for the killings. The best way to restore military credibility, he said, would be to clarify events and impose sanctions on the guilty.

Among the most damning evidence against the arrested soldiers are text messages allegedly sent by Carvajal on the day of the killing to the lieutenant and sergeant in charge of the platoon.

``Pull back the ambush. . . . Everything is set for tonight," read one message leaked by authorities to El Tiempo and the newsmagazine Semana.

That afternoon, Carvajal sent another message, the media reported: ``Get ready for the group to come with the chicken so you can get it."

``Chicken" was the nickname of civilian informant Luis Eduardo Betancur, who was leading police to a suspected 440-pound stash of cocaine. Betancur was also a registered informant of Carvajal, authorities say. He was found shot in the neck, with his balaclava removed, investigators say.

Eight of the 10 police killed were shot in the back, and ``the crime scene was contaminated before investigators arrived," said an investigative official yesterday who spoke on condition of anonymity. Investigators suspect soldiers may have fired shots from the police officers' weapons after they died, in an effort to make it look like there was a confrontation, El Tiempo reported.

Fewer than half of the soldiers in the 28-man platoon fired at the police. Witnesses interviewed by telephone from Jamundí say the police identified themselves during the attack and begged the soldiers not to shoot.

More than half of the shots fired originated from a military sniper who was hidden from view, said an investigative official.

When colleagues of the slain police arrived at the scene to investigate, another text message allegedly demanded to know why they had been allowed to pass a military roadblock.

The police unit had been trained by the Drug Enforcement Administration and was responsible for more than 200 arrests of drug traffickers, including 23 wanted for extradition to the United States.

6 Officers Put On Leave In Probe Of Inmates' Escape (WP)

By Petula Dvorak

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

The D.C. Department of Corrections yesterday put six officers on paid administrative leave while authorities investigate events leading to the escape of two inmates.

Devon Brown, the department's director, said investigators want to determine if any of the officers deliberately aided in the escape or unintentionally made mistakes that contributed to the breakout. He would not identify the officers.

Ricardo Jones and Joseph Leaks broke into the warden's empty office shortly after 10 a.m. Saturday, smashed through a reinforced glass window and slid down a canopy to freedom, officials said. Both were captured Sunday, one in Maryland and the other in Virginia.

Their escape -- from the bureaucratic errors that gave Leaks enough freedom on a work detail to execute the escape to the warning system that failed to properly notify the neighborhood of the breach -- "was a major breakdown," Brown said yesterday.

The U.S. attorney's office and D.C. police are heading the criminal investigation. The Department of Corrections is conducting an internal investigation, and Brown cited several areas of special interest.

Leaks, 32, and Jones, 25, were jailed on charges stemming from the July 6 killing of David Valentine in Northeast Washington. Brown said they should have been separated while in custody, but, he added, they apparently got together to plan the escape.

Brown said Leaks was given too much freedom in his work detail, which allowed him to roam more freely while painting the hallway near the warden's office. Because Leaks was being held in connection with a violent crime -- as an accessory after the fact to Valentine's killing -- he should not have been given such a work detail, Brown said. Also, Leaks was charged in 1993 with a prison breach. Although that charge was dismissed, Brown said it should have been considered in granting him a work detail.

Leaks, of Northeast Washington, was also awaiting trial on nine counts of assault with a dangerous weapon and other charges. Jones, of Hyattsville, was jailed pending trial on a first-degree murder charge in Valentine's death.

Corrections officials have yet to determine how Leaks and Jones met up Saturday after Leaks slipped away from his work detail. The supervisor of that work detail is among those who were put on leave.

At some point, one or both of the inmates broke into the warden's office. There were signs of forced entry on the door.

After smashing a window with office furniture, they slid down a canopy and ran. Both were wearing dark blue jumpsuits, not the bright orange attire inmates wear. The blue jumpsuits are for prisoners about to be released, and Brown said investigators are unsure how they got them.

Brown said he checked several times with jail officials to make sure that they sounded the air raid-like siren that is supposed to notify people living near the jail in Southeast Washington of an escape. Although several officials assured him that the alarm was sounded, no one could say they heard it.

Many neighbors, even those who live across the street from the jail, said they did not hear a siren. Brown said he is investigating what happened to the alarm and whether it needs repair.

He also said that neither he nor other corrections officials were aware that thousands of neighbors in Ward 6 are part of a text alert system that coordinates with the D.C. Emergency Management Agency to notify residents of any emergency, such as a jailbreak.

D.C. Council member Phil Mendelson (D-At Large) said he will hold a meeting June 14 in the neighborhood to discuss the incident.

Leaks and Jones were captured by a task force led by the U.S. Marshals Service. Leaks was caught first, early Sunday, in a Fairfax County motel. Jones was captured about 11:30 p.m. Sunday after Prince George's County got a tip that he was hiding in a garage or shed in Seat Pleasant. Authorities found him in a shed in the 500 block of 71st Street, police said.

Both planned to make their way to Greensboro, N.C., said Tom Hession, chief inspector for the Marshals Service. Both men are wanted there in connection with the shooting of a security guard, according to court records.

Six Officers On Leave During Probe Of Jailbreak (WT)

By Jim McElhatton And Amy Doolittle

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

Six D.C. correctional officers have been put on leave as the U.S. Attorney's Office leads a criminal probe into the escape of two D.C. Jail inmates over the weekend, authorities said yesterday.

Inmates Joseph Leaks and Ricardo Jones were caught in separate locations in Maryland and Virginia Sunday after they broke into the warden's office and fled through a window Saturday.

D.C. Department of Corrections Director Devon Brown said yesterday that authorities are investigating "quite vigorously" the question of whether the two inmates had help in the escape.

"Everyone who may have had some knowledge of how this took place, whether it be staff or inmate, will be investigated," Mr. Brown said. "There was a major breakdown."

Leaks, 32, of Northeast, and Jones, 25, of Hyattsville, are charged in the July 6 fatal shooting of David Valentine in the District. As co-defendants awaiting trial in the same case, Mr. Brown acknowledged that the inmates should not have been allowed to have contact with each other.

Leaks had been assigned to a painting detail in the jail, which also should not have been permitted because of his criminal history, Mr. Brown said. It was not clear how Jones, who was not on the work detail, paired up with Leaks before the escape.

"It should not have happened, and we accept that," Mr. Brown said.

Thomas Hession, chief inspector for the Capital Area Regional Fugitive Task Force, which is led by U.S. Marshals Service, said a tip to the Prince George's County Police Department led authorities to catch Jones in the backyard shed of a home in Seat Pleasant late Sunday night. Leaks was caught early Sunday at a motel in Alexandria.

Detective Michael Reese, of the Metropolitan Police Department, said the U.S. Attorney's Office is leading a criminal investigation into the escape. The probe also is being conducted by city police and the U.S. Marshals Service.

Mr. Brown would not identify the six correctional officers whom he said were placed on administrative leave pending the investigation. One of the officers oversaw the work detail in which Leaks was involved.

Mr. Brown said authorities also are investigating whether a siren system designed to alert the surrounding community of a jailbreak was working properly.

D.C. Council member Phil Mendelson, at-large Democrat, said yesterday that he plans to investigate the siren system through a series of hearings.

"It will be an opportunity for the public to get a full explanation," he said. "We want to look at what procedures were not in place, what went wrong and what's being done to fix the situation. I'm sure we'll also be looking at community notification. When someone escapes into the neighborhood, the neighborhood needs to be alerted. The Department of Corrections said they sent out the alarm, and the community said they got nothing."

Mr. Mendelson, who is chairman of the council's Committee on the Judiciary, said the hearings also will investigate how the escape occurred.

"The escape is very troubling," he said. "The jail is a secure facility -- we don't put people there so they can escape."

The hearings have not been scheduled, Mr. Mendelson said.

Questions Raised About Crime Task Force's Success (SCRIPPS)

By Michael Doyle, McClatchy Newspapers

Scripps Howard/McClathcy, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Federal reinforcements in Fresno, Calif., have helped local police lock up bad guys, but now investigators are questioning how well one of the law enforcement programs really works.

In a high-profile blitz last year, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives deployed extra troops to Fresno and some other selected cities. Welcomed by local officers and politicians alike, the Violent Crime Impact Team targeted gangs and gun-related crimes.

Since starting last June, the Fresno-based team of eight federal agents, two prosecutors and one deputy U.S. marshal have won kudos from their local colleagues.

"It has been successful," bureau spokeswoman Nina Delgadillo said Monday, noting that "we have firearms that we've been able to take off of the streets."

A 1 p.m. news conference at Fresno's federal courthouse on Thursday will give officials a chance to elaborate on their success stories.

The federal agents, though, also confront a perennial problem in public policy: How can they prove they're making a difference? On that, the jury may still be out.

In a new report, Justice Department investigators caution they can't be sure exactly how much credit the various Violent Crime Impact Teams deserve. There are 20 such teams nationwide, initiated as a pilot program now costing a total of $20 million this year.

"ATF cannot conclusively show that the law enforcement operations it undertook during the ... pilot project were effective at reducing firearms crime in the target areas," the Office of Inspector General investigators cautioned.

The Washington-based investigators, moreover, hinted at broader shortcomings. Successes may be exaggerated, teamwork hindered and goals missed. The Violent Crime Impact Team concept itself, investigators suggest, may simply be a new brand name for an old product.

(One) special agent stated, 'really the only change is geography, but essentially I'm doing the same thing,'" the Office of Inspector General investigators reported. "One assistant special agent in charge told us, 'This is what we were (already) doing before VCIT.'"

The special teams are supposed to target the worst offenders in violent neighborhoods. Federal prosecutors get a crack at suspects, drawing longer prison sentences. Investigators are supposed to work closely with local officers, and use the latest in crime-fighting technology.

In February, for instance, the Fresno team was credited with the arrests of five suspected gang members accused of drug-dealing and illegal firearms activities.

"Any time you can add resources in town, it's always a good thing," said Jeff Cardinale, public information officer for the Fresno Police Department.

Cardinale said local officials are still compiling statistics to demonstrate progress, which will be made available Thursday.

The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives declared the special teams an overall success in January, citing a decline in homicides in the targeted cities over a six-month period.

In theory, the teams are supposed to focus on criminals dubbed the worst of the worst. Between June 2004 and May 2005, the various teams reported making 3,592 arrests nationwide. However, only 746 _ about 20 percent _ were targeted individuals.

"We could not determine whether these 746 targeted individuals were the 'worst of the worst' violent offender in the target areas," Justice Department investigators noted.

Some teams didn't even identify who the "worst of the worst" were for fear of being accused of racial profiling, the new report notes.

In some cases, supposed success stories fell apart under closer examination.

ATF officials, for instance, touted an impressive-sounding 50 percent decline in homicides committed with firearms in a targeted neighborhood of Albuquerque. The grand total did fall _ from four to two.

The overall program itself was dismissed by some special agents as putting old wine into new bottles.

"One special agent stated, 'As far as I know, they just gave (Project Safe Neighborhoods) a new name,' " the investigators noted.

In its official response, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives acknowledged that it "(may) be true that a direct causal relationship between ATF programs and reductions in crime can never be established." Officials stressed, though, that their agency is an "integral player" in overall Justice Department crime-fighting efforts.

"It is clear that ATF has played its part and has contributed to a safer America," the agency stated.

Agency officials further suggested the 108-page review itself was premature, with Delgadillo saying, "it's putting the cart before the horse" to evaluate a pilot program. Still, the agency substantively agreed with all of the recommendations made.

Investigators said other federal personnel assigned to the teams _ from the U.S. Marshals Service or Drug Enforcement Administration _ were found to be "often unaware of their expected roles and did not always receive clear direction" about their work.

Bush Selects U.S. Marshal For Nevada (AP)

AP, June 6, 2006

LAS VEGAS (AP) -- A former state gambling regulator has been named U.S. marshal covering Nevada.

Gary Orton is due to be sworn in June 16 as U.S. Marshal for the District of Nevada after being selected by President Bush.

Orton spent 26 years as an enforcement officer and deputy chief of the Nevada state Gaming Control Board. He previously spent eight years as a North Las Vegas police officer, and served in the United States Army from 1969 to 1972.

As U.S. marshal for Nevada, Orton will oversee security at U.S. District courts in Reno and Las Vegas and the protection of 23 federal judges, direct fugitive apprehension and federal prisoner custody and transport, and oversee federal witness security.

The marshals service also administers a Justice Department asset forfeitures program.

The Nevada office has been directed since January 2002 by Fidencio Rivera, who was made acting United States marshal and chief deputy U.S. marshal for Nevada.

Defendant Pleads Guilty, Will Testify (WP)

By Ruben Castaneda

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

One of the two remaining defendants in an arson case that strained race relations in Southern Maryland admitted his guilt in federal court yesterday and agreed to testify for the government against the sole man still charged.

Michael M. Everhart, 21, entered his plea as part of an agreement to testify against Roy T. McCann, 23, the only one of five defendants in the case who has not pleaded guilty or been convicted. Everhart entered his plea during an hour-long hearing before U.S. District Judge Roger W. Titus in federal court in Greenbelt.

Everhart and McCann were tried in March in the arson fires that devastated a subdivision under construction in Charles County in the early morning of Dec. 6, 2004. The trial ended with a hung jury March 16, and Titus declared a mistrial.

Everhart, who was charged with 36 separate counts -- one count of arson and 35 counts of conspiracy -- pleaded guilty yesterday to one count of conspiracy to commit arson. His guilty plea and testimony could significantly bolster the government's case against McCann.

DOJ_NMG_0031900

According to a statement of facts that was part of Everhart's plea bargain, Everhart joined McCann, Aaron L. Speed, Jeremy D. Parady and Patrick S. Walsh in splashing flammable materials in the entranceways of the houses they targeted. They set the fires using flares, matches, lighters and propane torches, according to the statement.

Titus set Everhart's sentencing for Sept. 8.

In the March trial, federal prosecutors relied heavily on the testimony of Parady, 21, a former firefighter trainee. Parady had pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy and had admitted to driving a vehicle from house to house to help set the fires.

In their closing arguments, defense attorneys attacked Parady's credibility, pointing out that he was an admitted perjurer and arguing that he testified in exchange for a lighter sentence.

McCann's attorney, Joshua R. Treem, declined to comment on Everhart's plea agreement. McCann is scheduled to go to trial in June 2007.

By pleading guilty, Everhart could receive a sentence of three years to nearly four years in prison under complex federal sentencing guidelines. If he had gone to trial and been convicted, he could have been sentenced to nine years in prison. That term could have been increased to about 12 years if the judge determined there was evidence that Everhart had engaged in a hate crime. (None of the defendants has been charged with a hate crime or had his sentence increased for that reason.)

The fires destroyed 12 new, unoccupied houses and damaged 15 others, causing an estimated $3.2 million in damage. Many of the owners of the new houses are black, and the five men charged with setting the fires are white.

At the December sentencing of Walsh, 21, a former amusement park worker identified as the arsonists' ringleader, Titus said the fires caused "incalculable damage" to race relations in the community. Walsh was convicted by a federal jury in Baltimore of 35 counts of arson and one count of conspiracy. He was sentenced to nearly 20 years in prison.

Speed, 22, a security guard at the Hunters Brooke subdivision where the fires were set, pleaded guilty to one count of conspiracy and was sentenced to more than eight years in prison.

Everhart has been free, under the supervision of his parents, as he awaited his retrial. Yesterday, his attorney, William C. Brennan, told Titus that Everhart wanted to turn himself in to begin serving his sentence July 17. Titus agreed to allow the surrender.

In For Life? Not Him (LAT)

By Richard A. Serrano, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 6, 2006

Prisons can't seem to keep Richard McNair confined. After his third escape, the convicted murderer is still at large, leaving tantalizing clues.

POLLOCK, La. — Richard Lee McNair's job in the prison factory was mending U.S. mailbags. Thousands of the leather pouches were routinely delivered to the shop at the federal maximum-security penitentiary here, and the middle-aged convict worked quietly each day, helping to stitch them back up.

Once the bags were refurbished, they were stacked on pallets, hundreds in a pile. McNair watched for four months as forklifts scooped up the pallets and hauled them to a warehouse just outside the prison walls.

One morning they carried off McNair — hidden under the bags.

And he was free again.

Twice before, in nearly two decades in custody, McNair has tasted freedom. Once he spread lip balm on his wrist, and slipped out of handcuffs. Another time he crawled to freedom through an air vent. Two other times his breakout attempts were foiled.

His latest escape was the first from a federal maximum security prison in 13 years. McNair, a confessed murderer, had just been moved to Pollock from the Supermax prison in Florence, Colo. — the nation's most secure lockup.

The government concedes it should have known he would again try to escape.

Since his April 5 run, he has crisscrossed the United States and Canada. He has left behind intriguing clues, almost as if daring the police and federal marshals to find him.

"Oh, he's taunting us, all right," said an exasperated Vern Erck, the North Dakota lawman who first arrested him.

Soon after sneaking out of the off-site warehouse, when the prison was already in an uproar trying to find him, McNair smooth-talked his way past a police officer even though he had no ID and was running away from the prison.

Several weeks later, he jumped from a stolen car and ran off after the Royal Canadian Mounted Police pulled him over in Penticton, Canada, just north of Washington state. Inside was a digital camera full of photos he had taken of himself, along with a travelogue of scenic sites he had visited.

He was caught on video late in April at a honky-tonk called Coyote Ugly in San Antonio, sipping a beer on the bar's back patio. And he mailed, or had someone else mail, a letter to his mother in Duncan, Okla. It was postmarked Corpus Christi, Texas.

When he is caught, if he is caught, McNair is unlikely to go quietly. He was serving two life sentences — for shooting one man from behind and killing another at point-blank range during a 1987 burglary.

"He has murdered in the past," warned Deputy U.S. Marshal Richard Sansone Jr., who is based in Louisiana and is helping coordinate the manhunt. "He will do most anything he can to stay out."

What makes McNair, 47, tougher to catch and all the more dangerous is that he once worked in law enforcement. He is a stickler for detail and so methodical he used the Freedom of Information Act to obtain the FBI records on his last escape so he could study how they tracked him down.

Before hiding under the pile of mailbags and being forklifted to freedom, he swore to his cellmates: "I won't make the same mistakes next time." His wanted poster, plastered on the Internet, shows him with brown hair and blue eyes, 6 feet tall and 210 pounds. That is how he looked when he came to Pollock in December, after five years at Supermax, where many of the nation's most hardened criminals are held, locked in their cells for 23 hours a day.

No one has escaped from Supermax. The last escape from any federal maximum security prison was in August 1993, when Rick Lee Archer and Gene Michael Diulio vanished from the penitentiary in Lompoc, Calif., only to be apprehended four months later in Las Vegas. Richard Thomas, McNair's 73-year-old defense attorney, has represented numerous defendants in his long legal career. But none, he said, were as determined as McNair that he would not spend his life in prison.

"He used to send me Christmas cards every year," Thomas said. "He hoped everything was fine. He was eternally optimistic."

The county prosecutor in Minot, N.D., John Van Grinsven, notes that McNair would be eligible for parole just about now had he stayed in prison.

"If you were to meet him, you'd probably like him," the prosecutor said. "But there is a dark side."

McNair grew up the son of a jewelry store manager in Oklahoma. He joined the Air Force, was promoted to sergeant and was stationed at Minot. He worked as a military policeman and later, as his service was ending, assisted as a volunteer undercover officer with the local drug task force.

He also developed a compulsion for stealing things. Carpets. Electronics. An air compressor. He rented a storage locker and filled it up.

Police are divided over what to make of him; some call him a sociopath, others a thrill-seeker, still others see him as someone intent on proving that he is smarter than all of them.

"I think his ulterior motive was to get in with law enforcement to understand how we worked," said Van Grinsven, who was on the drug task force with McNair. "At one point, he stole a police radio and when he would go out on burglaries he'd listen in."

On a November night in 1987, when McNair was 28, he was bent over the safe at the Farmer's Union Grain Elevator when the manager, Richard Kitzman, unexpectedly showed up to assist a trucker with a late load.

McNair shot Kitzman three times from behind and left him for dead.

"I thought I was a goner, you betcha," Kitzman said, still bewildered that McNair would shoot someone who couldn't identify him.

McNair did not want to leave the trucker as a possible witness. So he reloaded the five-shot revolver, hurried outside, leaped onto the truck's running board, stuck the gun in Jerome Theis' face and emptied it.

Then McNair ran.

His undoing came when he ran behind on his rental payments at the storage locker. The owner opened it and found it full of loot, including spent shells from the grain elevator shootings.

DOJ_NMG_0031902

McNair was arrested the next morning when he showed up at the offices of the drug task force.

Police handcuffed his wrist to a chair and stepped away to confer. McNair slid open a desk drawer and reached for the lip balm. After working his wrist free, he knocked down two officers and bolted past a receptionist.

He stole a car and was chased to the tallest home in Minot. He burst through the door, ran up the three flights and climbed out onto the roof. Realizing he was cornered, he shouted, "I'm not going to jail" and leaped into a tree. But the branch broke and McNair fell, practically into the arms of the police.

Awaiting trial in 1988 in the county jail in Minot, he apparently was already scheming. Somehow he hustled up a small hammer and flashlight and began loosening two cinderblocks in his cell.

When he was spotted, he was moved to tighter quarters.

"I knew right then he was pretty clever," said Erck, who is now the Ward County sheriff in Minot. "He enjoys the game."

McNair pleaded guilty to the shootings.

"He didn't have any defense," said Thomas, his lawyer. "He had given exhaustive statements to the cops about the killing. He confessed it all. And he was colder than a mackerel. He showed absolutely no remorse."

He got two life sentences and, in 1988, was dispatched to the state's maximum-security prison in Bismarck.

Three years later, McNair was about to bust out again.

He had removed many of the security fixtures from inside a prison air vent that led to the outside. He had only a few left to make it all the way out and had already stashed a jacket, a pair of glasses, food and a word-processing diskette to help in his getaway.

Another inmate snitched on him.

McNair told prison officials he had planned to head east, maybe to New York, "because it would be easy to live undetected in a large city." He also told them he did not care if a tower guard shot him, saying that, if he was spotted running, he wished to die.

A year later, he pulled off the escape — crawling through another ventilation chute with two other inmates. His accomplices were found in fairly short order. It took about 10 months to find McNair.

He stole cars. He dyed his hair blond.

Finally, in July 1993, he was caught trying to burglarize a Grand Island, Neb., car dealership. He was captured with a stolen Chevy van and was armed with a stun gun and police scanner.

With each escape and each attempt, McNair got more prison time. He eventually was transferred by North Dakota Prison Warden Tim Schuetzle under a prisoner-exchange program to a top-security facility in Oak Park Heights, Minn., that is largely underground.

Authorities thought that would be good for safe-keeping.

But McNair organized prisoner strikes and by 2001 Minnesota had had enough. So Schuetzle, under another prisoner exchange, traded him to the federal government. With his record of unruliness and escapes, federal officials sent him to Supermax.

"That's where I thought he was all this time," Schuetzle said. "Until I got the call from Pollock."

Because McNair was well-behaved in Supermax, he was transferred to Pollock, one of the newest federal prisons, in September and, in December, was assigned to the prison shop repairing postal bags. "He seemed very low key," said Jane Haschemeyer, an administrator in the warden's office. "He hadn't had any disciplinary reports. There hadn't been any issues with him at all."

Pollock also had a good record: no escapes since it opened five years ago. Asked about that now, Haschemeyer said, "Well, we're just hoping he can be captured soon."

Somewhere between the prison shop and the outside warehouse, McNair swapped his work khakis for the white T-shirt and white shorts allowed in his cell.

As Haschemeyer put it, "he wormed his way out of the pallet and made his run for it."

Alerted to the dragnet, Carl Bordelon, a police officer in Ball, La., stopped a man running along some railroad tracks about a dozen miles from the prison.

DOJ_NMG_0031903

Bordelon's brief encounter with McNair was recorded by the video camera on the dash of his patrol car.

"Do you have any form of ID on you?" Bordelon asked.

"No."

"What's your name?"

"Robert Jones. I'm not supposed to be out on the tracks?"

"What's your address?"

"I don't have an address." McNair said. "I'm at a hotel. We're working on houses and stuff like that. Roofs."

McNair shifted his feet. He giggled. He explained he was just out jogging.

Bordelon told McNair there was an escapee on the loose.

"There's a prison here?" McNair laughed.

The officer called in McNair's description and was told about the photo issued of the escapee. "You know the bad thing about it?" the officer said to McNair. "You're matching up to it."

"That sucks," said McNair, tossing in a few more laughs.

To deflect suspicion he described a nearby Wal-Mart, the building behind it and the state highway that passes through. He said he was an Army veteran, his father a reserve cop. He said he grew up in Dallas.

"I promise you, I'm not no damn prison escapee," he said. "Nope. Nope. Nope."

True, the officer agreed, "you'd-a run by now."

They laughed and shook hands.

"Be careful, buddy," the officer said.

And off McNair went.

IMMIGRATION:

More Migrants Apprehended Along Border (USAT)

By Judy Keen

USA Today, June 6, 2006

CHICAGO — The Border Patrol says apprehensions of illegal immigrants along the Mexican border are up nearly 4% so far this year because of increased enforcement.

But advocacy groups say greater numbers are crossing the border because they are confused about conflicting legislation passed by Congress and hope to qualify for legal status.

“More people are coming because they believe they'll get a crack at legalization,” says Jessica Aranda of the Latino Union of Chicago. Chicago has one of the USA's largest Mexican immigrant communities.

There is no official data on the flow of illegal immigrants. Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar said Monday there has been no surge in the number of illegal crossings since President Bush announced in May that 6,000 National Guard troops would be sent to the border. Aguilar expects a decrease as more agents and Guard members are deployed.

Border Patrol spokesman Richard Rojas says apprehensions at the southern border are up this year to 826,109, from 795,218 at this point in 2005. “We're enforcing more; therefore, we're apprehending more,” he says.

Daniel Martinez, immigration program director at Catholic Charities in Laredo, Texas, says some immigrants believe crossing is easier now than it will be when National Guard troops arrive.

Other immigrants believe “maybe they can qualify” for a “guest worker” program or citizenship if they enter the USA soon, Martinez says.

Sheriff Omar Lucio in Cameron County, Texas, says his department is getting more reports of illegal immigrants abandoned in trucks or jammed into apartments.

A House bill passed in December would make illegal immigration a felony and boost enforcement. The Senate version, passed May 25, calls for a guest-worker program proposed by Bush and giving illegal immigrants here since Jan. 7, 2004, a chance to become citizens. Both chambers will negotiate compromise legislation.

Groups say confusion over the bills means some illegal immigrants are being ripped off. Some pay $500-$1,000 to people claiming to be lawyers who promise to expedite applications for a guest-worker program that was passed by the Senate but not the House. Applications don't exist.

"The fake lawyers disappear with the money," says Ana Maria Achila of the Latin American Integration Center in New York City. "There is definitely confusion. We're seeing a lot of people asking where they sign up."

Advocacy groups and Spanish-language media are trying to educate immigrants. Meetings were being held here Monday and today to tell immigrants that they can't apply for guest-worker status. In Alamosa, Colo., a community meeting Sunday explained that no bill has become law.

People who work with immigrants say the uncertainty and a legal crackdown are roiling communities:

•Tougher border enforcement is prompting some illegal immigrants to use crossings that are "more isolated, desolate and dangerous," says Jennifer Allen of Border Action Network, a human-rights group in Tucson.

•Workplace raids that became more frequent recently made some illegal immigrants afraid to leave home, says Mariano Espinoza of the Minnesota Immigrant Freedom Network in St. Paul: "They want to work, but they don't know if the next time they will be detained."

•"I see more fear than anything, because people just don't know what's going on," says Flora Archuleta of the San Luis Valley Immigrant Resource Center in Alamosa.

"There is fear, there is confusion," says Catherine Salgado of the Illinois Coalition for Immigrant and Refugee Rights. But the possibility of a new path to citizenship means "there is hope, too."

An Increasingly Deadly Trail (WP)

By John Pomfret

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

COVERED WELLS, Ariz. -- It was early on a May morning, still dark, when Border Patrol agent Dan McClafferty first smelled death, its rich odor piercing the desert bouquet of sage, salt cedar and creosote. Following the beam of his flashlight, McClafferty looked under the thorny branches of a paloverde tree and found what he was looking for.

The body of the 3-year-old boy lay still, covered with a jacket and his arms crossed over his chest. His mother, found wandering along a desert highway hours earlier, had carried him there as she had tried to cross into the United States illegally.

The sad discovery was not unique. Since 1993, when the Clinton administration began a crackdown on border crossings in San Diego and El Paso, more than 3,500 people have died trying to cross into the United States through desert. And, as officials work to put more patrols and fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border, immigrant advocates fear there will be more deaths among the tens of thousands who attempt the trip.

Most of the deaths so far -- 959 since Oct. 1, 2001, according to local government statistics and the Mexican government -- have been in Arizona, where the landscape comprises mountains, ranches, Indian reservations, military proving grounds and endless miles of cactus-filled desert. The boy, who was found on May 16 and whose name could not be ascertained from U.S. or Mexican officials, was one of the latest additions to the list.

Border Patrol statistics show that while the death toll mounts annually, the number of those apprehended while crossing the border has not changed significantly since 1993. But because federal agencies have tightened the border in urban areas, smugglers who move the men, women and children seeking to enter the United States illegally have funneled them onto increasingly perilous trails where temperatures are high, water is scarce and danger is abundant.

"All the evidence is that increased enforcement on the border has achieved no benefit at all except in additional employment of Border Patrol agents," said John Fife, a Tucson pastor and founder of No More Deaths, a coalition of charities devoted to stopping deaths during desert border crossings. "What has changed is the devastating elements of this policy. You have a number of deaths that surpasses the number of American deaths in Iraq. And yet still we are determined to persist and redouble our efforts."

The other view is that a tipping point could be reached if the flow of agents and materiel to the border continues to increase. Since 1993, the Border Patrol has tripled in size and President Bush has pledged to add 6,000 more agents. He also has ordered the National Guard, which began deploying to the border Monday, to help build new fencing and other protections. "America has the best technology in the world, and we will ensure that the Border Patrol has the technology they need to do their job and secure our border," Bush said May 15 in a nationally televised speech.

Even as the president was speaking, McClafferty was searching the Arizona desert.A Toxic Mix

The 3-year-old's mother's name was Edith Rodreguez. She and her son crossed into the United States from Sasabe, Mexico, on May 11, said a spokesman for the Mexican consulate in Tucson. A native of the Mexican state of Veracruz, a major source for illegal immigration, the 25-year-old woman was traveling in a group of eight to 10 people, herded north by a smuggler, called a coyote.

To keep the group moving fast, the coyote handed out a Mexican over-the-counter drug called Sedalmerk, consulate spokesman Alejandro Ramos Cardoso said after Mexican officials interviewed Rodreguez. Sedalmerk is a combination of caffeine, Tylenol and the herbal supplement ephedra -- an amphetamine precursor that is banned in the United States.

Sedalmerk may be safe to use as a pick-me-up in a normal environment but it is a toxic mix when combined with a trek through the desert because it accelerates dehydration, McClafferty said. Two days into the journey, the boy's energy was flag ging and he was dehydrated. On May 13, Ramos Cardoso said, the coyote and the rest of the crossers abandoned Rodreguez and her son, leaving them to walk in the desert by themselves.

Rodreguez began carrying the child, moving north through a sliver of earth hemmed in by two mountain ranges on land belonging to the Tohono O'odham Indian reservation. Sometime that day, the boy lost consciousness, Ramos Cardoso said. But Rodreguez kept on walking, clutching him.A Search for a Child

In early January, the Border Patrol began concentrating on Arizona's Altar Valley, which had become a virtual highway into the United States for thousands of illegal immigrants and is dotted with natural water holes and water stations serviced by American charities. The renewed enforcement there resulted in traffic being diverted to the Tohono O'odham land that has less water.

Some religious and charitable groups have placed water barrels in the desert and handed out maps in Mexico showing their locations, drawing the ire of those who seek tougher enforcement along the border. One of the groups, Humane Borders, received permission to keep water barrels on land belonging to the Bureau of Land Management, the Interior Department, the city of Tucson and Pima County. But the Tohono O'odham tribe has declined to give its permission.

It was on that land that Rodreguez found herself walking with her son. She carried him for more than a day, Ramos Cardoso said, before placing him under the paloverde tree and going to look for help.

Like many who cross the border illegally, Rodreguez had been in the United States before. She worked menial jobs in Kentucky, where she met a man who apparently was married. The two had a relationship and Rodreguez got pregnant, Ramos Cardoso said. She decided to have the baby in Veracruz so her mother could help her. Returning to Mexico to have a baby was an unusual decision -- many Mexican women make the reverse trip, traveling to the United States to have their babies so their children will be U.S. citizens.

Earlier this year, Rodreguez decided to return to the United States to show the boy to his father, Ramos Cardoso said. She traveled to Sasabe, joined the coyote's group and walked across the border.

After placing her son under the tree, Rodreguez chanced upon Highway 86, which runs through the heart of Tohono O'odham. There, on the afternoon of May 15, Border Patrol agents picked her up.

Ramos Cardoso said she told the agents immediately that she had left her son in the desert, but Gustavo Soto, a Border Patrol spokesman, said they learned of a missing boy four hours later after she was sent to a processing center in the border town of Nogales before she was returned to Mexico.

McClafferty received word about the missing boy that night. He is a member of BorStar, the Border Patrol's elite search and rescue unit, established in 1998 to help save illegal immigrants lost in the desert. When McClafferty went searching for the boy, it was unclear whether he was alive. He said he was told that the mother was so distraught that Border Patrol agents understood only that her son was missing.

McClafferty and three other agents began bushwhacking through the desert scrub, looking for footprints, where Rodreguez had been found. There were thousands, making it impossible to track the boy that way.

DOJ_NMG_0031906

Back at Nogales, Border Patrol agents photographed the bottom of Rodreguez's shoes and faxed the image to McClafferty. Just as the sun was setting, he found matches in the dust. For the next seven hours he and the other agents tracked them by flashlight.

"We figured she was in bad shape," McClafferty said. "She was walking around in circles. She went for help then went back to her son but couldn't find him."

In the end, McClafferty smelled the boy's remains before he found them.

"She carried her kid in the desert for four or five hours and not one of them helped her," McClafferty said of the others who walked in with Rodreguez. "I've seen a lot in six years, but this kid thing was one of those that I just couldn't file away."More Deaths Expected

After being expelled from the United States, Rodreguez was allowed back on May 18 on a short-term humanitarian visa to identify her son's body. An autopsy revealed that the probable cause of death was dehydration and exposure to the sun. The temperature had been above 100 degrees during their journey.

Eric Peters, deputy chief medical examiner for Pima County, placed the time of death between May 13 and May 14, meaning the boy had probably died in his mother's arms.

The last time a young child died on the border, according to Pima County records, was November, when a 1-year-old girl succumbed to pneumonia. Peters said authorities told him they had seen women with babies trudging through the reservation lands, and he and his colleagues are bracing for more child deaths this summer.

The Tohono O'odham police considered charging Rodreguez with child endangerment, but the Pima County attorney's office said it had no interest in prosecuting her. Rodreguez returned to Mexico on May 20 and her son's body followed two days later.

Ramos Cardoso said he tried to persuade Rodreguez to speak to the media because the consulate hoped her story would encourage others not to follow her.

"She had been through a lot of suffering," he said. "She told us she just wanted to go home."

800 Guard Members To Be Added To Border Soon (USAT)

By Mimi Hall

USA Today, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — The National Guard will have 800 troops along the U.S.-Mexican border by mid-June, and the 6,000 troops President Bush pledged to send to the southern border will be in place by Aug. 1, Lt. Gen. H. Steven Blum said Monday.

Blum, chief of the Guard, said 40% of the troops will be stationed in Arizona, where illegal migrants have overwhelmed the Border Patrol. The rest will be evenly divided among California, New Mexico and Texas.

The troops are being sent to augment the Homeland Security Department's Border Patrol while the agency recruits 6,000 additional agents. If the Border Patrol can meet that goal, set by Bush in a speech May 15, it will have 18,000 agents by the end of 2008, a doubling since the Sept. 11 attacks prompted tighter border security.

“It's going to be a very dynamic operation over the next two years,” Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar said. “As a force multiplier, it will be tremendous” to have the Guard's help, he said.

Despite the weekend arrests near Toronto of 17 terrorism suspects, Aguilar said no National Guard troops and no more border agents will be sent to the U.S.-Canadian border. Because nearly all illegal immigration is from the south, fewer than one in 10 of the Border Patrol's nearly 12,000 agents work at the Canadian border.

Aguilar said northern border agents are “at high alert” and are conducting more vigilant ID checks and car and truck inspections at border crossings.

National Guard troops have worked with the Border Patrol and the Drug Enforcement Administration for nearly 20 years along the southern border, mostly helping the Border Patrol catch drug smugglers. There are nearly 500 Guard members there now, including more than 50 from Utah and Connecticut who just arrived in Arizona. None of those are part of Bush's Operation Jump Start plan to make troops available over the next two years to try to stem illegal immigration and tighten security.

DOJ_NMG_0031907

Blum said his troops will not have law enforcement duties and will not arrest people who sneak across the border. They will help border agents build roads, monitor surveillance cameras, install sensors and do other engineering and maintenance work. They'll also pick up office duties, freeing border agents to patrol the border and make more arrests.

55 Utah Guardsmen Join Border Agents In Arizona (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

The first contingent of National Guard troops -- a 55-member platoon from Utah -- has arrived in Arizona to help protect the U.S.-Mexico border and is expected to build fences, repair roads and erect better border lighting as part of President Bush's plan to crack down on illegal entry.

The soldiers arrived for the weekend in San Luis, Ariz., about 25 miles south of Yuma, which has surfaced in recent months as one of the busiest illegal alien corridors in the country. The U.S. Border Patrol's Yuma sector is responsible for 118 miles of the border with Mexico, with apprehensions of illegal aliens -- 100,000 through May -- up 13 percent from the same period last year.

The presence of National Guard troops, who are not expected to perform law-enforcement functions, is aimed at freeing up Border Patrol agents to focus on enforcement along the border. A total of 300 National Guard troops are expected in Arizona by June 15.

Mr. Bush has proposed sending 6,000 National Guard troops to Texas, New Mexico, Arizona and California.

The 55 Guard members in Arizona are from the 116th, 1457th and 489th units of the Utah National Guard and arrived Saturday aboard a C-130 cargo plane. They will help repair and expand a 12-foot-high corrugated metal fence that separates San Luis and Mexico and a chain-link fence 50 yards inside the border.

Last week, Mr. Bush said 6,000 National Guard troops will be deployed along the U.S.-Mexico border to assist the Border Patrol by operating surveillance systems, analyzing intelligence, installing fences and vehicle barriers, building patrol roads and providing training.

"In other words, they're going to be a complement to the Border Patrol. The Guard units will not be involved in direct law-enforcement activities. That's the job of the Border Patrol," he said. "The United States is not going to militarize our border. What we're going to do is support those who we hire to do the job of enforcing the border."

Mr. Bush said that as the Border Patrol hires additional agents and as new technologies become available, the Guard force will be reduced -- probably by 2008.

"The federal government's working to conclude formal agreements with California and Arizona and New Mexico and Texas that will define the roles and responsibilities of National Guard units deploying to the southern border," he said in a speech Thursday before the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "We're going to work closely with the governors of those states to secure this border."

Last year, the Tucson and Yuma sectors of the Border Patrol apprehended more than half of the 1.15 million foreigners caught trying to sneak into the United States.

On Sunday, T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, which represents all 10,500 of the Border Patrol's nonsupervisory agents, said during a speech in Las Vegas that he doubted the deployment of 6,000 Guard troops on the border will stop the flow of illegal aliens.

"It's great to have help, but they're only going to be able to do so much," said Mr. Bonner, a 28-year Border Patrol veteran. "The answer is to turn off the employer magnet, focus on the reason people are crossing borders."

Mr. Bonner has vigorously argued that although most politicians know that the availability of jobs draws people to illegally enter the United States, few have supported legislation addressing the problem. He said the pending immigration enforcement bills in the House and Senate fail to "effectively reduce the employment magnet."

Utah Guard Unit Patrols U.S.-Mexico Border (AP-Y2)

By Arthur H. Rotstein

AP2, June 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0031908

Military bulldozers, road graders and other heavy equipment rumbled along the Mexican border early Monday as more than 50 National Guardsmen from Utah became the first unit to get to work under President Bush's crackdown on illegal immigration.

The soldiers with the 116th Construction Support Equipment Company will hit their work sites by 5:30 a.m. during their two weeks of duty. They will improve a dirt road running parallel to the border, fill in gaps in fortified fencing and run wiring for new lighting to help the Border Patrol spot illegal crossers.

"It's exciting to do something that's relevant to the safety of the United States," said Capt. Talon Greeff, the unit's commander. "There is a sense of excitement when you are doing something real-world."

The goal is to strengthen the border and free up border agents to catch illegal immigrants.

The guardsmen are unarmed and wearing hardhats instead of Kevlar helmets — "we do not want to appear as if we're militarizing the border," Greeff said. They will not perform any law enforcement duties.

The troops arrived in Yuma on Saturday and were briefed Sunday on their mission and given tips on how to survive the triple-digit heat of the Arizona desert.

Under Bush's plan, up to 6,000 National Guardsmen will be sent to the four southern border states. Officials say 300 Guardsmen from Arizona are expected to begin arriving at the state's border in mid-June.

The Utah unit is working in San Luis, 25 miles south of Yuma, home of the nation's busiest Border Patrol station. Two sets of barriers run along the border: a 12-foot corrugated-metal fence and, about 50 yards to the north, an 8-foot chain-link fence topped with barbed wire. Surveillance cameras are mounted on towers, and stadium lights help agents spot people trying to slip across at night.

Most of the 11 soldiers assigned to operate the heavy equipment have full-time jobs in the construction business in Utah. They would normally be pulling two weeks of training duty at this time of year anyway.

Now they are working to widen the dusty dirt track used by the Border Patrol, compact it and top it with gravel so agents can get to hot spots faster.

"They all feel pretty privileged to be out here as part of the first group," said Sgt. 1st Class James Colledge, a 52-year-old truck driver from West Valley, Utah.

In San Luis, some residents were pleased with the guard's presence.

Raymond Ruiz, a clerk at Charles and Frank Auto Parts, said the response was long overdue.

"I think we need it, because besides illegal people coming across, I know there's drugs and you never know, maybe some terrorists one of these days," Ruiz said.

Others were leery, worried that legal border crossers would stop shopping.

Alex Furniture employee Israel Escobar said the Guard's presence "scares the people. No one wants to buy in the U.S."

But his co-worker, Israel Torres, disagreed.

"It's OK. It's right, because it means more security in the houses," Torres said. "I live next to the border, and I'm afraid."

Securing The Border (Again) (NYT)

By John Tierney

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

President Bush heads to New Mexico today to visit his new favorite school, the Border Patrol Academy. He wants it to train thousands more federal agents, but they'll make little difference unless Bush can teach Republicans the lesson learned by agents like Buck Brandemuehl a half century ago — the last time anyone could seriously claim the border was under control.

In the 1950's, federal agents were initially overwhelmed by waves of Mexican farmworkers illegally crossing the border. The number of immigrants apprehended surpassed half a million in 1951 and was approaching 900,000 in 1953, a level roughly comparable to the situation now.

Back then there were fewer than 2,000 federal agents patrolling the borders, less than a fifth the size of today's force. But within two years, the flow of illegal immigrants declined so drastically that the immigration service declared in its 1955 annual report, "The border has been secured."

And it stayed that way the rest of the decade. The number of immigrants caught kept dropping until it reached 45,000 in 1959 — a decline of 95 percent in just six years.

"We really had to scratch for illegals," recalls Brandemuehl, who worked along the New Mexico border in the late 1950's. "We'd do traffic checks and freight-train checks, but we weren't apprehending many people. We'd go camp on the border and look for tracks, but in 30 days you might apprehend only 15 or 20 people, and a lot of them weren't even farmworkers. They were criminals sneaking back and forth to rob ranchers."

What stopped the farmworkers from sneaking across? It wasn't simply the get-tough measures that Republicans are calling for today. Although federal agents did intensify their efforts, conducting sweeps of farms and ranches, immigration officials realized that stricter enforcement wasn't enough.

Along with the crackdown, officials encouraged farmers and ranchers to legally hire Mexican temporary workers called braceros. As new rules made it easier to hire braceros, the number of these legal workers doubled to more than 400,000 at the same time illegal immigration was plummeting.

"We wanted people to come in the front door, not the back door," Brandemuehl says. The agents' job became simpler not only because there were fewer Mexicans to catch but also because there was more help from American employers. Once farmers and ranchers could legally get the workers they needed, they were more willing to cooperate with agents tracking down illegal immigrants.

Unfortunately, though, Congress started shutting the front door. The bracero program became controversial, partly because American labor unions objected to the competition and partly because of concerns that Mexicans were being exploited. Some of the complaints were legitimate, but Congress's response didn't leave immigrants any better off.

They ended up with even fewer rights because they were working illegally after the bracero program was restricted in 1960 and then eliminated four years later. As the number of legal workers entering from Mexico dropped during the 1960's, the number of illegal immigrants shot back up, and kept increasing after new limits were placed on other visas available to Mexicans in 1968.

The border has been out of control ever since, even though the number of agents has grown to 11,000. "Tough enforcement alone can't work unless you allow more people in legally," says Stuart Anderson of the National Foundation for American Policy, who has studied the impact of the bracero program.

Today President Bush and the Senate are trying to apply that lesson by expanding the number of legal immigrants and temporary workers. These visiting workers would have more rights than braceros, which is why the reforms are supported by the United Farm Workers and other unions.

But Republicans in the House are resisting. They say they won't expand legal opportunities until the border is first secured — which will never happen if they have their way.

In 1958, a high-ranking immigration official named James Hennessy was quizzed by a House committee about his agency's success in controlling the border. He said it was due in large part to the increase in legal immigration. When he was asked how his agents would control the border if the bracero program ended, he gave a prescient reply that's more relevant than ever today:

"We can't do the impossible, Mr. Congressman."

Mexico Hopes Reserve Will Slow Crossings (AP)

By Mark Stevenson

AP, June 5, 2006

Mexico is creating an environmental reserve about 30 feet wide and 600 miles long on the Texas border, a "green wall" to protect the Rio Grande from the roads and staging areas that smugglers use to ferry drugs and migrants across the frontier.

Much of this border zone is remote and inhospitable — generally too rough to hike through unless you're a black bear or a pronghorn sheep, species that have flourished in the area's deserts and mountains.

And that's the way Mexico wants to keep it.

DOJ_NMG_0031910

While the proposed Rio Bravo del Norte Natural Monument is only about 30 feet wide, it will connect two large protected areas south of the river. When a third nature reserve, known as Ocampo, is created this year, the protected areas in Mexico will form a "wall" of millions of acres of wilderness, matching Texas' Big Bend parks foot-by-foot along the border.

"This stretch of border is the safest one we have. It's safe because it has wilderness on both sides," said Carlos Manterrola, who heads the environmental group Unidos Para la Conservacion.

Big Bend National Park has had some problems with migrant and drug trafficking, but superintendent John King says extending protected areas on either side of the border will likely keep the problem from getting worse.

"When you have a roadless area, you make it more difficult for these activities to happen," King said.

The strip protects a much longer stretch of riverbank, from just downstream of the Texas border town of Presidio to the outskirts of Laredo, Texas, raising the possibility of still larger reserves that will serve as biological corridors, encouraging four-footed traffic but making it exceedingly difficult for humans to pass.

In other border areas where U.S. reserves aren't fully matched in Mexico — such as Arizona's Organ Pipe Cactus National Monument — primitive roads and ramshackle hamlets have sprung up on the Mexican side to provide supplies and staging areas to illegal border crossers. They have then overrun U.S. wilderness areas.

As the U.S. puts up more fencing near cities and popular crossing zones, migrants will likely be looking for new routes in remote areas.

That happened with the Mexican hamlet of Las Chepas, which became a hub for undocumented border crossers. The problem got so bad that Mexican authorities — at the urging of New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson — bulldozed 31 buildings to discourage them from being used as a smuggling haven.

Now, Mexico is working on yet another "mirror" border reserve, to be announced this summer in an area known as the Janos grasslands, roughly west of Las Chepas and across from the Alamo Hueco Mountains and Big Hatchet Mountains Wilderness areas in New Mexico's boot heel region.

Law enforcement is a problem at many Mexican parks, but if well policed, the 1.2 million acres of the proposed Janos wilderness area could not only protect one of the largest prairie dog populations in North America, but also present a natural barrier to smugglers moving deeper into the wild as border security tightens.

Mexican ranchers and environmentalists applauded the Rio Bravo del Norte proposal, which was published Monday, starting a 30-day comment period. Along with the Ocampo wilderness, it will protect several pine- and oak-clad mountains often described as "sky islands," temperate mountaintop enclaves divided by seas of heat-seared desert or grassland.

"This would close the circle," said Jesus Armando Verduzco, a 73-year-old ranch owner from Ocampo. "Perhaps later, we could do a bit of hunting, eco-tourism, preserve it for humanity."

Some environmentalists say this policy of establishing nature preserves along the border could be a more effective alternative to the walls and "smart" fences being pondered in Congress.

"The whole idea that people are coming up through wilderness and roadless areas, and that's simply not the case," said David Hodges, policy director of the Sky Island Alliance. "People have a tendency to stay near roads, because they don't get lost and that's where they get picked up. ... It would be disastrous to put roads through these areas."

AP: Millions Of Visa Overstays Overlooked (AP-Y2)

By Will Weissert

AP2, June 5, 2006

Millions of illegal immigrants in the United States never jumped the U.S.-Mexico border where Congress wants to erect impenetrable walls and President Bush is sending National Guard troops to patrol. They never sneaked in at all.

The little-acknowledged reality is that nearly half the estimated 12 million undocumented foreigners in the United States entered on bona fide U.S. visas — and simply never left. Authorities call them "overstays" who have been largely overlooked in the vitriolic debate on immigration.

"The southwestern border gets all the attention, but it's staggering the number of people who come and overstay their visa," said Dean Boyd, a spokesman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement in Washington. "It's a very large-scale problem."

DOJ_NMG_0031911

A study by the Washington-based Pew Hispanic Center last month indicated that 45 percent of the undocumented migrants in the United States overstayed legal visas.

Confirming those findings or knowing the home country of those who overstay their visas is tricky because U.S. authorities don't track the problem. Immigration authorities also generally don't compare entry and exit information to see who should have left the country.

"There's no annual reports published on visa overstays because obviously these people are hiding and don't want to be found," Boyd said.

Ana Luisa certainly doesn't, so she asked that her last name not be used. The Mexico City native lives in Dallas with her husband, 13-year-old son and 5-month-old daughter — who was born in the United States and is an American citizen — and volunteers at a middle school.

When she moved to the United States, she made sure to return to Mexico every six months to renew her tourist visa. But the trip soon became a chore and she let her visa lapse a year ago. Now if she returns to Mexico again she likely won't be able to get another U.S. visa.

"I'm illegal, but I'm someone who is trying to help with my work," she said in a phone interview.

Ana Luisa said she would never have sneaked across the border to get into the United States, and didn't see the harm in overstaying her visa. In Dallas, she said, her son is able to get a better education than he would in Mexico.

"I wouldn't risk my life in the river or in the desert like thousands of others do," she said.

Many borrow the social security numbers of legal residents or use falsified documents to build what appear to be legal identities, making it difficult for employers to know when someone is undocumented. Others work informally, as maids, gardeners or in other jobs where employers rarely require paperwork, despite federal law.

The immigration reforms soon to be hashed out in a Congressional conference committee may crack down on employers who fail to make sure their workers are legal. But it's unclear whether the proposed reforms will send many "overstayers" home.

The U.S. State Department issued nearly 5.4 million temporary, nonimmigrant visas in fiscal year 2005, and about 17 percent went to Mexicans. The most common visas are for tourism, business travel and medical care.

Boyd said he couldn't pinpoint the type of visa that is overstayed the most. Thousands of foreigners who come as students remain in the United States after finishing school or dropping out, and many who come on work visas lose their jobs or stay after their papers expire.

Of course, getting a visa in the first place is a challenge. Lines at the U.S. Embassy in Mexico City form before dawn. Applicants pay $100 for an appointment, bringing proof of employment, savings and family and community roots.

Still, Embassy spokeswoman Judith Bryan said most applicants are approved — about 70 percent.

"The main thing is you have to have sufficient ties to your home country to show you are coming back," she said. "The law — not just for Mexico but everywhere — says that the burden is on the applicant to prove they aren't going to stay. In some cases that's very difficult, especially if you have a lot of family in the U.S. and you don't own property or have money in a bank at home."

Ricardo Ortiz, 55, said visitors who overstay their visas have made it harder for honest people to get visas in the first place. For each of the past 10 years, he has spent nine months working legally at a Long Island racehorse farm.

"Those who are working there and don't have papers are making trouble and holding up our visas," he said, waiting for his Embassy appointment in Mexico City. "We are legal workers, and we are being unfairly hurt."

Nasario Perez, 36, spent three hours on a bus to get to his embassy appointment. He hoped to take a landscaping job in New York state, but said there was no way he would overstay his visa.

"If I do good work and then leave, I will have a chance to get a visa the next time," he said. "That's more important than extra money I could make by staying too long."

Immigration Debate Stirs Racial Tensions (AP-Y2)

By Erin Texeira

AP2, June 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0031912

As the fight over immigration reform drags on, an ominous undercurrent to the debate — racism — is becoming more pronounced.

From muttered ethnic slurs to violent attacks, activists say an anti-immigrant backlash seems to be growing in America's neighborhoods and workplaces. A few political leaders have called proposed immigration measures before Congress "racist."

"The climate has gotten demonstrably worse and it is racially charged," said Devin Burghart of the Center for New Community, which tracks anti-immigrant activity. "It's not simply a debate about immigration policy. ... It's about race and national identity and who and what we are as Americans."

Some activists say the House of Representatives started it.

When lawmakers passed a bill in December that would make illegal immigrants felons, many felt that was a swipe at Latinos, who make up 80 percent of the nation's estimated 11 million illegal immigrants. Former President Jimmy Carter has said the bill had "racist overtones," and that feeling helped push more than 1 million demonstrators to attend street rallies in recent months.

Some reacted the same way after the Senate passed an amendment to its immigration bill last month that declared English the national language. Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, a Nevada Democrat, called that "racist" and "divisive."

The amendment's sponsor, Oklahoma Republican Sen. James Inhofe (news, bio, voting record), replied that Reid's statements were "ridiculous." Republican Rep. James Sensenbrenner of Wisconsin, who wrote much of the House bill, issued a study on six countries' immigration policies and found that five — including Mexico — make illegal entry into their nation a criminal offense.

But Luis Valenzuela, of the Long Island Immigration Alliance in New York, said the measures feel hostile to many immigrants. The bills "set (an) overall climate which is quite racist," he said. "That elicits action by extremists."

Mark Potok of the Southern Poverty Law Center, which has tracked hate crimes for decades, said that hate groups "consistently try and exploit any public discussion that has some kind of racial angle, and immigration has worked for hate groups in America better than any issue in years."

The Anti-Defamation League, a nonprofit that fights anti-Semitism and other bias, put out a report last month that said "hateful and racist rhetoric" aimed at Latino immigrants had grown "to a level unprecedented in recent years."

The report did not give an overall figure for hate speech and hate crimes, but detailed numerous examples including:

• Two men in Tennessee who were sentenced to prison in December for shattering windows and painting Nazi symbols in a local Mexican market.

• Internet video games, such as one called "Border Patrol," urge players to shoot characters drawn as Latino caricatures.

• New Jersey Internet radio talk show host Hal Turner posted an "ethnic cleansing manual" on his Web site days after the massive May 1 protests.

Near Houston, two white teenagers were arrested in April, accused of beating a Latino youth and sodomizing him with a pipe. Days later, on Long Island, a white teen was accused of threatening two Latinos with a machete and a chain saw. Police say ethnic slurs were used in each case.

In Herndon, Va., opponents of a day laborer work site regularly picket it, taking photographs of workers and threatening to follow them home, said Bill Threlkeld, director of Project Hope and Harmony, a nonprofit that runs the site.

When a man protesting the site wore a "Whites Only" T-shirt, a neighborhood controversy had become an ethnic issue, Threlkeld said.

Sociologist Gonzalo Santos of California State University at Bakersfield said immigration is just the latest example of social policy issues taking on racial overtones in America.

"People talk about immigration as if race doesn't matter, saying 'No, I don't have anything against immigrants or Mexicans, it's just the illegal part of it I don't like.' But those are code words," he said. "We experience race in this country through issues like welfare policy, anti-poverty programs and now immigration."

Cecilia Munoz of the National Council of La Raza said it's important for immigration advocates not to slip into bias themselves. Most people on the other side are engaging in civil discussions focused on public policy, not ethnicity, she said.

DOJ_NMG_0031913

"The assumption is that we believe everybody who disagrees with us in this debate must be a racist but that's absolutely false," Munoz said. "But we are feeling the effects of what can only be described as racism and hatred.

"We get letters with ethnic slurs. I've personally been called 'wetback' and a word beginning with 'n' that I don't like to say. This is in the last two months."

Increasingly, security is a concern. For the first time at its annual conference last year, La Raza offered a program to community groups on how to stay safe amid harassment.

"It was well-attended," Munoz said. "We plan to do it again this year."

Witness To The American Dream (USAT)

By Patrick Welsh

USA Today, June 6, 2006

Until the early '80s, the central issue at T.C. Williams High School, where I teach, was always this: How do we teach relatively well-off whites and relatively poor blacks together without shortchanging or alienating either group?

But while T.C. and the rest of the Alexandria, Va., school system wrestled with the black-white issue, another challenge surfaced. A steady influx of Hispanic students, many of them destitute Central Americans illiterate in their own language, gradually transformed the complexion of the community.

With all the recent talk of immigration reform, one thing has become clear to me: While Congress still must thrash out its differences on policy, I can put real faces on this issue. Each day, I teach students who are immigrants, probably legal and illegal, and I can tell you that when I look into the eyes of these kids, I do not feel the sort of fear or loathing that some Americans have voiced. Instead, I see on their part a yearning to learn and a motivation to succeed that I don't always see in my American-born students.

Certainly, we cannot open the door to every immigrant who wants to make this country home. But for those already here, I hope they will be given the opportunity to stay. These students not only enrich our society, but they also bring parts of the world closer together.

Magnet for immigrants

Since the early '70s, Alexandria, right across the river from Washington, D.C., has been a magnet for immigrants from trouble spots all over the world. At T.C., Alexandria's only high school, I have taught kids from such places as Korea, Iran, Vietnam, Afghanistan and Ethiopia. Getting to know these kids has given teachers and students a sense of being connected to the larger world. Though many Americans had no idea where Afghanistan was prior to the 9/11 terrorist attacks, it was very familiar to me. For years, I had been teaching students whose parents had escaped from the cities of Kabul and Kandahar after the Russian invasion in 1979.

But I'd be less than honest if I didn't say that as a teacher I am well aware of the enormous social problems many immigrant families have. In some cases, parents come here alone before sending for their children. When the kids finally do arrive, often as teenagers, they hardly know their parents and are rebellious. More common is that both parents work two jobs to survive; as a result, the kids are often left on their own. Some students are lured into gangs. Then there is the high rate of teen pregnancy, which leads many girls to drop out of school and become a burden on social services.

In the past two decades, the Hispanic population has been the only one in the school system to grow: from 5.3% in 1983 to 26.7% today. One section of the city is now called Chirilagua, after a province in El Salvador.

Alexandria, which is known for its liberal politics, reacted to this growth with disbelief, shock and anger. Many residents blamed city officials for allowing immigrant families, many of them illegal, to overcrowd apartments. Blacks primarily saw Hispanics as cutting into their jobs and benefits.

DOJ_NMG_0031914

Still, what I've witnessed are the virtues of the majority of these immigrant families. Many of them have family values and a work ethic that would shame many American families. While my middle-class students work for luxuries — to pay for the tanning salon or the latest cellphone or hot accessory for their car — most Hispanic kids I see work to support their families here or those who were left back in their native country. While middle-class neighborhoods are still dormant at 5 a.m., Chirilagua is bustling as men go out to work construction throughout the area.

Successful transitions

Many immigrant families have successfully assimilated into society over generations. I recently read in our local newspaper the name of Ilryong Moon, a Harvard graduate who is chairman of the Fairfax County, Va., school board. I remembered him in my class as a 16-year-old, fresh from Korea and fiercely determined to master English.

Victor Ignacio is a highly respected Alexandria police detective. His father left the Dominican Republic to settle in America, and five years later sent for Victor, then 12 years old, and the rest of the family.

Many of our school history books are filled with success stories of immigrants who have made significant contributions to America. But there are still more stories to be written. Take T.C. Williams senior Jeff Hernandez. He knows how different his life would have been had his mother not left war-torn El Salvador 20 years ago and made the dangerous journey through Mexico to the California border, where she slipped into the USA illegally. Eventually, she ended up as a housekeeper and was sponsored for citizenship by her employers.

On the two trips he took to El Salvador, Jeff, who was born in the United States, saw poverty that stunned him. That made him all the more determined to live his mother's American dream. The captain of T.C. Williams' Virginia state champion 4x400 relay team, Jeff will enter Virginia Commonwealth University in the fall, the first member of his family to attend college.

The transformation that has taken place in Alexandria merely represents a microcosm of what is going on across America today. As a teacher on one of the frontlines where immigration is most visible, I can assure you we have nothing to fear, and much to hope for, from these students and their families.

Lost IRS Laptop Stored Employee Fingerprints (MSNBC)

By Bob Sullivan

MSNBC.com, June 5, 2006

A laptop computer containing fingerprints of Internal Revenue Service employees is missing, MSNBC.com has learned.

The computer was lost during transit on an airline flight in the western United States, IRS spokesman Terry Lemon said. No taxpayer information was on the lost laptop, Lemon said.

In all, the IRS believes the computer contained information on 291 employees and job applicants, including fingerprints, names, Social Security numbers, and dates of birth. The fingerprints had been collected as part of a normal background screening process. Some job applicants' information also was also on the computer.

Story continues below ? advertisement

"Right now the laptop is classified as missing. We don't know if it was stolen," Lemon said.

Nothing on the computer would put taxpayer information at risk, Lemon said. The fingerprints and other data could be not used to falsify an IRS ID badge, he said. The matter has been turned over the to IRS inspector general's office.

"Our taxpayer data is on completely different systems," he said. "No taxpayer data is involved."

Lemon said he could not narrow the list of people who might be on the computer, other than to say they were from "western and Midwest" regions. The IRS has attempted to contact all 291 people by telephone, and will soon send a notification letter to each affected employee and applicant.

Data on the laptop was not encrypted, Lemon said, but it was "double password protected," meaning someone would have to enter two different passwords to access the data. He said there is no indication the data had been used to commit ID theft.

DOJ_NMG_0031915

The story echoes news last month that a Veterans Administration employee had lost a laptop computer containing 26 million veterans' Social Security numbers. That laptop was apparently stolen during a house burglary.

Americans believe the estate tax — or "death tax" — is the most unfair tax of all.

A Gallup Poll conducted in April found that 58% of respondents said that "inheritance taxes" are unfair, contrasted with only 42% who said the dreaded Alternative Minimum Tax is unfair.

This year, the death tax rate is 46%! That means the government will take nearly half of everything you have worked for and saved, over an exemption of $2 million, even after you have paid taxes throughout your life. No wonder Americans don't think the tax is reasonable.

While this newspaper's editorial board agrees that we need to increase the exemption — a $2 million exemption will not go far with rising home prices and half of all Americans investing in the stock market — we would be foolish to ignore the economic damage that is caused by setting the rate at a punitive level.

The death tax is a tax on capital, since most of an estate's assets are capital in nature. A recent congressional Joint Economic Committee study said that this tax has reduced the amount of capital in our economy by about $847 billion over the past 60 years. Just imagine how many more jobs would have been created, and how much our economy would have grown, if that capital had been available for private investment rather than being spent by the government.

As the 2004 Nobel Prize-winning economist Dr. Edward Prescott has explained, very high tax rates discourage people from working, saving and investing. Why bother if the government is going to take half of what you earn from the additional effort?

Ideally, we should repeal the death tax as many of our trading partners, including Canada and Australia, have done.

At the very least, we should increase the exemption and reduce the rate to the same level as the tax on capital gains, so that those who pay it can do so without being forced to sell off business assets.

Wealthy Can't Avoid Death — But Will They Evade Taxes? (USAT)

USA Today, June 6, 2006

Last year, Hurricane Katrina struck just as the Senate was about to vote on repealing the estate tax. Senators prudently shelved the issue, deciding it wouldn't look good to slash taxes for the wealthiest Americans when tens of thousands of poor people had lost their homes and livelihoods.

Now, with the Katrina coverage receding, the issue is back on the Senate calendar. A vote could come as early as this week. Estate-tax opponents concede they might not have the votes for outright repeal. But they still hope to reduce the tax rate on inherited wealth to as low as 15% from the current 46%.

That was a bad idea last year, and it's still a bad idea. Taxes must be paid by someone, and it is hard to think who they harm less than people who are both very rich and dead.

Ending the estate tax would reduce revenue between $290 billion and $745 billion over 10 years, depending on how the accounting is done.

How would that money be recouped? There are only two choices: Raise taxes on working Americans, or pass the cost on to future generations, already burdened by $8.3 trillion in government debt and exploding costs for Medicare and Social Security. Either approach is unacceptable.

Ironically, the same reality that led to the adoption of the estate tax in 1916 — the concentration of wealth in the hands of a few families — might bring about its repeal. Families such as the Waltons, of Wal-Mart fame, and the candy-making Mars clan have supported lobbying campaigns to end the tax. The campaigns are focusing pressure on home-state senators, several of them Democrats who ordinarily proclaim themselves champions of the middle class.

Since the rich are an influential but limited constituency, estate-tax foes have used misinformation to convince farmers and small business owners that the issue concerns them. In fact, the truth is very different:

DOJ_NMG_0031916

• Generous exemptions keep the vast majority of estates from paying what the opponents call the "death tax." This year, only 12,600 estates are projected to pay. That's a tiny fraction of 1% of all estates.

• It is not "double taxation," as some critics say. Most of today's fortunes are in shares of companies that have never been taxed because they haven't been sold. Bill Gates, for example, has about $23 billion in untaxed Microsoft shares.

Estate-tax opponents argue that the rates are confiscatory. But there's no reason the tax on inherited, unearned income should be any lower than the top rate, which has varied from 38.6% to 35% in recent years, paid by highly skilled workers on their daily toil. And if there's to be any reduction, supporters have an obligation to say how they'll replace the revenue. In five years in power, Republicans have evaded that responsibility, adding more than $2 trillion in debt with tax cuts and spending increases.

Some adjustments to the estate tax may be in order. Under current law, for example, it is set to expire for one year (2010) and then return in subsequent years. This creates some perverse incentives for people who have, or stand to inherit, vast fortunes.

When the tax comes back in 2011, the exemption would be $1 million, or $2 million per couple. Keeping it at its 2009 levels of $3.5 million and $7 million would ensure that any family farm or company that could truly be called a small business would incur little or no tax.

As they prepare to vote on what would be a huge windfall for the wealthiest Americans, senators should recall the sense of shame that prompted them to hold off last summer. Nothing has changed, except for the weather.

Death And Taxes (WP)

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

THE SENATE will debate whether to repeal the estate tax today, and the first decisive vote is expected Thursday. The House has voted in favor of repeal and the administration, which has pushed a temporary suspension into law, would be delighted to support permanent abolition; the Senate's voice will therefore be decisive. But the arguments for repeal are by turns wrong, muddled and internally contradictory.

Abolitionists say the estate tax forces the liquidation of family farms and businesses. In 2000, according to the Congressional Budget Office, 1,659 farms were liable for the tax, but fully 1,521 of these had sufficient liquid assets to pay without selling any land. In 2000, likewise, 485 taxable estates included a small business, but 321 of these could pay the tax without selling any of the firm. Moreover, heirs can spread estate tax payments over 14 years, so even those without liquid assets have plenty of time to take over the farm or firm, manage it productively, and thus generate the cash to pay the tax. So the estate tax wasn't forcing the fire sale of large numbers of family farms and businesses even in 2000, before the Bush tax cuts kicked in. Now that the amount that a couple can pass on tax-free has jumped from $1.3 million to $4 million, the mass-liquidation claim is even less accurate.

But it is also muddled. Suppose that the estate tax does force the sale of some farms and businesses; is that necessarily a bad thing? Well, it would mean that the heirs don't have the inclination or ability to manage the farm or the small business and turn a profit -- otherwise they would earn enough to pay the tax over the 14-year period. From the standpoint of job creation, it's a mistake to leave a farm or small business in the hands of heirs who don't know how to turn a profit on it; better that those assets be sold to purchasers who will maximize their value. Far from promoting a vibrant small-business and farm sector, the abolition of the estate tax would increase the number of businesses and farms that are managed by non-vibrant sons and daughters.

Meanwhile, abolitionists also claim that the tax doesn't raise much anyway, so why not kill it? Well, it's expected to raise $776 billion in the decade starting in 2012; if abolitionists view this as chump change, how can they pretend it's ravaging a sector of the economy? The abolitionists also assert that a revision in the treatment of capital gains would offset the revenue lost by repeal of the estate tax, but Congress's Joint Committee on Taxation has analyzed this claim and found it empty. Finally, the abolitionists argue that the estate tax discourages saving: If you can't leave your money to your heirs tax-free, then why not go out and spend it? But people facing the estate tax -- basically, retired couples sitting on more than $4 million -- are probably spending as much as they want to spend anyway. Besides, any small decrease in their savings is likely to be offset by the increase in government saving resulting from the tax, and by possibly higher saving by heirs, who won't spend so freely if their inheritance faces taxation.

In short, the exotic arguments in favor of abolishing the estate tax don't match the obvious ones for keeping it. The nation faces serious budget deficits, so why abolish a revenue stream? Inequality is rising, so why kill the most progressive federal tax? The competitive and meritocratic basis for the nation's economic success is under threat, so why take action that would encourage hereditary elites to entrench themselves?

The Estate Tax, Back On The Agenda (NYT)

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

Still giddy over the passage last month of a $70 billion income tax cut for affluent Americans, Senate Republicans are hoping this week to go further, and gut the federal estate tax. And they'll probably try to accomplish this gift to the super-rich under the guise of compromise.

Their fondest wish would be to permanently repeal the tax. But planning, during a time of war, to give away nearly $1 trillion over 10 years may look too radical even for this crowd. So the senators are also considering a so-called middle-of-the-road approach. Sponsored by Jon Kyl, Republican of Arizona, the "compromise" would drastically raise the thresholds at which the estate tax kicks in, while slashing the estate tax rate. Together, those changes would cut taxes for the wealthiest families by $652 billion between 2012 and 2021, the first full decade of the proposed cut. Because the government would need to borrow to make up for that lost revenue, the tax cut would also cost all taxpayers some $175 billion in higher interest payments.

And for what? Fully 71 percent of the additional benefits would go to people who stand to inherit more than $10 million. Almost all of the rest would apply to estates worth more than $5 million.

There is no economic justification for doing this, any more than any tax cut can be justified when the economy is growing and the government is running a big deficit, as is now the case. The notion that small businesses and family farms are unfairly targeted by the estate tax is nonsense.

There is no moral justification for cutting estate taxes. Much of the wealth taxed after death has never been taxed because profits on stocks, bonds, real estate, artwork — you name it — are not taxed until an asset is sold. Obviously, people with big estates never got around to selling their assets.

And yet, some multimillionaires, and their Congressional supporters, have the gall to say that the wealthy should not be "penalized." Estate taxes imposed after one's death are no more of a penalty than income taxes withheld from paychecks.

Any senator who votes for this bill — or to end an expected filibuster — does not care about the budget deficit or tax fairness, no matter what he or she may say to the contrary.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Congress Pushing Back Against Bush's Expansion Of Presidential Authority (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Republican and Democratic House leaders join forces to protest the FBI search of a congressman's office. The Senate Intelligence Committee demands fuller briefings from the CIA. The Supreme Court hears a landmark case challenging presidential war powers.

After five years of a concerted White House campaign, there are tentative signs that Congress and the courts are beginning to push back against what has been the greatest expansion of presidential powers in a generation or more.

Those pushing back include some congressional Republicans and conservative jurists who have been among President Bush's chief allies. The efforts surely would intensify if Democrats won control of the House or Senate in November's elections — and with it the power to convene hearings and issue subpoenas.

“You ask, ‘Is the tide shifting?' and I say, ‘Maybe, maybe,' ” says Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter, R-Pa., who has pushed for stronger congressional oversight of intelligence operations. “If you ask me if I still feel like a lonely voice, I would say that I feel like a member of a small chorus.”

Some examples:

DOJ_NMG_0031918

•House Speaker Dennis Hastert and Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi, usually at war, issued a joint statement denouncing the FBI search last month of Rep. William Jefferson's congressional office as a violation of the separation of powers between co-equal branches of government. Their ultimatum that seized documents be returned is now the subject of negotiations with the Justice Department, which is investigating bribery allegations against Jefferson, D-La.

•The Senate Intelligence Committee voted 9-6 two weeks ago to demand that the administration notify all members of the committees about intelligence operations. The administration has bypassed the intelligence committees to inform only eight congressional leaders about such sensitive programs as the National Security Agency's warrantless-surveillance operation.

•Congressional Republicans and Democrats in March upended plans for a Dubai-owned company to take over some U.S. port operations, forcing the firm to promise to transfer the operations to a "U.S. entity." Outraged lawmakers weren't convinced when the president dismissed their national-security concerns as unfounded, and they weren't deterred when he threatened the first veto of his presidency to protect the deal.

•The White House and Congress continue to jockey over who has the last word on the treatment of terror suspects. Congress approved an amendment banning torture over the objections of Vice President Cheney. Bush signed the legislation in December but issued a "signing statement" in which he reserved the right to waive the ban, which he suggested violated his constitutional authority as commander in chief. Senate Armed Services Chairman John Warner of Virginia and Arizona Sen. John McCain of Arizona, both Republicans, then issued a joint statement vowing "strict oversight to monitor" implementation of the law.

The dispute has delayed the release of a new Army Field Manual on interrogation this spring. The Los Angeles Times reported Monday that several senators say the proposed manual sets standards for terror suspects that violate the congressional ban.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino says the administration has been able to meet Congress' concerns without conceding presidential powers. She notes that administration officials agreed to brief Intelligence Committee members last month about the NSA operation, reported in The New York Times in December, which includes wiretapping calls within the United States without warrants if one of the participants is abroad. The administration calls it the Terrorist Surveillance Program.

"There have been — and always will be by nature of our system — conflicts between Congress and the White House on the limits of executive power," Perino says. "But far from clashing, the two branches have worked well together on very difficult cases and generally made accommodations on issues, like the Terrorist Surveillance Program."

It's true that Congress generally hasn't used or even threatened to use its most potent weapons in a confrontation with the White House, such as issuing subpoenas or cutting off funding for programs.

Still, Bruce Fein, a Justice Department official in the Reagan administration, says Congress' attitude toward the White House is toughening a bit. "We're seeing, maybe, the embryonic stages of drawing the line and saying: 'Here. No more,' " he says.

In the courts, too, some judges in recent months have been more willing to scrutinize Bush's assertions of presidential power.

Judge J. Michael Luttig of the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, who had been on Bush's short list of possible Supreme Court picks, last fall wrote a key opinion endorsing the administration's argument that the president could order Jose Padilla, a U.S. citizen and suspected terrorist, to be held indefinitely in a military brig without charges.

But when the administration abruptly decided to charge Padilla in civilian court — apparently to avoid a possible Supreme Court reversal — the judge objected and tried to stop the transfer. Luttig, who resigned from the bench last month, warned of a "substantial cost to the government's credibility before the courts."

The Supreme Court is expected to rule this month in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld, another case that could test presidential powers. Lawyers for Salim Ahmed Hamdan, Osama bin Laden's former driver, are challenging the administration's plan to put prisoners at Guantanamo Bay in Cuba on trial for war crimes in special military tribunals.

At issue: Does Bush's claim of presidential war powers override the protections of the Geneva Conventions?

Some historians say a pattern seen after previous threats to the nation's security — during the Civil War and World War II, for instance — may be repeating itself now that five years have passed since the terror attacks on Sept. 11, 2001.

"In the first few years after a crisis emerges, the courts tend to be very deferential to the White House," says Phillip Cooper of Portland State University in Oregon, who studies separation of powers. "But what tends to happen is after two or three years of deference, then the courts may begin to take a hard look at what's going on … and remind the administration they don't have carte blanche."

On Saturday, the American Bar Association's board of governors voted to establish a bipartisan task force to investigate whether Bush has gone beyond his constitutional authority in asserting a right to ignore provisions of new laws. Bush has issued more than 750 "signing statements" — more than all previous presidents combined — that state his interpretation of new laws and sometimes declare that they infringe on his presidential powers.

Even before 9/11, Cheney had made restoring presidential authority a priority. As White House chief of staff for President Ford, Cheney found himself dealing with laws passed in the wake of the Vietnam War and the Watergate scandal that constrained presidential authority. The 1973 War Powers Act, for one, restricted a president's authority to launch military action without congressional approval.

Later, as a Wyoming congressman, Cheney argued that Congress was "abusing its power" when it barred the Reagan administration from funding the Nicaraguan contras. The administration's efforts to evade the law by funneling profits from secret arms sales to Iran reflected "mistakes in judgment and nothing more," according to a minority report he helped draft.

Now, as vice president, Cheney has been in a position to resist and even reverse efforts by Congress to restrain the executive. In the administration's first months, the energy task force he chaired went to court to avoid disclosing the names of industry executives it consulted.

Recently, amid the furor over the NSA's warrantless-surveillance program, Cheney took a similarly hard line. "We have all the legal authority we need," the vice president said in an interview on PBS' NewsHour With Jim Lehrer, citing the Constitution and a congressional resolution passed soon after 9/11. And Congress' role? "We said, 'Look, if you've got suggestions, we're happy to listen to them.' "

The Bush administration has taken a series of actions to expand presidential powers: Enabling past presidents and vice presidents to restrict release of their papers after the 12-year period set in law has expired. Refusing to allow aides to testify before Congress about the federal response to 9/11 and to Hurricane Katrina, arguing that might discourage staffers from providing "unvarnished advice" in the future. Asserting wartime powers to ignore federal laws and international treaties when the president says national security is at stake.

"The administration has been very consistent," Cooper says. "At every turn the White House has issued a reading as expansive as possible for its own authority, a reading as narrow as possible of congressional authority, and in some cases pre-empted the courts."

At a rare session with reporters in December, Cheney expressed satisfaction with what the administration has achieved.

"The president of the United States needs to have his constitutional powers unimpaired," Cheney said. "I do think that, to some extent now, we've been able to restore the legitimate authority of the presidency."

Bush's actions and Congress' response matter beyond his own tenure at the White House. They set precedents for future administrations and courts, though presidential powers have surged and ebbed through U.S. history.

Legal historian Kermit Hall says Bush is "in a class" with Richard Nixon and Woodrow Wilson during World War I in extending presidential authority. Tom Mann, a congressional scholar at the Brookings Institution, says Bush has exceeded even the expansive view that Franklin Roosevelt took of the presidency during the buildup to World War II.

Analysts credit Bush's ability to prevail in large part to the aftermath of 9/11, which buttressed Americans' backing for a president with the power to battle a shadowy and terrifying foe. In the fiercely partisan climate of Washington, the Republican-controlled House and Senate generally have lined up behind Bush, not challenged him.

"For five years, this Congress has been breathtakingly supine in the face of the most aggressive assertions of executive power we have seen in modern American history," Mann says. Even now, he says, the House "blowback" over the Jefferson search "probably wouldn't have happened if we didn't have a president whose popularity is in the low 30s."

Bush's dismal job-approval ratings have made critics in Congress and elsewhere more willing to confront him. Another factor: As time passes since 9/11, the threat of terrorism remains a potent argument but may no longer automatically trump other issues.

DOJ_NMG_0031920

Now, about half of Americans surveyed by USA TODAY/Gallup from Thursday to Sunday say the Bush administration has "gone too far in expanding the power of the presidency." About one-third say it has struck the right balance. Just 14% say it hasn't gone far enough.

Congress' outrage over the search of Jefferson's office hasn't struck a sympathetic chord with the public, though. In an ABC News Poll taken last week, 86% said the FBI acted properly.

Of two dozen letters to the editor to USA TODAY on the issue, many derided Congress for countenancing corruption. Several wondered why lawmakers hadn't shown equal outrage over, say, the warrantless-surveillance program. Not one praised the institution for defending separation of powers.

Even some lawmakers are skeptical about Congress' commitment to the issue. "This is a newfound interest," says Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn. "I hope it extends beyond just protecting ourselves."

How Bush Has Asserted Powers Of The Executive (USAT)

USA Today, June 6, 2006

The Bush administration has asserted broad executive powers, among them:

•To keep deliberations private — Vice President Cheney's energy task force in 2001 refused to release the names of industry executives consulted during its deliberations. A U.S. District Court judge in December 2002 dismissed a lawsuit by the non-partisan General Accounting Office seeking the information.

•To restrict access to presidential papers — Bush signed an executive order in 2001 permitting current and former presidents and vice presidents to restrict release of their papers, which under a 1978 law become available 12 years after the end of an administration.

•To set aside laws and treaties — Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, in his previous job as White House counsel, issued a memo asserting that the president could violate federal laws and international treaties when he viewed it as necessary for the nation's security.

•To interpret and curtail new laws — Bush has issued more than 750 "signing statements" — more than all previous presidents combined — to state his own interpretation of new laws and in some cases to claim a presidential prerogative not to enforce provisions that he says encroach on executive authority.

•To permit warrantless surveillance on certain domestic phone calls — Bush authorized the National Security Agency to wiretap domestic phone calls of terror suspects without a court warrant if one of the participants on the call is abroad. The White House cites his constitutional powers and a congressional resolution passed within days of 9/11.

•To limit judicial oversight — The president claims the authority to designate U.S. citizens as "enemy combatants" who can be held indefinitely without charges, a stance upheld last year in a decision by the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals. He also has asserted the right to hold terror suspects overseas and try them before special military commissions. The Supreme Court is expected to issue a ruling this month in a case on the issue.

When Reality No Longer Matches Rhetoric (FT)

By Michael Fullilove

Financial Times, June 6, 2006

President George W. Bush is well known for his verbal awkardness. Sometimes it is hard not to be disheartened by his speeches – for example, when he told a New Hampshire audience: "I know how hard it is for you to put food on your families."

In fact, though, many of the president's speeches – in particular his foreign policy speeches after 9/11 – are beautifully written and more than competently delivered. Starting with his ad-libbed bullhorn cry atop a wrecked fire truck at Ground Zero ("I can hear you. The rest of the world hears you. And the people who knocked these buildings down will hear all of us soon!") and his address to a joint session of Congress nine days after the attack, he has generally struck a fine note. If anything, Mr Bush's foreign policy speechifying suffers from the opposite problem: he is too verbal.

Many policy wonks and diplomats are nervous nellies when it comes to foreign policy speeches. They want more matter and less art. They argue that foreign policy is technical and difficult stuff, and flashiness is fatal. Of course it is true that care must be taken, shouting avoided, pronunciations checked and all the rest of it. That does not mean that foreign policy speeches need be boring. In the end, a speech is just a speech. A speech is not a treaty and drafting a speech should not be like negotiating a diplomatic text.

Foreign policy speeches that have flair as well as substance are able to mobilise support and crystallise intent. Franklin D. Roosevelt used his fireside chats to dramatise a distant war, convert America into "the great arsenal of democracy" and ratchet up public preparedness to enter the European conflict. Ronald Reagan assembled his words and sent them into battle against the evil empire: "Mr Gorbachev, tear down this wall!"

However, a declaratory presidency also poses dangers. Mr Bush has badly overwritten his foreign policy, in two distinct ways. For most of his first term, Mr Bush pursued a muscular grand strategy aimed at imposing America's will on the world. He was the Charles Atlas of international relations. To reinforce his seriousness he delivered speeches that were strangers to nuance. They drew an explicit link between values and coercion, between freedom and force.

The reference in the 2002 State of the Union address to the "axis of evil" formed by Iran, Iraq and North Korea was the world's worst analogy: inflammatory, operationally useless and bad history to boot. On the same occasion the following year, Mr Bush upped the ante further by making a dubious assertion about Saddam Hussein's supposed hunt for uranium in Africa.

It is hard to avoid the conclusion that the sustained power of Mr Bush's language nudged the administration (and perhaps the president himself) toward risky policies that have proved costly.

Past US presidents have used their speeches to marshal the opinion of the world. Sometimes they have honeyed their words in order to sweeten their unilateral actions. The sweeping, unqualified tone of Mr Bush's rhetoric, by contrast, actually exaggerated the defects of his policies and scared off even the most ardent Americanophiles. Not only did his speeches reveal little understanding of the dilemma of multiple and diverse audiences, they also explicitly denied that such a dilemma existed. At West Point in 2002, for instance, the president decreed: "Moral truth is the same in every culture, in every time, and in every place . . . We are in a conflict between good and evil, and America will call evil by its name."

Thankfully, in the past two years US policy has reverted to a more moderate course. The failure of foreign policy adventurism, especially in Iraq, has made diplomacy the comeback concept. Washington's conditional offer to join its European partners in negotiating directly with Tehran on the nuclear issue is the latest and clearest indicator of this shift.

Strangely, though, the old highfalutin speaking style remains in place, opening up a chasm between rhetoric and reality.

In his second inaugural address in 2005, President Bush claimed that "America's vital interests and our deepest beliefs are now one" and that US policy was to promote democracy "in every nation and culture, with the ultimate goal of ending tyranny in our world". The problem with that line is that the dream of Middle Eastern dictatorships falling like dominoes ended with Washington's rapprochement with Libya. The White House's reluctance to lean too hard on allies such as Egypt and Pakistan to democratise drains the president's words of meaning.

Even worse than double standards, though, is weakness. The tenor of this year's State of the Union address was surprising because it failed utterly to reflect either the sensible recalibration of policy that has taken place or the present results of US actions. The president boasted: "We will act boldly in freedom's cause" and committed his country to "the end of tyranny in our world". But banging on about the liberty agenda when ordinary Iraqis are not at liberty to walk to the market without being kidnapped or killed is seriously damaging to foreign policy credibility.

A diplomatic briefing note does not usually make a great foreign policy speech. Neither does a string of 10-dollar words. The best speeches are finely crafted arguments. Given America's historical and continuing contribution to global peace and prosperity, any president has a very good argument to make to the world – so long as the language is not privileged over content and effect.

Grassley Sees Quick Paulson Confirmation (AP-Y2)

By Martin Crutsinger

AP2, June 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0031922

Henry Paulson Jr. met Monday with the head of the Senate Finance Committee, who predicted that President Bush's selection as Treasury secretary could be confirmed and on the job by early July.

Committee Chairman Charles Grassley, R-Iowa, said he and Paulson had a productive meeting and that he believed the nomination could win Senate approval before Congress leaves for the July 4 break.

Grassley praised Paulson, chief executive of the Wall Street investment firm Goldman Sachs, for the "vast amount of experience" he will bring to the job. The 45-minute meeting marked the beginning of a round of courtesy visits Paulson will make in coming days to hear the concerns of senators.

With his approval rating at record lows despite strong economic growth and low unemployment, Bush announced last week that he was turning to Paulson to replace Treasury Secretary John Snow, whose departure had been rumored for more than a year.

By choosing a 32-year veteran of one of Wall Street's premier investment houses, the administration is hoping for the same economic credibility that President Clinton gained when he picked Robert Rubin, one of Paulson's predecessors at Goldman Sachs, as one of his Treasury secretaries.

Paulson's selection was the latest shake-up for Bush, who in recent weeks has tapped his budget director to become the new White House chief of staff, moved his trade negotiator to the budget job and replaced the head of the Central Intelligence Agency.

Paulson did not talk to reporters after his meeting with Grassley.

Grassley said the two covered a wide range of issues from the importance of overhauling the nation's complex tax code to the need to apply pressure to China to revalue its currency as a way of dealing with America's soaring trade deficit.

The administration's nomination of Susan Schwab to replace Rob Portman in the trade job has been held up because of unhappiness by Sen. Charles Schumer (news, bio, voting record), D-N.Y., over what Schumer sees as a failure by the administration to pressure China to allow American banks and other financial service companies to operate in China.

Schwab's nomination had cleared Grassley's committee, but a vote expected before Congress left for a weeklong Memorial Day recess was delayed because of Schumer's concerns.

Grassley told reporters he would have a better idea on whether Schwab's nomination could now go forward after Schumer and Schwab hold a planned meeting on Tuesday.

Treasury Nominee Has Ties To China (WP)

By Paul Blustein

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

In an administration with just 2 1/2 years to go, Henry M. Paulson Jr., President Bush's nominee for Treasury secretary, may have little chance to make a mark on many economic issues. The administration's tax policies were pretty much set in Bush's first term, and its more recent big economic initiative, aimed at revamping Social Security, is moribund.

But one issue on which Paulson can surely exert influence is the U.S. relationship with China. The Treasury secretary has formal responsibility for some major decisions to be made in coming months, such as whether to label Beijing a "currency manipulator." And when it comes to cutting deals with Beijing, few U.S. business executives can match Paulson's record.

As chairman and chief executive of Goldman Sachs Group Inc., Paulson has aggressively led the firm's foray into the Chinese market, where it has become a dominant player in selling the securities of China's biggest companies to investors abroad. He takes pride in having visited China more than 70 times since 1992 and has cultivated relationships with Chinese officials at the highest levels. President Hu Jintao, for example, chose Paulson as his host when he visited the New York Stock Exchange in 2002.

To supporters of warm relations between Washington and Beijing, a Paulson-led Treasury bears the promise of a heightened level of sophistication in dealing with thorny transpacific problems, especially China's policy concerning its currency, the yuan. The administration has had only limited success in persuading China to allow a rise in the exchange rate of the yuan, which U.S. manufacturers complain is artificially cheap, giving Chinese exporters an unfair competitive edge. With his deep knowledge of China's financial system and long experience dealing with the country's officials, Paulson is ideally suited to bring Beijing around, according to many experts.

"He knows the people. They've trusted him. He can draw on that in the national interest," said C. Fred Bergsten, director of the Institute for International Economics, who is one of the most outspoken advocates among economists for a change in China's currency system. "This is exactly why you want somebody like that for a job like this."

But the U.S. Business and Industry Council, a group with a history of agitating for tough policies toward Beijing, is arguing that Paulson's associations pose a conflict of interest. Although Paulson is expected to sever his links to Goldman by disposing of his stock in the firm -- presumably by putting the shares in a blind trust, which would then sell them -- he would still feel obligated to Chinese officials, in the view of Kevin L. Kearns, the president of the group, which represents about 1,500 small and medium-size companies.

"Mr. Paulson has actively courted Beijing during his tenure at Goldman Sachs," said Kearns in a statement. "His key clients have included the Beijing government and several state-owned Chinese firms. Are we to believe that Mr. Paulson will do a sudden about-face and crack down on many of Beijing's aggressive violations of internationally accepted trade law?"

Kearns noted that as Treasury chief, Paulson would chair the interagency task force that scrutinizes foreign acquisitions of U.S. businesses for national security problems -- the panel that drew widespread criticism during the controversy over Dubai's proposed takeover of terminal operations at U.S. ports. "Would Mr. Paulson act to block Chinese attempts to purchase strategic American assets?" Kearns asked, adding that the answer is probably not because Paulson would be inclined to "use his position in the cabinet to urge continued appeasement of China." He was on Capitol Hill yesterday, hoping to drum up opposition to the nomination.

A Goldman spokesman, Peter Rose, said Paulson would not comment pending his Senate confirmation hearing, but he scoffed at the conflict-of-interest accusation. "When Mr. Paulson becomes secretary of the Treasury, he will have totally divorced his interests from those of Goldman Sachs," he said. "The claim that he has a conflict would mean that only the ignorant could be appointed to a Cabinet position."

Goldman officials readily acknowledge that the firm has managed -- usually together with one or two other major firms -- nearly every important international securities offering by big Chinese companies.

In 1997, the firm was lead manager for a $3 billion stock sale of the country's major cellphone company -- the first issuance of shares by a big, high-tech Chinese company to investors overseas. Another, similar-size deal in which Goldman played the lead role was the 2000 sale of shares in PetroChina, the nation's flagship oil company. Just last week, Goldman co-managed the $9.73 billion sale of shares in the Bank of China -- the world's biggest initial public offering in six years. Goldman was also the first Western firm to be allowed to gain a controlling interest in a Chinese investment bank.

Paulson's role in negotiating those transactions was "very crucial," said Robert D. Hormats, vice chairman of Goldman's international business, adding that Paulson "really immersed himself in a lot of activities in China." Those include serving as chairman of the advisory board of the management school at Tsinghua University, one of the country's most prestigious institutions.

"There's a difference between having a good relationship with the Chinese and being cozy with them," said Hormats, who said Paulson "is as good as anyone around in negotiating with them." Hormats said, "I've been going to China since the early '70s, and if there's one thing I've learned, it's that you get more progress from the Chinese if they respect you and think you understand them."

So far, there is little evidence that the issue will cause Paulson problems in his confirmation. Even Sen. Charles E. Schumer (D-N.Y.), one of the most militant lawmakers on the currency issue and a member of the Senate Finance Committee, which will consider the nomination, said he was more impressed than bothered by Paulson's business ties.

"My view is, he will understand the need to get results," said Schumer, who has spoken many times with Paulson. "And he will have a good chance of getting it done."

Restructuring At State Department `botched,' Retiree Says (KRT)

By Warren P. Strobel

DOJ_NMG_0031924

Knight Ridder, June 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - A reorganization of the State Department offices that are leading the fight against weapons of mass destruction was badly managed and politicized, which led to a flight of experts with decades of knowledge, according to a new account by a veteran weapons expert.

Dean Rust, who watched the reorganization unfold, charges that its "botched implementation" led many career officers to leave and "will hamper the State Department's role at home and abroad for years to come."

The account by Rust, who left the department last September, appears in the upcoming issue of Arms Control Today magazine, published by the nonpartisan Arms Control Association. It's scheduled to be posted Tuesday on the group's Web site.

Knight Ridder first reported in February about problems in State Department offices that deal with weapons proliferation, one of President Bush's national security priorities.

The reorganization, which Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced last July, ostensibly was done to strengthen the department's ability to counter 21st-century weapons threats.

But, according to numerous officials and documents, it was carried out largely in secret by a panel composed of political appointees, it denied top jobs to career officials who had clashed with former Undersecretary of State John Bolton and it ran counter to some recommendations by the department's inspector general.

Robert Joseph, Bolton's successor as the department's top arms-control official, told Arms Control Today in an interview that "the reorganization was not politically motivated," according to excerpts that the magazine provided.

The new structure, he said, will allow the United States to better address threats from Iran, North Korea and terrorists seeking mass-destruction weapons.

But a State Department official said Monday that the office that dealt with nuclear diplomacy toward Iran, North Korea and other countries had lost five of its 12 employees and two more were on their way out.

The official and others spoke on condition of anonymity, fearing retaliation.

Three senior female employees who were denied promotions in the reorganization have left or are leaving and, according to current and former officials, one has sued alleging gender discrimination.

Undersecretary of State for Management Henrietta Fore appointed a panel to review the reorganization earlier this year, the officials said. But its mandate is limited to assessing bureaus' work load under the new management structure.

Rust, a veteran with 35 years' experience, said in a telephone interview that he was "very dismayed with the decisions" made by political appointees but would have retired last year in any event.

"Undoubtedly, this is not the first time that sub-Cabinet-level political appointees have hijacked a reorganization to pursue their own agenda," Rust wrote. Rice, he said, "can still salvage some aspects of this unfortunate situation, but she needs to move quickly."

Now Playing In Senate: A GOP Double Bill (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

Republican voters, are you paying attention?

Because this week's Senate agenda is all about you, with debates scheduled on same-sex marriage and a permanent repeal of the estate tax.

At least through tomorrow, the Senate will consider a proposed constitutional amendment to define marriage as the union between a man and a woman. Republican leaders, including President Bush and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.), a potential 2008 White House candidate, believe Senate action is vital because of recent federal court intervention.

DOJ_NMG_0031925

For Democrats, the issue is a tricky one. They recognize the issue's sensitivity, and many -- including Senate Minority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) -- personally oppose same-sex marriage. Indeed, Democrats have focused their objections on changing the Constitution, which has typically been amended in order to expand rights, not restrict them.

"I am confident that the American people will see this for what it is: a mean-spirited attempt to score political points in an election year," said Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.).

Later in the week, the Senate is expected to consider a permanent repeal of the estate tax, which Bush phased out as part of his first-term tax relief package, but after a one-year hiatus, in 2010, the levy phases back into existence.

Most Democrats object to full repeal as a giveaway to the super-rich, but Republicans believe the estate tax, which they call the "death tax," is unfair because it taxes some income twice. Conservatives are considering a compromise that would shield all but the wealthiest estates, and some moderate Democrats are interested in a similar approach.

But first, business groups want to put senators on the spot with a vote on full repeal. Pro-repeal organizations are targeting possible swing votes such as Sens. Mary Landrieu (D-La.), Max Baucus (D-Mont.) and Olympia J. Snowe (R-Maine) and Susan Collins (R-Maine).

Another lobbying campaign, this one by repeal opponents, features an ad with blond woman in a slinky dress and asserts, "The last thing a rich heiress needs is a $1 trillion raise in her allowance."

In a letter to senators, a group of former advisers to President Bill Clinton notes that 997 out of 1,000 estates are not subject to the tax under current law.

The House, meanwhile, will consider legislation to expand oil refinery capacity, an overhaul of telecommunications law, and appropriations bills for foreign operations, homeland security and legislative expenses.

House and Senate negotiators also this week will try to complete a final emergency spending bill for the Iraq war and Hurricane Katrina recovery costs. Sticking points include $4 billion in agriculture assistance, port security spending and subsidies to the commercial fishing industry. Another hurdle is how to spend about $2 billion in border security improvements, with Bush wanting to add National Guard troops, and Sen. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) pressing for equipment replacements, including helicopters and patrol vehicles.Opposition to Nominee

Some retired military officers have served notice that if conservatives keep pressing for a Senate confirmation vote for judicial nominee William J. Haynes II, it won't come without a fight.

Haynes, the Defense Department's general counsel, is President Bush's choice for a seat on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 4th Circuit. Democrats have opposed Haynes since 2003, and now some Republicans are joining them. They object to his role as the Pentagon's top lawyer when controversial policies were adopted regarding harsh treatment of detainees captured in Afghanistan, Iraq and elsewhere.

The conservative group Committee for Justice has launched a telephone and e-mail campaign against one of those Republicans, Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (S.C.). Last week, some retired military lawyers came to Graham's defense, sending letters to the Judiciary Committee that call Haynes unfit for a lifetime appointment to the appellate court.

Haynes's "unwillingness to listen to others caused him to preside over the DOD legal system during the time of its greatest debacle in memory, the abuse of detainees by military personnel around the world," wrote John D. Hutson, a retired rear admiral who was a senior Navy lawyer. Donald J. Guter, who held the same rank, wrote that he doubted Haynes would have the independence or judgment to oppose unwise policies being pushed by his superiors.

Among those praising Haynes in letters to the committee is Bernard D. Meltzer, a retired law professor and former assistant trial counsel in the trials before the International Military Tribunal in Nuremberg. Meltzer wrote that he got to know Haynes while consulting with the Pentagon and that "I was impressed by his informed and sensitive concern for the rights and legitimate interests of those who might be tried before a military commission."

Spending Bill Still Includes Extra Katrina Aid (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0031926

WASHINGTON -- A $92.2 billion wartime spending bill taking shape in Congress has been cut substantially since passing the Senate last month but still provides at least $2 billion more in Katrina aid than the White House first requested.

House-Senate negotiators will meet tonight in hopes of expediting passage by Congress this week, and Republicans are confident they can avoid a veto fight with President Bush. But the deal rests heavily on borrowing against Federal Emergency Management Agency disaster funds, and that means FEMA will have to come back sooner to Congress for more money, quite possibly this fall.

More than two-thirds, or $67 billion, of the bill would pay for defense and intelligence activities, including military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan. Tentative agreements would spend more than the White House requested to buy armored Bradley fighting vehicles and V-22 Osprey and KC-130J aircraft.

Disputes remain over the precise makeup of a $1.9 billion border-security initiative proposed by Mr. Bush. But the more protracted fight has been over Katrina aid and how much flexibility to give states struggling to recover.

The bill is expected to provide $5.2 billion in community-development block grants or $1 billion more than the president's request. An estimated $250 million in additional educational funds would be included as well as about $500 million in agriculture-related assistance. Within FEMA accounts, up to $400 million is proposed to help build "Katrina cottages" -- more resilient temporary housing than the trailers now used.

Senate Appropriations Committee Chairman Thad Cochran (R., Miss.), who first proposed to add more than $4.6 billion in extra hurricane aid, has dropped a $700 million request to relocate a CSX Corp. rail line in his state. But over the objections of the House, he is still pursuing federal funds to move a Coast Guard station in Gulfport, Miss., thereby opening up the nearly three-acre waterfront site for commercial development.

The idea of Coast Guard funds being used for a renewal project is controversial -- especially if casinos might be involved.

Mississippi state officials said they are offering a larger four-acre site for the Coast Guard and hope to better rationalize the distribution of big and small craft in the harbor. Brent Warr, Gulfport's mayor, and Gray Swoope of the Mississippi Development Authority said there no plans for a casino on the station's site. But Mayor Warr acknowledged that one goal is to give more latitude to a private developer assembling a larger Gulfport land package for renewal.

"There could be casinos in the area but not on that site," he said.

Mr. Bush waited until the middle of last month before announcing his $1.9 billion border-security initiative, which has complicated the talks on two fronts.

Sen. Judd Gregg (R., N.H.), who oversees the Department of Homeland Security's budget, has complained that the president's plan is tilted too heavily toward personnel and shortchanges capital needs for new equipment. At the same time, Mr. Bush has insisted that the $1.9 billion be absorbed within his prior defense request, requiring House and Senate negotiators to go back and recalculate their own proposals.

For example, the House had approved $250 million for Bradley fighting vehicles, but that's now expected to be scaled back to $175 million. The additional House and Senate aircraft purchases -- two of the KC-130J and three V-22 Ospreys -- were preserved. But $100 million to buy the Army's improved recovery vehicle -- able to tow damaged tanks -- is expected to be dropped.

Negotiators To Meet On Iraq, Relief Funds (AP)

By Andrew Taylor

AP, June 5, 2006

Hoping to speed approval of war funds, House-Senate negotiators were to meet Tuesday evening on legislation to pay for the missions in Iraq and Afghanistan and for hurricane relief along the Gulf Coast.

After missing a Memorial Day deadline, negotiators hope to seal agreement this week. The White House says a money crunch is threatening military operations and training accounts, especially for the Army, and could slow training and equipping of Iraqi soldiers.

DOJ_NMG_0031927

"It's imperative that Congress finish its work and get this to the president to sign," said Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman. "This supplemental went up in February. It's now June." He said the Army will impose a civilian hiring freeze Tuesday and has cut spending on spare parts, transportation and travel.

House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis, R-Calif., and Senate counterpart Thad Cochran, R-Miss., are leading the talks and have agreed to live within a White House demand that the emergency funding bill be limited to $92.2 billion for the Iraq and Afghanistan wars and hurricanes — plus $2.3 billion to combat bird flu.

The underlying bill would provide about $66 billion for Pentagon costs such as military operations and maintenance, weapons procurement, personnel and an initiative to locate and disarm roadside bombs. Another approximately $20 billion would go for hurricane relief and reconstruction, including new and rebuilt flood control projects for New Orleans, housing aid for Louisiana and replenishing the Federal Emergency Management Agency's Disaster Relief Fund.

The overall limit has meant dumping or dramatically scaling back Senate initiatives like $4 billion in agriculture disaster assistance to farmers to help them deal with high fuel prices and damage from floods and droughts last year. The move promises to dismay Senate GOP sponsors of the farm aid such as Conrad Burns of Montana, embroiled in a very difficult re-election bid.

An additional $648 million obtained by Sen. Robert Byrd (news, bio, voting record), D-W.Va., to beef up security at U.S. ports is to be dropped, while $1.2 billion in aid for the Gulf Coast fishing and seafood industry obtained by Sen. Richard Shelby (news, bio, voting record), R-Ala., will be sharply scaled back.

Meanwhile, a conservative group announced an ad campaign in three states aimed at pressuring Senators to drop several controversial homestate projects from the bill. Top among the targets of Americans for Prosperity is a $700 million Senate plan to pay CSX Transportation to abandon a recently repaired freight rail line to Mississippi to use the right of way for a new East-West highway.

"A bill to fund our war against terrorism is held hostage to pork-barrel spending," Duane Sand, a veteran of Iraq, says in the ad, to be run in Rhode Island, Michigan and West Virginia.

In fact, negotiators are expected to eventually drop the Mississippi rail line relocation as well as the bulk of more than $14 billion in Senate add-ons unrequested by President Bush. Still, FEMA funding would be cut below the White House's $7.2 billion request to fund lawmaker priorities, which could mean FEMA might need another infusion of cash before Election Day.

A key remaining challenge for negotiators is devising a compromise border security plan.

Bush's $1.9 billion border security plan is focused on hiring 1,000 new Border Patrol officers and sending 6,000 National Guard troops to help secure the Mexican border. A rival Senate plan, sponsored by Judd Gregg, R-N.H., and also budgeted for $1.9 billion, focuses on capital needs such as helicopters, Coast Guard vessels and vehicles.

House, Senate Tension Fuels Impasse (RC)

By Erin P. Billings And Ben Pershing

Roll Call, June 6, 2006

As Congress gets back to work this week, the Republican majority faces the daunting task of trying to advance several big-ticket legislative items amid a sometimes strained relationship between the two chambers.

House and Senate Republicans will not only wrestle with their Democratic opponents, but in some cases with each other, as they look to complete an emergency supplemental spending bill for Iraq and Hurricane Katrina recovery, as well as a pension bill, immigration reform and a lobby overhaul package.

The majority views passage of these as key to bolstering its chances in the November elections, along with consideration of several other measures important to the GOP base, including an anti-gay-marriage amendment, abolition of the estate tax and energy legislation.

GOP tensions have risen in both chambers over some of the most hotly contested bills this year, leaving some to wonder whether the party can come together quickly enough to pass them in the time that remains in this Congress. Immigration and the emergency spending bill are the most high-profile measures on which Republicans have faced internal battles over how far to go in this election year.

DOJ_NMG_0031928

"From the inside, it looks completely as if we are in a free-fall, chaotic mix," acknowledged one GOP Senate aide. "We are debating amongst ourselves for competing proposals. We do have some differences, but ours are only visible because we have the spotlight on us."

But this aide said: "Without a doubt, we need to realize that we need to be fighting the Democrats and not ourselves."

"There's always this natural tension between the House and the Senate that is almost imprinted on everyone's DNA," added a House Republican leadership aide. "That always tends to create a tough work environment."

At the same time, the House aide said, "for as many House folks as there are who hold grudges, there are other folks who 30 seconds later forget they're mad at the Senate. The bottom line is we have to put points on the board. We'll be judged at the polls."

In part, the GOP infighting can be attributed to the inherent differences between the two chambers: The House is known for striking a more conservative tone, while the Senate is viewed as more of a consensus-building body.

But beyond that, Republicans say they currently lack the powerful mediator they once enjoyed in President Bush, whose poll numbers continue to lag and who lacks the political capital he had just a year ago.

And the GOP is facing pressure from a conservative base seeking to move it to the right while trying to appeal to a broader electorate.

Another House Republican leadership aide described the current state of House-Senate relations as "decent" and said the attitude of House leaders toward their Senate counterparts was "trust but verify."

GOP Senate sources said Republicans in both chambers know they must spend the next couple of months working together to try to get as much done as possible. The closer to November they get, the more difficult it will become to advance legislation against a Democratic Party looking to deny the GOP any victories to take to the voters.

"Most people recognize that accomplishment on good bills is important to Republicans in both houses," another well-placed Senate GOP aide said. "We've got enough gridlock coming from the Democrats. We don't need to create any of our own."

Added another Republican aide: "We're joined at the hip, so it's imperative that we pass legislation that is going to give our guys ammo when they head back home and campaign this fall."

Republicans in both chambers agreed that they can set aside their differences on most of the major items, with the exception of immigration reform, where the parties in the two bodies are in starkly different camps. Republicans privately concede that it could be an impossible task to advance a comprehensive bill this year. Instead, they may have to settle for a watered-down version that can meet the test of both chambers.

"Immigration will prove if we can all pull in the same direction or not," a Republican Senate staffer said.

The path to completion for an immigration bill also is complicated by differing opinions over whether a mediocre bill is better than no bill at all.

House Republicans are convinced that the public — and particularly the GOP's base — supports their enforcement-only bill more than the Senate's comprehensive approach, leading some lawmakers to say privately that they would rather run in November on the House-passed bill than on a potentially weaker conference report.

But other Members and aides believe Republicans will be punished at the polls even more if no bill makes it to the president's desk.

Separately, conferees are currently hammering out a compromise on the supplemental spending bill — the Senate version of which came out nearly $14 billion bigger than the House version. President Bush has threatened to veto the measure if it comes to his desk much above the $94 billion mark.

But appropriators, known for their bipartisan approach to working through spending bills, are expected to come up with a conference report within the coming days. Those lawmakers will be called on again when some of the regular appropriations bills come up, although few are expected to advance before Nov. 7.

As for other pending bills, immigration conferees should be named within the coming days, while lawmakers in both chambers are seeking to strike final deals on the pension bill and lobbying reform. Republicans also say they may be able to advance legislation targeted at gas prices as well as small-scale health care reforms this year.

DOJ_NMG_0031929

One GOP Senate aide said that even while Republicans struggle among each other on some of the pending legislation, there are areas where the party can and will continue to agree.

Expect Republicans, led by Bush, to continue to talk up the country's economic success and to press for heightened fiscal discipline — an area that has produced electoral gains for the party in the past but has been overshadowed by a ballooning federal deficit in recent years.

"You are going to hear a lot more about spending — and that's something most of us in both houses can agree on," a Republican aide said.

Study Finds Thousands Of Trips Taken By Lawmakers, Staff (KRT)

By James Kuhnhenn

Knight Ridder, June 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - Join Congress, see the world. Join a congressman's staff, see more of it.

Private groups, corporations or trade associations - many with legislation that could affect them pending before Congress - paid nearly $50 million since 2000 to send members of Congress and their staffers on at least 23,000 trips overseas and within the United States, according to a study released Monday.

The trips included at least 200 journeys to Paris and 150 to Hawaii, room rates of up to $500 a night and some high-flying on corporate jets that cost up to $25,000 a trip, according to a report by the Center for Public Integrity, American Public Media and Northwestern University's Medill News Service.

"Some trips seem to have been little more than pricey vacations - often taken in the company of spouses or other relatives - wrapped around speeches or seminars," the report said. "In many instances, trip sponsors appeared to be buying access to elected officials or their advisers."

Congressional aides took more than 70 percent of the trips, the study found.

While the travel isn't illegal, the report shines a light on how business is often done in Washington. It comes in a congressional election year when one of the biggest issues is corruption.

The findings also emerged as Congress remains deadlocked on legislation that would restrict contacts with lobbyists and impose new ethics standards on members. As scandals have emerged over the past two years, lawmakers moved to ban privately financed travel and do away with meals and gifts from lobbyists. Eventually, both the House of Representatives and Senate passed versions of ethics legislation, though neither banned privately financed travel. Negotiations to reconcile differences in the bills haven't begun.

Under current law, lobbyists are prohibited from paying for congressional travel. But a federal investigation into former lobbyist Jack Abramoff uncovered a scheme in which Abramoff used nonprofit groups to pay for extravagant Scottish golf outings for members and staffers.

A separate study by Political Money Line, a nonpartisan Washington watchdog group, has found that the number of privately financed trips by members of Congress declined this year. Between 2000 and 2005, members of Congress logged an average of 1,100 trips a year. As of April of this year, members had reported 291 trips.

Advocates of tighter ethics rules said the recent travel decline reflects public attention to the Abramoff scandal and others.

"As soon as the attention starts to fade, the travel will start to increase," said Fred Wertheimer, president of Democracy 21, a watchdog group.

The study released Monday found that Rep. Tom DeLay, R-Texas, and his aides accepted about $500,000 in trips since 2000. DeLay is resigning from Congress on Friday under a cloud cast by the investigation into Abramoff, who arranged trips for him.

The top 10 travelers identified in the study are all members of the House of Representatives and include House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio. Spokesman Kevin Madden said Boehner met all congressional requirements for his travel, including prompt and public disclosure.

"Travel funded by private interests relieves taxpayers of having to cover the costs of educational travel," Madden said.

DOJ_NMG_0031930

According to the study, among the top corporate sponsors of travel was General Atomic, a San Diego-based high-tech firm that has developed surveillance aircraft as well as wireless and laser technologies. The company spent $660,000 on 86 trips for lawmakers, staff and spouses from 2000 to mid-2005, the study said.

The company, which developed the Predator spy plane, didn't immediately comment.

The private organization that spent the most on travel is the Aspen Institute, an educational organization that paid about $3.5 million to send lawmakers and their spouses to high-level conferences around the globe.

The institute's congressional program began in 1983 and is run by former Sen. Dick Clark, D-Iowa. It is nonpartisan and accepts money only from foundations, not corporations. The institute defended its travel policy, noting that by getting out of Washington, members can concentrate on subjects that are likely to come before Congress.

"The idea behind this is that senators are so distracted they never give enough focus to one issue," Aspen Institute spokesman James Spiegelman said.

Watchdog groups say groups such as Aspen generally fulfill a useful purpose and that lawmakers should try to write legislation that distinguishes between non-corporate educational travel and that paid for by corporations or industry groups.

"The lines are hard to draw because some of the fact-finding trips give people access to special interests," said Dennis Thompson, director of Harvard's Edmond J. Safra Foundation Center for Ethics.

Trip Study Finds More Was Spent On Aides Than Lawmakers (NYT)

By Kate Phillips

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 5 — Congressional aides took $30 million in trips paid for by private groups from 2000 through mid-2005, surpassing the privately sponsored travel of their bosses by nearly $10 million over the same time, according to a new analysis of publicly disclosed travel expenses.

Together, aides and members of the House and Senate filed 23,000 public disclosure forms on their individual trips, the survey found, for an estimated price tag of about $50 million. Among the most popular destinations were Paris (at least 200 times), Hawaii (150) and Italy (140).

Congressional travel paid for by outside organizations like trade groups and corporations has been under intense scrutiny following scandals involving the lobbyist Jack Abramoff. While much attention has been focused on elected officials and corporate jet travel with lobbyists, the new study, conducted by the Center for Public Integrity, Medill News Service of Northwestern University and American Public Media programs, is the most extensive in recent years because it tallied the costs, purpose and destinations of trips by Congressional aides and politicians.

The study concluded that about 90 of the trips were paid for by lobbyists, which is an ethical violation, during the five and a half years examined. About 500 trips cost $10,000 or more each, and 16 cost $25,000 or more apiece, the study showed. About $20 million was spent on overseas travel.

Wendell Rawls, acting executive director of the Center for Public Integrity, a nonpartisan group that has conducted many investigations of money and politics over the years, said Monday that some trips could be considered legitimate for educational purposes. But he pointed out that the study found multiple ethics violations from members of both political parties, and that many trips were paid for by corporations that had business interests before Congress.

Mr. Rawls also questioned the amount of spending on some trips. For example, he said, former Representative Thomas Bliley, Republican of Virginia, and his wife went to London at a cost of $31,171 for four days in July 2000. Their air travel tickets were valued at $11,938.49 each, and were paid for by the Brown and Williamson tobacco company. The former congressman's public filings listed the purpose of the trip as meetings with officials from British American Tobacco and other trade officials.

"I would ask if every constituent for Representative Bliley had the same access as the people at Brown, Williamson," Mr. Rawls said of the former chairman of the House Commerce Committee. Mr. Bliley could not be reached for comment.

The study turned up other interesting educational travel and irregularities. Congressman Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York, has amended his forms for a trip in 2000 to Cuba, where he met with Fidel Castro. He first violated ethics rules by accepting travel expenses for his son and his wife, on a trip that was supposed to address the plight of endangered birds. But confronted with the center's findings, Mr. Rangel recently reimbursed and identified additional sponsors for his son's travel and for the trip; the sponsors included one of his longtime fund-raisers, John Catsimatidis of Gristede's Foods in New York, and the Cuban government. George A. Dalley, Mr. Rangel's chief of staff, said he erred in not knowing the reporting rules.

The study singled out General Atomics, a company based in San Diego that developed the Predator, the unmanned spy plane, because it spent more — $660,000 — on Congressional travel than any other corporation on lone-sponsor trips. The study noted that General Atomics seemed to favor trips for Congressional staff members and aides. Among those on trips to Turkey in 2004 or to Australia in 2005 were aides to Representative Randy Cunningham, a California Republican who has since been convicted of bribery and other crimes, and an aide to Senator Harry Reid, the Nevada Democrat who is minority leader.

The study said that some aides sat in on sales meetings that company officials held with foreign government officials, although the aides later told the survey's interviewers that they did not engage in sales pitches.

Gary Hopper, a vice president for General Atomics' Washington offices, said: "We wouldn't mix any kind of sales situation with Congressional staff there. I know that's a bone of contention with a lot of people out there but there was not in any way a quid pro quo."

Democrats, Republicans and lobbying associations all say that travel has slowed since the scandals over the Scotland golfing trips by Representative Tom DeLay received headlines last year and put a spotlight on Congressional travel.

Paul A. Miller, the president of the American League of Lobbyists, defended travel by lobbyists and elected officials. "Since the scandal, a lot of the travel has ceased to exist or members of Congress have been very diligent by what trips we go on," Mr. Miller said. "These trips are valuable experiences for members of Congress and their staffs. If the public doesn't pay for it and the private sector doesn't pay for it, the government isn't going to pick up the tab for it."

The House and Senate have passed legislation that would require additional disclosure for lobbying, but neither bill would place a permanent ban on privately sponsored travel. It is unclear what will emerge from a House-Senate conference committee.

The Center for Public Integrity was forced last year to withdraw a study it conducted on White House travel because of a flawed database that inflated the amount of money spent as well as the number of staff members. To avoid such errors this time, Mr. Rawls said the center pored over the 26,000 pages of travel documents individually, hired outside consultants to comb the data and the findings, and made conservative estimates of the data tallies.

Privately Funded Trips Add Up On Capitol Hill (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

Over 5 1/2 years, Republican and Democratic lawmakers accepted nearly $50 million in trips, often to resorts and exclusive locales, from corporations and groups seeking legislative favors, according to the most comprehensive study to date on the subject of congressional travel.

From January 2000 through June 2005, House and Senate members and their aides were away from Washington for more than 81,000 days -- a combined 222 years -- on at least 23,000 trips, according to the report, issued yesterday by the nonpartisan Center for Public Integrity. About 2,300 of the trips cost $5,000 or more, at least 500 cost $10,000 or more, and 16 cost $25,000 or more.

"While some of these trips might qualify as legitimate fact-finding missions," the study said, "the purpose of others is less clear." In addition, the lawmakers' financial reports that disclose the details of the trips are routinely riddled with mistakes and omissions.

Lawmakers and their staffers were treated to $25,000 corporate-jet rides and $500-a-night hotel rooms, the study showed. Lawmakers accepted thousands of costly jaunts -- one worth more than $30,000 -- to some of the world's choicest destinations: at least 200 trips to Paris, 150 to Hawaii and 140 to Italy.

"Congressional travelers gave speeches in Scotland, attended meetings in Australia and toured nuclear facilities in Spain," the study reported. "They pondered welfare reform in Scottsdale, Ariz., and the future of Social Security at a Colorado ski resort."

Many congressional offices have voluntarily curtailed their privately funded travel since disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to conspiring to bribe public officials, in part with lavish overseas trips. But lawmakers and their aides still may accept travel for official purposes from private interests without limit.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) proposed banning such travel soon after Abramoff's plea. But lawmakers of both parties and in both chambers of Congress quickly resisted imposing significant new restrictions on the trips, which are a much-prized perk of office. Rep. John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) won election to the post of House majority leader this year by running on a platform that included opposing the travel ban.

Boehner and members of his office were among the top beneficiaries of privately funded travel, according to the study, taking more than 200 trips during the 5 1/2 -year period reviewed. Others included the offices of Rep. Joe Barton (R-Tex.), Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), Rep. Michael G. Oxley (R-Ohio), Rep. Gregory Meeks (D-N.Y.) and Rep. Robert Wexler (D-Fla.).

Kevin Madden, a spokesman for Boehner, said yesterday that privately funded travel by members of Congress is fully disclosed and "leads to greater understanding of the issues" at no cost to taxpayers.

One of the largest corporate sponsors of lawmakers' travel was General Atomics, a relatively small San Diego-based defense contractor that makes the Predator, an unmanned spy plane now in wide use by the United States and other countries. The study reported that the company "largely targeted congressional staff members, spending roughly $660,000 on 86 trips for legislators, aides and their spouses from 2000 to mid-2005." Some of the trips were valued at more than $25,000.

General Atomics' spending on congressional travel was more than that of many larger companies and was considerably higher than what other defense contractors spent. Microsoft, for instance, funded nearly $395,000 in trips during the period; SBC Communications Inc. spent about $205,000. Among General Atomics' defense competitors, Northrop Grumman spent about $12,000 on congressional junkets and Boeing spent about $13,000.

On trips paid for by General Atomics to Turkey and Australia, congressional staffers attended meetings with foreign government officials that the company was soliciting to buy the Predator.

"[It's] useful and very helpful, in fact, when you go down and talk to the government officials, to have congressional people go along and discuss the capabilities of [the plane] with them," Tom Cassidy, chief executive of General Atomics Aeronautical Systems, the company's aircraft-manufacturing subsidiary, told the center.

The center's study illustrates how widespread the practice has become, for both Democrats and Republicans. Of the 25 individual lawmakers who accepted more than $120,000 worth of travel during the period, 17 were Democrats. Of the two dozen congressional offices on which private trip sponsors spent the most money, 15 were Republican, the study said.

At least 150 of the disclosure forms scrutinized by the center did not list a sponsor. After the center contacted her, Rep. Katherine Harris (R-Fla.), a candidate for Senate, amended her 2003 form to fill in the name of the group that paid for her two-day visit in November to the Breakers in Palm Beach, Fla. -- the Center for the Study of Popular Culture. A spokesman for Harris called the omission "a staff error."

After he was contacted by the Center for Public Integrity, Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) reimbursed the Cuban government and John A. Catsimatidis, a grocery store owner, $1,922 for expenses incurred by his son, Steven, during a trip that Rangel, his wife and his son took to Cuba to study the ecology there in 2002. House rules permit sponsors of lawmakers' trips to cover the cost of only one accompanying relative. A Rangel spokesman said the office had not been aware of the rule.

The House had more frequent fliers than did the Senate during the period. The 10 congressional offices that accepted more than 200 privately sponsored trips each were all in the House, as were the 11 offices that had travel expenses exceeding $350,000 each. The 10 most expensive trips were taken by members of the House or, in one instance, a House aide.

The study, which took nine months to complete, found many instances in which, the center said, "trip sponsors appeared to be buying access to elected officials or their advisers." Several of the sponsoring organizations defended their trips, saying they provide lawmakers with an opportunity to discuss issues in a relaxed setting.

"If you try to talk to a member for any great length of time about your issues while they're in Washington, they're simply too busy," Tom White, a spokesman for the Association of American Railroads, told the center.

The center's study was co-sponsored by American Public Media and Northwestern University's Medill News Service.

Study Finds $50M In Privately Funded Travel By Lawmakers (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen And Josephine Hearn

The Hill, June 6, 2006

If voters find industry-sponsored junkets objectionable, a study out today could be bad news for globetrotting lawmakers. Private sponsors paid nearly $50 million over five and a half years to send members of Congress and their staffs on at least 23,000 trips, according to a review of travel records by the Center for Public Integrity, American Public Media and Northwestern University journalism students.

The study is the first time that researchers have pinpointed the full cost of privately funded congressional travel. An earlier tally of about $15 million counted only travel by lawmakers themselves and neglected more numerous trips for staff.

The researchers kept tabs on which offices filed incomplete, incorrect or late reports disclosing details of their travels. They singled out two lawmakers, Reps. Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) and Marcy Kaptur (D-Ohio), for failing to disclose until six weeks ago that the Cuban government and a New York grocery mogul paid for their April 2002 trip to Havana to meet President Fidel Castro. Earlier disclosure reports had specified only a Minneapolis-based conservation group, the Sian Ka'an Conservation Foundation, as the sponsor.

Rangel also took fire for allowing the sponsors to pay travel costs for his wife and son, a violation of House rules that allow only one family member to be reimbursed.

Rangel, who organized the trip for himself and Kaptur, has since reimbursed the Cuban government and the New York businessman, John Catsimatidis, for his son's portion of the $5,766 trip.

Rangel's chief of staff, George Dalley, called the filing an honest mistake. "We believe we have now adequately corrected what I admit was a mistake. We weren't trying to hide it. ... Our practice has always been that we try to abide by whatever laws and regulations exist at the time," he said.

Rangel has been a frequent traveler to Cuba and a vocal opponent of the U.S. embargo against the country.

Supporters of privately funded congressional travel say that such trips provide opportunities for lawmakers and aides to learn more about issues before them without forcing taxpayers to foot the bill.

Critics argue that the trips give wealthy interests unchecked access to power and can lead to corruption.

Golf trips to Scotland are at the center of an expansive federal investigation of congressional corruption that has netted plea agreements from lobbyists Jack Abramoff and Michael Scanlon. Scanlon was once a senior aide to former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas).

During the five and a half years ending in 2005, DeLay's office spent about $500,000 of other people's money on travel, topping the report's list. That total is nearly three times the annual salary of a party leader in the House.

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Richard Lugar (R-Ind.) accounted for $150,000 in trips — his yearly salary is $165,200 — in five years, mostly paid for by the nonprofit Aspen Institute. Nearly 3,000 of the 23,000 privately sponsored trips identified in the report cost $5,000 or more, including 500 that cost at least $10,000 and more than a dozen amounting to at least $25,000 apiece.

Destinations included Australia, Grand Cayman, Paris, Rome, Hawaii and Pebble Beach, Calif., home of one of the nation's top golf courses.

Lawmakers in both parties and in both chambers have reason to be nervous about how the public perceives privately funded jaunts to prime vacation spots. Recent polls show that less than one-third of the public approves of the job Congress is doing.

Attentive challengers can turn incumbents' travel patterns into potent political issues.

Two years ago, Rep. Melissa Bean (D-Ill.) found travel to be a powerful weapon in her successful bid to unseat longtime Republican Rep. Phil Crane (R), a senior member of the Ways and Means Committee and onetime presidential candidate. Bean labeled the well-traveled Crane the "Junket King" to portray him as out of touch with his constituents after more than three decades in Washington.

In other cases, voters have been more forgiving, at least for a while.

DOJ_NMG_0031934

The House refused to seat Adam Clayton Powell Jr. (D-N.Y.) in 1967 after he took lavish, publicly funded trips to exotic locales while spending little time legislating in Washington.

"He is a study in contrasts," fellow Rep. Mo Udall (D-Ariz.) wrote of Powell that year. "Brilliant but erratic; a self-styled 'poor parish priest' but living like a member of the jet set; working hard for a few days to finalize a major bill, then flitting off to Europe or the Bahamas for weeks."

But Powell's constituents fired back at the House, electing the oft-vacationing Powell to fill the vacancy caused by the House's refusal to seat him. He won another two-year term after that.

Powell's lifestyle eventually caught up to him at the ballot box: In 1970, he lost a primary to Rangel, now the ranking Democrat on the Ways and Means Committee.

Candidates across the country already are grappling with the question of whether they would vote to ban privately funded travel. The House voted to block privately funded trips through the end of the year, but the two chambers have yet to complete action on the legislation.

Right Just Doesn't Get Sen. Frist (HILL)

By Alexander Bolton

The Hill, June 6, 2006

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) has both pleased and outraged conservatives with his Senate schedule this week, and they are once again left scratching their heads over what to make of him.

Is he one of them? Does he want to be president?

The Senate will vote this week on cutting off debate on a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriages, an issue conservatives have clamored for since the 2004 election. It will also vote to quash a potential filibuster of the estate-tax repeal, another high priority for conservatives.

But Frist has also brought a skunk to what otherwise would be a conservative garden party by also scheduling the Native Hawaiian Government Reorganization Act, sponsored by Democratic Sen. Daniel Akaka (Hawaii).

Conservative senators and activists hate that bill, which would allow native Hawaiians to establish their own government entity to "safeguard their welfare," according to a description by the Congressional Research Service.

This month, Frist will give conservatives a floor vote on an amendment that would ban burning the American flag, but he will also likely let stem-cell legislation reach the chamber floor for a vote before the July recess, GOP aides say.

A lobbyist for one prominent socially conservative group said Frist's staff has called the stem-cell vote "unavoidable," but some conservatives are skeptical because Frist determines the schedule. One conservative GOP aide said Frist has not yet agreed to allow Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) an accompanying vote on a bill favored by social conservatives that would ban embryonic cloning.

Conservatives such as former Reagan Attorney General Edwin Meese and Todd Gaziano, director of the Center for Legal and Judicial Studies at the conservative Heritage Foundation, call Akaka's legislation unconstitutional and say it could allow native Hawaiians to exempt themselves from "whatever aspects of the United States Constitution and state authority [they] thought undesirable." The Family Research Council, an influential group representing Christian conservatives, also opposes it, saying it could open the door to legalized gambling in the Aloha State.

Aides to conservative senators say they are discussing ways to tie the bill up on the floor, possibly by offering anti-abortion amendments. But, nevertheless the bill has a good chance of passing, and if it does it will likely be with the support of almost every Senate Democrat and a minority of the Senate Republican Conference.

If conservative GOP senators such as Lamar Alexander (Tenn.), Jeff Sessions (Ala.), John Ensign (Nev.), Tom Coburn (Okla.) and John Cornyn (Texas) square off against the Hawaii bill, as they are expected to, it would be the second time in a month that the conservative heart of the Senate GOP conference has rebelled against a bill Frist has brought to the floor. Passage would begin to establish a trend in which bills pass the Senate floor with overwhelming Democratic support and the backing of few Republicans.

"Frist is the leader of what may be a Republican majority but isn't a conservative majority," said Michael Franc, vice president of government relations for the Heritage Foundation.

He explained that because chamber rules often require the support of 60 lawmakers and Republicans control only 55 seats, coalitions are sometimes a mix of Democrats and liberal Republicans. The discipline that Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid (Nev.) has imposed on his caucus has made it more difficult for Frist to pass bills amenable to the majority of Republicans with the support of a handful of Democratic defectors. Immigration was an example of that.

"The Democrats have been very effective at turning that majority into a dysfunctional one," Franc said. "You have to give credit to Reid and others for sowing this kind of discontent among Republicans in the Senate."

One veteran GOP aide wondered whether past majority leaders would have allowed major legislation to pass with a minority of Republicans supporting it. "The thing I keep hearing is if [Sen.] Trent Lott [R-Miss.] was still majority leader that would never have seen the floor," the aide said.

On Fox News last month, Frist acknowledged that the immigration bill was not popular but argued that the Senate had to address the problem of nearly 12 million illegal immigrants living in the U.S., and of what he called the hemorrhaging of immigrants across the U.S.-Mexican border. A Frist aide said the problems could not be addressed if the Senate did not pass legislation and send a bill to negotiations with the House.

The Senate majority may have seemed dysfunctional lately, but Frist has had successes. He helped pass the 2003 Medicare act, which many congressional observers thought would be difficult. Many conservatives still grumble about the cost of that vote. Frist also navigated Democratic opposition to pass long-stalled energy and transportation reauthorization legislation last year.

While the tactics of passing bills on the Senate may be easy for Frist and his staff to justify in Washington, it is more difficult for them to make their case outside the Beltway.

"Senator Frist in some instances has been a strong advocate for certain issues that are of importance to conservatives such as his work on passing the Bush tax cut, his continuing efforts to try to repeal the death tax, his work to assist the administration in getting their political appointees approved particularly on the judiciary, but at the same time he's been disappointing to conservatives on issues involving federal spending, and immigration," said William Lauderback, executive vice president of the American Conservative Union, who served as deputy campaign manager on Frist's first Senate campaign, in 1994. "If the senator's future political ambitions encompass a run for the presidency he will not be able to position himself as a true conservative."

Laudenbach said that Frist was regarded as a leader of very high integrity and that Republican and Democratic senators respect him, but that, in the final analysis, "he's not been a strong majority leader. In some instances he's been disappointing."

Amy Call, Frist's spokeswoman, defended her boss. "Senator Frist has been a strong advocate throughout his time in the Senate for the things he believes in and will continue to be," she said. "He is guided by what he feels is the right thing to do and will continue to be guided by that."

Kennedy Back On Job After Month In Rehab (USAT)

USA Today, June 6, 2006

Rep. Patrick Kennedy, D-R.I., back to work Monday after his second stint at a drug rehabilitation clinic, said that after struggling for two decades with addiction he knows he can no longer take any "mood-altering" substances including alcohol.

Kennedy, 38, checked into the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn., a day after a May 4 incident in which he crashed his car near the U.S. Capitol. He told police he was rushing to vote at the House, but Congress was not in session. He also said he was taking medication to help him sleep.

The experience "reaffirmed for me that the challenge of mental illness is a part of everyone's experience," Kennedy said in a speech at Brown University in Providence.

It was his first public appearance since he left the clinic Friday. He said his month-long treatment left him confident about his mental health.

Kennedy, the son of Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., had also been in a clinic over the Christmas holiday.

President Bush's job-approval rating has rebounded slightly to 36% in a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll taken Thursday through Sunday. That's 5 percentage points higher than his record low in early May.

Bush's standing improved by 10 percentage points or more among Republicans (up to 78%) and men (42%). The survey of 1,002 adults has an error margin of +/-3 percentage points. — Susan Page

The Federal Aviation Administration will impose new contract terms on more than 14,500 air-traffic controllers after it failed to reach an agreement with the union, officials said.

Base salaries and premiums for living in high-cost areas would be preserved, but new controllers would earn 30% less than current workers, the agency said in a statement Monday. The FAA also will phase in new rules to boost worker productivity.

The FAA hopes the contract will save it nearly $2 billion over five years. National Air Traffic Controllers Association officials could not be reached for comment.

After contract talks broke off April 5, the FAA sent its proposal, along with the union's proposal and objections, to Congress. Lawmakers had 60 days to intercede, after which the FAA could impose its offer.

The House of Representatives is scheduled today to debate legislation that would nullify that 60-day deadline in hopes of pushing the FAA and the union back to the bargaining table.

Patrick Kennedy Is 'Better' After Treating Dependency (NYT)

By John Holusha

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

Representative Patrick J. Kennedy said yesterday that he felt much better after almost a month's treatment in the Mayo Clinic for drug dependency, and that he was looking forward to resuming his duties.

But he said that he continued to suffer from bipolar disorder and a tendency toward addiction, and will need help from a support group to avoid a relapse.

"The key to recovery will be a small group of people who will watch over me," he said at a televised news conference.

Mr. Kennedy said, as he has before, that he had not been drinking before an early-morning car accident near the Capitol in Washington on May 4, even though the police on the scene said he appeared to be intoxicated. Mr. Kennedy said the police had canvassed bars in the District of Columbia seeking evidence of his drinking but were unable to find any. Rather, he said, he was under the influence of prescription antinausea and sleep medications, which he had taken at the "prescribed amount."

The question-and-answer session came after Mr. Kennedy, Democrat of Rhode Island, helped to open a conference on the future of mental health care and addiction treatment at Brown University in Providence.

"I can tell you today, I feel confident of my health," he said at the health conference, adding that he was "positive about my future."

He was discharged from the clinic, in Rochester, Minn., on Friday and spent the weekend with relatives in Washington before returning to Rhode Island on Sunday night. His private medical insurance policy paid for the stay in the clinic, he said.

The event was Mr. Kennedy's first public appearance since checking himself into the clinic on May 5, the day after the auto accident. Mr. Kennedy has said he has no memory of the crash or of his subsequent encounter with the Capitol Police, who charged him with three traffic violations.

Mr. Kennedy, the son of Senator Edward M. Kennedy, put his drug taking in the larger context of mental illness. "I didn't know how miserable I was until I started to be feeling better," he said of his time at the clinic.

Kennedy Finds Recovery Sponsor In Ramstad (RC)

By Bree Hocking

Roll Call, June 6, 2006

Twenty-five years ago, Rep. Jim Ramstad (R-Minn.) woke up to find himself in a Sioux Falls, S.D., jail cell after an alcohol-induced blackout.

Ramstad, who credits that experience with helping him to realize he was an alcoholic and needed to seek help, said that his own struggle with substance abuse forged the strong bond he shares with Rep. Patrick Kennedy (D-R.I.). Kennedy entered a drug rehabilitation program May 5 in the wake of a middle-of-the-night car crash near Capitol Hill that occurred after he had taken two prescription drugs, Phenergan and Ambien. He was released from the clinic Friday.

"If anyone can identify with Patrick's experience, it's me," Ramstad said. "I absolutely think this is a wake-up call for Patrick similar to the wake-up call I had 25 years ago."

Every Saturday for a month, Ramstad drove an hour and a half from his house in Minnetonka, Minn., to the Mayo Clinic in Rochester to visit Kennedy while he was in rehab.

"We had a lot of good heart-to-heart talks about my experience and his experience like recovering people do. That's how we stay sober. We do a lot of talking and a lot of listening. ... I know he's going to be participating in meetings with other recovering people on a regular basis."

The Rhode Island Congressman has named Ramstad as a sponsor in his recovery efforts, said Kennedy spokesman Robin Costello. "He's a key person in the support network [and aftercare plan] he's put together of close friends and colleagues and medical experts," she said. According to Kennedy's Mayo Clinic discharge statement, his physicians have put him on a "stringent system of aftercare that may include periodic visits to the Mayo Clinic for continued health care consultation."

On Monday, Kennedy made his first public appearance since getting out of rehab, speaking at a mental health care and addiction treatment conference at Brown University. Afterward, he held a press conference in which he said medical issues related to his rehab stay were "between me and my doctor" and pledged to continue his fight for medical privacy legislation. Kennedy, who has bipolar disorder, also said his mental illness has led to his addiction.

Despite Kennedy's pending legal issues, colleagues on both sides of the aisle predict he will be welcomed back to Congress with open arms when he returns to Capitol Hill today.

"We all recognize that Patrick has been through a very difficult time, and my sense is that most people in Congress as well as most Rhode Islanders are impressed, as I am, that he was forthcoming about his problems and he sought professional help," said Rep. James Langevin (D-R.I.), who was with Kennedy at the Brown conference. "There's important work that we need to do together for the people of the state of Rhode Island, and I know Patrick is up to the challenge."

Langevin added that Kennedy had in his speech "acknowledged this is a struggle. This will always be with him, and he's going to take it day by day."

Other Members echoed Langevin's words.

"Rep. Kennedy has demonstrated tremendous courage through this process. I welcome him back, and look forward to working with him as he continues to advocate on mental health issues in Congress," said Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.).

Ramstad added, "Alcoholism and drug addiction are equal-opportunity diseases that don't discriminate between Republicans and Democrats, rich and poor, educated and uneducated."

Support for Kennedy appears to be holding firm in his home state.

Kennedy received a standing ovation for his speech at Monday's conference. That same day, members of the Rhode Island mental health and medical communities took out a full-page ad in The Providence Journal thanking Kennedy for coming forward with his problem and supporting mental health parity issues, said his close friend Jack McConnell, a trial attorney in Providence who has done legal work for Kennedy in the past. (Kennedy has taken the lead in facilitating the concept of the Rhode Island Institute for Mental Health Excellence, a partnership of leading researchers and practitioners in the areas of mental health and addiction, Costello noted.)

Rhode Island political observers do not believe Kennedy's run-in with the law will have an adverse effect on his electoral viability.

"I don't anticipate there will be a negative political fallout because he's very popular and he did seek help," said Darrell West, a political science professor at Brown University and the author of the 2000 biography "Patrick Kennedy: The Rise To Power." "I don't think voters see a legal issue."

Only one politically unknown Republican has filed so far for the race.

Still, West added: "If it becomes a recurring problem, that's a bigger political problem for him."

On the legislative front, Ramstad said the two have discussed redoubling their efforts to get mental health and chemical dependency treatment parity legislation passed in the House, where their bill, which would provide for equal coverage for mental health benefits, currently has 228 sponsors. Ramstad and Kennedy are also co-founders of the Addiction, Treatment and Recovery Caucus, which was formed to educate Congress about addiction problems and the need for treatment and recovery.

Meanwhile, Rep. Ralph Regula (R-Ohio), who chairs the Appropriations subcommittee on labor, health and human services, education and related agencies — of which Kennedy is a member — said he did not anticipate Kennedy's legal and personal troubles would distract him from his work.

"He's probably not the only Member of Congress that's got things he's dealing with outside of his role as Congressman," Regula said, adding that he expected Kennedy to be on hand for the markup of the panel's spending bill on Wednesday. "I think he can handle it."

SNOW SHOW (WP)

White House press secretary Tony Snow's response at yesterday's White House briefing to a question from radio talk show host Lester Kinsolving:

Kinsolving : The New York Times has just reported, "This White House, like all White Houses, is obsessed with the press." My question: Will you admit to this alleged obsession, or is this just one more New York Times exaggeration?

Snow : It's more a love affair than an obsession, Lester.

Controllers Have A New Contract, But Fight Isn't Over (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

The Federal Aviation Administration imposed a controversial new contract yesterday on the nation's 15,000 air traffic controllers that will slow the rate of pay increases for current workers and cut starting salaries for new hires by 30 percent.

Marion C. Blakey , the FAA administrator, said a 60-day period for review by Congress of contract deadlocks at the agency had ended without any action. "The FAA's proposed change takes effect as of today, and we will begin the process of implementing our proposal," she said in a statement.

Blakey's announcement came on the eve of a House debate on a bill that would have set aside the 60-day deadline and sent the labor-management dispute back to the bargaining table. The bill, sponsored by Rep. Steven C. LaTourette (R-Ohio), would apply retroactively to the controller contract.

The FAA's move was faulted by John S. Carr , president of the National Air Traffic Controllers Association. "One can only surmise that the current rush to implementation is an attempt to circumvent the legislation that is scheduled for a vote in Congress this week," Carr said.

The FAA is one of the few places in government where unions can bargain over salaries. A 1996 change in FAA law that permitted bargaining over pay also stipulated that impasses would go to Congress rather than to a panel of presidential appointees that normally rules in such cases.

Two years after that law took effect, the controllers union negotiated a generous contract that Blakey says the FAA can no longer afford as it prepares to undertake costly technology upgrades and bring on a new generation of controllers.

When the old contract came up for renewal, the FAA and the union embarked on nine months of talks that the agency says cost taxpayers $2.3 million. Both sides have accused the other of grandstanding and spreading misleading information, and in April, the agency declared an impasse in the negotiations, triggering the congressional review period.

The dispute comes 25 years after President Ronald Reagan fired about 11,000 controllers who went on strike over working conditions. There is no talk of a strike in this dispute, but union officials contend that a substantial number of controllers will take a cut in take-home pay under the contract, prompting them to enter into retirement at a faster rate than normal.

The FAA faces a large wave of retirements as controllers hired after the mass firing reach the mandatory retirement age of 56. The FAA estimates about 12,500 new controllers will have to be hired and trained through fiscal 2014 -- a big challenge that will require careful planning.

Under the new five-year contract, which the agency estimates will save $1.9 billion, controllers would keep their salaries and benefits and retain about 80 percent of supplemental pay, known as premium pay. According to the FAA, the average compensation package worth $165,900 today would grow to $187,000 over the life of the contract.

However, controllers would lose incentive pay that encourages them to take jobs in hard-to-staff locations. The FAA said that the extra pay costs $30 million annually and that inspector general audits had determined it has not worked as intended.

Controllers also would lose "controller in charge" differentials that are paid when they take on temporary duties as a supervisor. That differential had cost the FAA $11 million annually and also been faulted by the inspector general as unnecessary.

New controllers will take a 30 percent cut in starting pay, compared with the terms under the 1998 contract. FAA officials said that as new hires advance in training and skills, salaries will rise to $127,000 on average over the five years of the contract.

Blakey said the agency would continue to operate under the terms of the prior contract during the transition to new pay scales and workplace rules. The FAA did not have an estimate for how long the transition would take.

"The phase-in will be handled in a deliberate and orderly manner, and we will ensure that air traffic managers and supervisors are well trained to implement these provisions and to answer questions from the workforce as they arise," she said.

LaTourette's bill will be brought up today under a suspension of normal rules, which will require a two-thirds margin to pass. Carr said he believed that members of Congress "will take a dim view of the FAA's brazen actions today." In a similar union dispute a few years ago, he said, Blakey waited about 19 months before moving to impose a contract.

Geoff Basye , an FAA spokesman, said further delay in resolving the dispute was not in the interest of taxpayers. The negotiations were carried out under current law, and "the FAA will stay true to the process that has been governing this from the beginning," he said.

Although the union hopes to win some sort of congressional intervention, the dispute may end up in federal court. The union has launched a challenge to the law that permits Blakey to impose contracts.

Fed Chief Startles Markets (USAT)

By Sue Kirchhoff

USA Today, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke suggested Monday that the central bank might have to keep raising interest rates to combat “unwelcome” inflation, even though the economy has started slowing. His comments rattled stock markets, which had one of their worst days of the year.

In a speech to a banking conference here, Bernanke said the economy is entering “a period of transition” to less robust growth. But he also implied that inflation, pressured by high energy prices, is now the bigger threat.

He vowed the Fed “will be vigilant to ensure that the recent pattern” of rising prices doesn't take permanent root. The inflation outlook for the next six to 12 months will receive “particular scrutiny” as the Fed sets policy, he said.

Bernanke's language, suggesting that the central bank could raise short-term rates yet again when it meets June 28-29, shook up financial markets. The Dow Jones industrial average fell 199 points, or 1.8%, to 11,049. That's the third-worst one-day sell-off of the year for the Dow, which has lost 594 points since May 10. Small stocks fared even worse, with the Russell 2000 small-stock index falling 3.2%, its biggest drop this year.

That's because some traders and economists had anticipated that the Fed, which has boosted rates 16 times since mid-2004, might take a breather in June, given last week's gloomy employment report showing businesses created 75,000 jobs in May — far fewer than expected. A private report Monday showed the service sector expanding at a less rapid clip.

The Fed wants to move its target for short-term rates, now 5%, to a level that keeps prices under control but is not so high that it unduly chokes off growth.

Mark Zandi of Moody's Economy.com says he was surprised by the hawkish tone of Bernanke's speech, given that the economy is cooling faster than expected. He said a good case could be made for the Fed to pause, though he expects a rate increase if inflation remains elevated.

"(Bernanke) laid out a strong case why stable inflation is vital to long-term growth," Zandi says. "He's new in his term and has to establish inflation-fighting credentials."

Bernanke said an "anticipated moderation of economic growth seems now to be underway," adding that at such a time, interest rate "policy must be conducted with great care and with close attention to the evolution of the economic outlook."

The Fed chairman pointed to slowing consumer spending, a softening housing market and cooling job creation. The interest rate on a 30-year fixed mortgage has risen from about 5.6% in January 2005 to about 6.7% today, largely due to Fed action. At the same time, Bernanke noted, business investment is accelerating and the global economy is strong.

But Bernanke made it clear that, from the Fed's point of view, the main ingredient for stable, sustained growth was stable inflation and inflation expectations.

The Fed chairman pointed out that core consumer inflation, a measure that excludes food and energy prices, has risen at a 3.2% annual rate in the past three months and a 2.8% rate in the past six months. That's above the Fed's informal comfort range of 1% to 2%.

"The (Fed) must continue to resist any tendency for increases in energy and commodity prices to become permanently embedded in core inflation," he said.

The economy expanded at a rapid 5.3% annual pace in the first three months of the year, a rate the Fed expects to slow but not stall.

Bernanke Talks Tough On Inflation (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 5 — Ben S. Bernanke, chairman of the Federal Reserve, warned Monday that recent inflation trends were "unwelcome developments," indicating that he was far less worried about signs of weaker economic growth than about the danger of higher prices.

In his toughest comments yet about the risks of inflation, Mr. Bernanke said consumer prices were rising faster than he would like. He gave short shrift to evidence of a slowdown in hiring, and he conspicuously avoided repeating his earlier suggestion that the Fed might consider a "pause" in its two-year program of steady interest rate increases.

Investors, increasingly convinced that the central bank will raise rates at its two-day policy meeting at the end of this month, immediately began selling stocks.

The Dow industrials and the broader Standard & Poor's 500-stock index each fell about 1.75 percent, and the Nasdaq index tumbled more than 2 percent. Bond prices also fell and interest yields edged up, particularly for two-year Treasury securities.

The dollar rose slightly as traders in the Fed funds futures market sharply increased their bets that the central bank would lift its benchmark short-term interest rate another 0.25 percentage point from its current 5 percent.

Speaking to a conference here on international monetary issues with other central bankers, Mr. Bernanke said inflation had climbed to the upper limits of his acceptability.

"Core inflation, measured over the past three to six months, has reached a level that, if sustained, would be at or above the upper range that many economists, including myself, would consider consistent with price stability," Mr. Bernanke said.

Core inflation refers to the increase in prices for consumer goods and services other than food and energy, whose prices are more volatile and are considered not as important as others in determining whether inflation becomes embedded in the economy.

Mr. Bernanke has previously said that core inflation should ideally remain between 1 and 2 percent a year. In his speech, he noted that it had been running at 3 percent over the last six months and 2.3 percent over the last 12 months.

"These are unwelcome developments," the Fed chairman said.

DOJ_NMG_0031941

Jan Hatzius, chief United States economist at Goldman Sachs, said Mr. Bernanke was signaling that the Fed was likely to raise interest rates for a 17th time in two years when its policy-making committee meets on June 28-29.

"He's trying to send a pretty fair message that he's going to err on the side of doing more rather than doing less," Mr. Hatzius said. But Mr. Hatzius, who had been predicting that the Fed would not raise rates in June, said the decision was not yet signed, sealed and delivered.

Fed officials will take a close look at the coming report on consumer price increases in May, which is scheduled to be released on June 14, he said. And they will be watching for additional evidence that the economy is slowing more abruptly than previously thought.

But with Mr. Bernanke and other Fed officials sounding increasingly hawkish on inflation, many analysts contend that the Fed faces less risk of slowing the economy too much by "overshooting" in its rate increases than it would if it let inflationary expectations take hold among consumers and businesses.

"They know that if they are perceived to have gone too far, they can change things fairly quickly by reducing rates," said Nigel Gault, a forecaster at Global Insight in Lexington, Mass. "They probably also know that credibility on inflation, once lost, may be difficult to get back."

Mr. Bernanke made clear that he thought the economy was now in a "transition" to slower economic growth, but he took little solace from data showing that wages had climbed only modestly, that the housing market appeared to be cooling and that job creation appeared to have slowed markedly.

On Friday, the Labor Department reported that the nation added an estimated 75,000 nonfarm jobs in May, only about half as many as most economists consider necessary to absorb the normal increase in the labor force.

Instead of highlighting signs of a cooling economy, which would ease inflationary pressures, Mr. Bernanke placed top emphasis on the need for vigilance against rising prices.

"Given recent developments, the medium-term outlook for inflation will receive particular scrutiny," Mr. Bernanke said. "There is a strong consensus among the members of the Federal Open Market Committee that maintaining low and stable inflation is essential" for achieving the central bank's dual goals of price stability and full employment.

The Fed, he continued, "will be vigilant to ensure that the recent pattern of elevated monthly core inflation readings is not sustained."

Despite the sharp sell-off in stock markets after Mr. Bernanke spoke, some analysts cautioned that the Fed had not necessarily closed the door to a pause.

"Mr. Bernanke's speech is more nuanced than the headlines at first suggest," wrote Ian C. Shepherdson, who tracks the American economy for High Frequency Economics, noting that the Fed chairman had been his most emphatic yet in stating that the economy was indeed starting to cool off.

But Mr. Bernanke's tough tone on Monday contrasted starkly with his testimony in late April before the Senate Banking Committee. In those remarks, Mr. Bernanke explicitly broached the idea of refraining from a rate increase at a Fed meeting to take more time to evaluate incoming economic information, and he said that the Fed might pause even if data pointed to lingering inflation pressure.

In the days that followed, bond investors began selling off Treasury bonds and pushing up yields amid rising suspicions that Mr. Bernanke was soft on inflation.

Those concerns have since abated. Yields on 10-year Treasury notes, which are closely tied to rates on home mortgages, peaked at about 5.19 percent in mid-May but have since declined to about 5 percent.

On Monday, Mr. Bernanke also avoided any recitation of the Fed's statement after its last rate increase on May 10, when it said that the "extent and timing" of additional increases would depend on how incoming information affects the economic outlook.

He also continued to leave his options open but characterized low and stable inflation as a prerequisite for sustainable economic growth.

And while he noted that the recent surge in energy prices was likely to abate, he warned that oil prices might have contributed to the rise in core inflation and that volatile prices for oil and other commodities "remain a risk" to the inflation outlook.

DOJ_NMG_0031942

"The best way to prevent increases in energy and commodity prices from leading to persistently higher rates of inflation," Mr. Bernanke said, "is by anchoring the public's long-term inflation expectations."

Dow Falls 1.77% As Fed Chief Adds To Investor Jitters (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning And Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

A surprisingly frank inflation warning from Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke stoked fears of further interest-rate increases, adding to investor jitters and knocking the Dow Jones Industrial Average down almost 200 points to its lowest finish since March 9.

Speaking at an international bankers' conference in Washington, Mr. Bernanke warned that inflation in recent months has been running "at or above the upper end of the range that many economists, including myself, would consider consistent with price stability." He said Fed policy makers would remain "vigilant" to ensure that recent inflation readings don't become the norm.

Although other parts of Mr. Bernanke's speech indicated that he sees signs economic growth is slowing, investors quickly concluded that the odds have increased that the Fed will raise target short-term interest rates at its policy meeting on June 28-29.

Stocks, which already were down earlier in the day on worries about the outlook for oil prices and interest rates, fell further in the wake of Mr. Bernanke's speech. The Dow Jones industrials tumbled 199.15 points, or 1.77%, to 11048.72.

Fears of more interest-rate increases have been spreading since the Fed warned of that possibility at its last policy meeting on May 10. The industrial average now is down 593.93 points, or 5.1%, from its May 10 six-year high of 11642.65. That close was less than 100 points short of the industrial average's record finish of 11722.98 in January 2000.

Since mid-May, inflation fears also have roiled a variety of international markets. The prices of many industrial commodities, such as metals, have fallen sharply, as have stock markets in developing countries and in developed nations from Japan to Europe.

Despite yesterday's declines in the U.S., the Dow Jones industrials are still up 3.1% for the year. The Nasdaq Composite Index, full of volatile technology stocks, fell 2.24%, or 49.79 points, yesterday to 2169.62. It is down 1.6% for the year.

The concern among investors is that inflation is proving more resilient than expected, despite the Fed's campaign of interest-rate increases that began two years ago. Over that time, the Fed has raised its target rate for overnight bank lending to 5% from 1%.

Investor attention now will focus on the government's next release of consumer-price data, due on Wednesday of next week. If the pace of inflation doesn't show signs of slowing, fears of more interest-rate increases will spread. Higher rates are bad news for stocks because they weigh on corporate profits and make alternative investments, such as money-market accounts, more attractive.

The prospect of higher short-term rates also is bad news for bonds, because it suggests that future bond yields probably will be higher, making existing bonds, with their lower yields, less attractive. In response to Mr. Bernanke's speech, Treasury-bond prices fell, pushing the yield of the 10-year Treasury note up to 5.024%.

Mr. Bernanke's remarks were unexpectedly hawkish. He called a recent rise in inflation "unwelcome," and his comments overall suggested the Fed is more concerned about recent price developments than by signs of slowing economic growth, such as the sharp slowdown in job growth in May.

The May jobs report had prompted many economists to speculate that the Fed would finally pause in its tightening of monetary policy, with the idea that a slowing economy would ultimately keep a lid on inflation pressure.

Mr. Bernanke's remarks yesterday, however, sent a different signal. They dwelt heavily on the risks of higher inflation. By contrast, he called signs of a weaker economy, including the soft jobs data, part of an "anticipated moderation of economic growth." He made it clear that the Fed's preoccupation, at least for now, will be keeping inflation down, not supporting economic growth.

"Given recent developments, the medium-term outlook for inflation will receive particular scrutiny," Mr. Bernanke said. Fed policy makers "will be vigilant to ensure that the recent pattern of elevated monthly core inflation readings is not sustained."

Inflation, measured by the consumer-price index, was 3.5% in April. By the Fed's preferred measure, which uses a different basket of goods and services and excludes food and energy, it was 2.1%, just above the 1% to 2% "comfort zone" of many Fed officials. Mr. Bernanke noted yesterday that in the past three months, inflation by the latter measure has been running at a 3% annualized rate.

After Mr. Bernanke spoke, futures markets raised their odds to 74% that the Fed would further increase its target for short-term interest rates to 5.25% from the current 5%. They had put those odds at 48% before his speech.

While one more rate increase is unlikely to weaken the economy much, it does, at the margin, raise the odds of a sharper economic slowdown than investors had so far been betting on.

Expectations of the Fed's actions have swung wildly in the past month. In late April, Mr. Bernanke told Congress the Fed might pause in its rate increases, even if inflation remained a risk, to assess the impact of previous rate increases. He indicated that a pause need not mean a halt. But some investors questioned the wisdom of signaling a pause when the economy still appeared strong and inflation data had turned worrisome. Higher inflation data a few weeks later further cemented those concerns, and some analysts said Mr. Bernanke's anti-inflation credentials were being tested.

While Fed officials don't believe their credibility is in danger, Mr. Bernanke's remarks yesterday may have been aimed in part at putting to rest any doubts about his commitment to low inflation.

But the remarks don't guarantee another rate increase later this month. If the inflation data reported next week are tame, or there are signs of a more pronounced slowing in the economy, the Fed could decide to leave rates alone.

Among investors, meanwhile, worries are spreading that they have gone too far in their pursuit of stocks related to economic growth and industrial commodities. Shares of equipment maker Caterpillar fell 4.8% yesterday and aluminum maker Alcoa shed 3.7%.

Some analysts thought investors overreacted to the Bernanke speech. They noted that Mr. Bernanke pointed to signs of a cooling economy, which could suggest that, if data show inflation relenting, the Fed might be prepared to pause soon in its rate increases.

"We're still leaving the June hike penciled in, lightly," wrote Ian Shepherdson, chief U.S. economist at High Frequency Economics, after the Bernanke speech. "But the key point for medium-term investors is that a real slowdown is here; a June hike will be the last hike."

But not everyone was so optimistic yesterday.

Financial markets began the day lower in reaction to soaring crude-oil futures. Futures rose as high as $73.40 a barrel after a speech Sunday in which Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, said Iranian oil shipments could be "seriously jeopardized" if the West tried to punish Iran for its nuclear program. By day's end, those worries dissipated, and oil finished up just 27 cents at $72.60. But by then, Mr. Bernanke's speech had seized center stage.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index suffered its second-heaviest decline of 2006 in percentage terms, falling within 11 points of its low for the year, which it hit in February. The S&P 500 declined 1.78%, or 22.93 points, to 1265.29, still up 1.4% this year.

The Nasdaq composite's decline also was its second-heaviest of the year, while the Dow's was its third-worst. Although the Dow Jones industrials still are less than 700 points off their record, the S&P and Nasdaq composite, which fell harder in the bear market, remain far from records.

The dollar, which becomes a more attractive investment when interest rates rise, gained 0.1% yesterday against the euro and 0.5% against the yen. It remains down against both currencies for the year.

Gold rose $7.70 to $643.20 a troy ounce.

Inflation Above Fed's 'Comfort Zone' (WT)

By Patrice Hill

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke yesterday signaled more interest-rate increases are likely because underlying inflation has spiked to "unwelcome" levels, touching off a nearly 200-point drop in the Dow Jones Industrial Average.

DOJ_NMG_0031944

Mr. Bernanke's remarks before a gathering of international bankers here came as oil prices surged on a threat from Iran's supreme leader to withhold energy supplies if the United States attempts to punish the Middle Eastern oil producer for pursuing nuclear research -- a development that also troubled the markets because it adds to inflation and weakens economic growth.

Mr. Bernanke blamed high energy prices for zapping consumer spending and confidence this year as well as pushing the underlying, or "core," level of inflation above levels that the Fed will tolerate. Core inflation, which excludes energy prices but reflects moves to pass on higher energy costs by businesses, has been running between 2.3 percent and 3.2 percent, he said, above the Fed's 1 percent to 2 percent "comfort zone."

"These are unwelcome developments," he said. The Fed's rate-setting committee "will be vigilant to ensure that the recent pattern of elevated monthly core-inflation readings is not sustained."

The economy is in a transition to substantially slower growth under the weight of four percentage points of interest-rate increases the Fed has ordered in 16 actions in the past two years, Mr. Bernanke said. The economy from now on should grow no faster than its average potential growth rate -- estimated at about 2.5 percent to 3 percent -- to ensure that inflation does not get out of hand, he said.

His remarks caused markets to plunge not only at the prospect of higher rates but also on fears that the Fed may go too far and induce a severe slowdown or recession by raising rates too much. Mr. Bernanke has proven to be far more hawkish on inflation than Wall Street expected when he took office in February, and his remarks yesterday were among his toughest yet on the need to stamp out the inflation threat.

Stocks plunged across the board, with the Dow falling 199 points to end at 11,049, and other major indexes posting declines in the 2-percent range. Market interest rates and the dollar rose in anticipation of higher short-term rates, retracing declines they posted Friday when a report showing weak job growth convinced many on Wall Street that the Fed would pause at its next meeting June 29 and not raise rates.

Mr. Bernanke noted that job gains have tailed off this year and said that was "consistent with the softening in the pace of overall economic activity that seems to be under way." He added that the low unemployment rate of 4.6 percent, however, suggests that wage growth that so far has been subdued could start to pick up and add to inflation pressures.

"He's telling you inflation concerns are tipping the scale toward raising rates," said Raymond Remy, head of fixed income at Daiwa Securities America Inc.

Mr. Bernanke held out hope that inflation pressures will ease later this year if oil prices come down -- a possibility that seemed remote yesterday as worries about the nuclear standoff between Iran and the United States continued to roil the markets. By some estimates, the Iran affair has added $15 to the price of premium crude, which landed at $72.31 a barrel at the end of New York trading yesterday.

As yesterday's developments showed, the Fed has little control over crude prices despite its efforts to keep inflation low. Oil prices in recent years have been driven higher by strong demand in the United States and China that has barely been matched by the growth in supplies worldwide because of persistent geopolitical tensions in the Middle East and elsewhere.

The Fed's rate increases have mostly failed to temper demand among Americans consumers, who use a quarter of the world's oil supplies primarily to fuel their cars and sport utility vehicles. To the extent that consumers have cut back on spending in response to higher prices and interest rates, it has been in other areas, such as eating out. Consumers also have maintained their spending patterns despite high prices by going deeper into debt -- a trend that the Fed also seeks to stop.

Fed Chief's Fears Fuel Talk Of Rate Hike (FT)

By Krishna Guha And Richard Beales

Financial Times, June 6, 2006

Stocks tumbled on Monday after Ben Bernanke, chairman of the Federal Reserve, expressed strong personal concern about the recent rise in inflation, raising expectations that the Fed will raise interest rates again this month.

The S&P 500 index and the Nasdaq Composite index had their worst day since January, with the S&P 500 down 1.78 per cent at 1265.29 and the Nasdaq down 2.24 per cent at 2169.62. The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell 1.77 per cent to 11,048.72. Treasury bonds also fell, while the dollar benefited from the expectation of higher US rates, rebounding against the yen and the euro.

The Fed chairman told a conference organised by the American Bankers Association that core inflation - excluding energy and food prices - had reached a level that "if sustained, would be at or above the upper end of the range that many economists, including myself, would consider consistent with price stability."

He pledged that the Fed would be "vigilant to ensure that the recent pattern of elevated monthly core inflation readings is not sustained." In the futures market, the probability of a rate rise this month jumped to more than 70 per cent, up from about 50 per cent at the close on Friday, when weak jobs data suggested the Fed might pause this month.

Mr Bernanke also called for "greater flexibility of exchange rates" in order to moderate global economic imbalances. This is generally regarded as code for dollar depreciation against at least some other currencies.

The Fed chairman's tough talk on inflation may, in part, reflect a desire to strengthen perceptions of his own inflation-fighting commitment, amid some concern in the markets that the Fed has been slow to react to inflation data.

Mr Bernanke said the Fed would pay close attention to inflation expectations, which have risen recently. He said "the best way to prevent increases in energy and commodity prices from leading to persistently higher rates of inflation is by anchoring the public's inflation expectations." He said this required both a strong commitment to fighting inflation, and a predictable response to economic developments.

However, in a sign that the June rate decision remains finely poised, the Fed chairman emphasised that there is growing evidence that the economy is slowing, as required to cool overall inflationary pressures.

Mr Bernanke said "the anticipated moderation of economic growth seems now to be under way." He said consumer spending had "decelerated noticeably" and the housing market was cooling. The weak jobs data was "consistent with the softening in the pace of overall economic activity."

The Fed chairman also pledged to take "full account of the lags with which monetary policy affects the economy." Mr Bernanke said the economy was in a "period of transition" during which policy had to be "conducted with great care and with close attention to the evolution of the economic outlook as implied by incoming information." But he added that "given recent developments, the medium term outlook for inflation will receive particular scrutiny."

Fed Chief Raises Inflation Concern (WP)

By Nell Henderson And Brooke A. Masters

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke expressed more concern about rising inflation than the cooling U.S. economy yesterday, sending his strongest signal yet that interest rates are probably headed higher.

Stocks plunged after Bernanke vowed to combat the recent "unwelcome" pickup in inflation, even as he told an international bankers' conference that an economic slowdown "seems now to be underway."

The combination of high inflation and sluggish growth causes pain throughout an economy: Rising prices reduce the purchasing power of workers' wages, erode savings and diminish the returns on investment. Slow growth pushes up unemployment, squeezes corporate profit and discourages businesses from expanding.

Like many economists, Bernanke argues that keeping inflation low is vital to promoting a strong economy because it allows people to make purchases, borrow money, plan for retirement, invest and make other financial decisions without worrying about rising prices. But beating inflation means raising interest rates, which crimps consumer spending by raising borrowing costs.

"He came right out and said we're worried about inflation," said Arthur Hogan, chief market analyst at Jefferies & Co. "Just what the market didn't need to hear."

Major U.S. stock market indicators fell about 2 percent on the day as Bernanke's comments deflated hopes that the Fed was near the end of two years of steady interest rate increases.

After taking over as Fed chief in February, Bernanke's first public speech was on the importance of low inflation, or "price stability" in central bank jargon. Yet many analysts and investors in financial markets questioned his inflation-fighting credentials in recent weeks, particularly after he told Congress in late April that the Fed might leave interest rates unchanged at an upcoming meeting even if there were risks of higher inflation.

Bernanke's comments yesterday left much less doubt. "He laid down a marker -- that inflation is the primary issue" for the Fed, said David Shulman, a senior economist with the UCLA Anderson Forecast produced by the University of California at Los Angeles Anderson School of Management.

Consumer price inflation has risen this year, largely because of climbing energy prices, Bernanke said. Moreover, he added, measures of "core" inflation, which exclude traditionally volatile food and energy prices, have also moved higher in recent months. The Labor Department's core consumer price index rose at a 3.2 percent annual rate over the past three months and at a 2.8 percent pace over the past six months, he said.

"These are unwelcome developments," Bernanke said, deflating financial market hopes that the central bank would soon stop raising interest rates. Fed officials "will be vigilant to ensure that the recent pattern of elevated monthly core inflation readings is not sustained."

Many analysts forecast the economy to slow as the housing market cools and dampens consumer spending, which would cause employers to pull back on hiring. That process has begun, Bernanke said.

Still, he did not sound too worried about the economy's health, noting other sources of strength in rising U.S. exports, increased business investment, low unemployment and generally healthy consumer finances.

Fed economists have expected consumer prices to rise temporarily this year, as businesses pass on some of their higher costs for energy, metals and other raw materials. But Bernanke expressed concern that inflation might persist at an unacceptably high level, particularly if it causes businesses and consumers to expect bigger price increases.

Fed policymakers "must continue to resist any tendency for increases in energy and commodity prices to become permanently embedded in core inflation," Bernanke said.

Before his warning, many investors believed there was a 50-50 chance the Fed might leave its benchmark short-term rate unchanged at its policymaking meeting June 28-29, taking a pause after two years of steady increases. After his remarks, futures markets traders boosted their bets that Fed officials will increase the rate to at least 5.25 percent from 5 percent, for a 17th consecutive increase.

"The markets see [interest] rates going up and staying high for a while," while the economy slows and profits get squeezed, Shulman said.

The Standard & Poor's 500-stock index fell 1.8 percent, its steepest one-day drop since January. The Dow Jones industrial average dropped 1.8 percent, to its lowest level since early March. The Nasdaq composite index shed 2.2 percent, erasing any gain this year. Meanwhile, oil closed at more than $72 a barrel yesterday after Iran's leader threatened to reduce production in response to Western pressure to curtail that nation's nuclear technology program.

Global financial markets have been volatile for more than a month, largely because of uncertainty about inflation, interest rates, oil prices and the pace of U.S. economic growth.

The markets' reaction yesterday reversed the gains recorded Friday, when a weak labor-market report encouraged many investors to think the Fed would not raise interest rates this month for fear of "overshooting," or raising rates too high and triggering a sharper economic slump.

But, Bernanke said, a single economic report, such as one month's employment figures, would not by itself change the Fed's interest rate policy. Rather, because interest rate changes take effect over many months, the Fed would study how such a report affects its forecast for the economy six to 12 months down the road.

"He seemed to have greater concern for inflation than a slowing economy," said Stephen Massoca, co-chief executive of the boutique investment bank Pacific Growth Equities LLC.

Fears Of Stagflation Leave Dow Battered (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, June 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0031947

NEW YORK — The Dow Jones industrial average suffered its fifth triple-digit loss in less than a month Monday after Federal Reserve chief Ben Bernanke said the central bank would keep fighting against still-worrisome inflation despite signs of a slowing economy.

The Dow cratered 199 points to 11,049 for a 1.8% loss that was its third worst this year. But stocks of all types fell sharply. The biggest losses came in areas that had been market leaders before the recent slide began after May 10, when the Fed raised interest rates a 16th time and gave no sign it would stop boosting soon. The small-stock Russell 2000 index, for example, slumped 3.2%, as investors continued to reduce risk in their portfolios.

Bernanke's comments unnerved investors because they raise fears of stagflation, an environment of rising prices and stagnating economic growth. His tough talk on inflation also increased concerns that the Fed will raise its target for short-term interest rates, currently 5%, again at the end of June, dashing hopes it would pause in its two-year-long rate-tightening campaign.

The sell-off was the latest example of sharp volatility in reaction to Bernanke's comments. Bernanke, who took over for longtime Fed chief Alan Greenspan in January, continues to take a tough stance on inflation in an effort to enhance his inflation-fighting credentials. But like past new Fed chairmen, analysts say he has had trouble earning credibility with Wall Street and has had mixed success communicating Fed policy.

"Here we have some suspicion the economy may be weakening … and a struggling stock market," says Jim Paulsen, strategist at Wells Capital Management. "And the Fed chairman chooses (Monday) to inform everyone he has decided to get tough on inflation." That suggests the Fed will fight inflation even as the economy falters — "sort of a sense of stagnation," he says. "That's always a bad word for the stock market."

Prior to Bernanke's comments, stocks were already deep in negative territory due to soaring crude prices sparked by threats from Iran that it would reduce oil exports to serve its political needs in the controversy with the West over its nuclear program.

Gary Kaltbaum, a money manager at Kaltbaum & Associates, says the Fed has been sending mixed messages. "Monday, Bernanke states inflation is 'at or above expectations.' But last week, all the other Fed (officials) said inflation was 'well contained.' What changed in a week?"

What's making the Fed officials' job more difficult is they told the market that they will make rate decisions based on economic data. But so-called data dependency creates an awful lot of short-term volatility, says John Caldwell, strategist at McDonald Financial.

Iran Rumblings Push Oil Prices Up (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Oil prices climbed to the highest in nearly a month Monday after Iran warned over the weekend that any efforts to punish the major oil producer could lead to a reduction in world supply.

Average U.S. retail gasoline prices, meanwhile, edged higher.

After jumping more than $1 in trading early in the day, oil ended the day up 27 cents at $72.60 a barrel. That was the highest since May 11 and marked the second-consecutive trading day of increases.

Prices are less than $3 from the all-time high hit in April.

"Today's price spikes may well be yet another ominous sign of higher prices to come, at least for the short- to medium-term," Moody's Economy.com senior economist Matthew Cairns said in a note to clients from London.

Cairns estimated the war of words between several countries, including the USA and Iran, the world's fourth-largest oil producer, has added 20% to the price of oil this year. Oil prices are likely to stay high in the near term, "as heightened geopolitical tensions will continue to spook markets," he said.

Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Sunday denied that Iran is seeking nuclear weapons and said attempts to punish the country would jeopardize the world oil supply. Although Cairns, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and others have noted that Iran relies too much on oil revenue to cut off supplies, the Iranian leader's comments still shook investors.

DOJ_NMG_0031948

Bill Ferer, president of W.H. Reaves, a Jersey City investment management company that focuses on energy, says such statements have a big impact because the balance between supply and demand is so tight.

"At a different time, at a different place, this would be a source of concern, but not nearly as much as it is today," Ferer says. "The market is right to be concerned, given the clear lack of surplus producing capacity in lots of places. We just don't have it."

Although the USA does not import oil from Iran, there is concern that should sanctions be imposed on that country, there would be less oil on the world market.

In other energy news, after falling for two consecutive weeks, the average retail gasoline price rose to $2.89 a gallon Monday, up more than 2 cents from a week ago and 78 cents higher than a year ago, the Energy Department said. Prices rose in such cities as Boston, Chicago and Cleveland, but fell in others, such as San Francisco and Seattle.

Oil accounts for about half of the cost of gasoline at the pump.

High Cost Of Oil Could Put Many Jobs At Risk (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, June 6, 2006

DARLINGTON, S.C. — Gazing out at the thousands of bales of fluffy, white polyester filling Wellman's factory, it's hard to imagine that the man-made fiber has the same origins as a gallon of gasoline.

But it does.

Of the 2.3 billion pounds of materials Wellman produces at its several factories around the world each year, 2 billion are derived from oil or natural gas. The company's polyester is used to make numerous products, including sports apparel, diapers and pillows.

The rising cost of oil has put a squeeze on the companies that use oil as an ingredient for their products. Although they are down from the records seen recently, oil prices are up more than 20% from a year ago and are more than 150% higher than they were five years ago. Natural gas prices have also risen.

Chemicals made from oil are used by companies to manufacture many products consumers rely on every day, such as plastic bottles, aspirin, lipstick and deodorant.

"It's used in pretty much everything," Wachovia economist Jason Schenker says. "I cannot look at my desk and see things that are not petroleum-based."

Even though oil-based products are so pervasive, the direct impact of the rise in the cost of making such goods on consumers has been — and likely will continue to be — minimal. That's because manufacturers, faced with strong global competition, are unable to pass along all of the added costs to customers. That means prices for most oil-derived products will likely barely budge as a result of higher energy costs.

But the impact on manufacturers and other companies that use oil-based ingredients could be significant, causing a ripple effect throughout the economy. As firms are faced with rising prices and see their margins cut, they may have to cut back on production, reduce pay increases or maybe even cut jobs or shut down.

"There's a squeeze going on," Wellman CEO Tom Duff says. High oil prices are "an issue that extends beyond just the gas pump. But that's all anybody really pays any attention to."

Says John Hodgson, chief marketing and sales officer at DuPont, "This is about jobs."

At some companies, job losses are already hitting.

Continental Tire announced last month that 481 employees will lose their jobs July 7 when it will drastically reduce production at its plant in Charlotte. The cutbacks are in part a response to higher raw material costs as well as declining demand for the company's tires in North America, Continental Tire says in a news release. The company has warned it may close the plant entirely. Tires are made with synthetic rubber produced with a chemical derived from oil.

Although pink slips have not been given out, Angela Keener, 44, and her husband, Doug, 47, expect they will be part of the July 7 layoffs because they work on lines at the factory that are set to be cut. They have both worked at the tire plant for 25 years. They met on the factory floor and have been married for 21 years. Her sister and brother-in-law also work at the tire plant.

"It's really upsetting to think that you have put that much time in, and then you have to start over," says Angela of High Shoals, N.C. "I could lose everything I have worked for 25 years."

The layoffs are not unexpected. Angela began taking accounting classes in the fall, and Doug has been taking welding courses. They have also been saving money.

Local governments across the country are warning they may have to let planned road projects lapse because prices for asphalt, an oil-based product, are skyrocketing. That means fewer hours for road workers.

Lynn Kading, president of Hills Materials, a highway contracting company in Rapid City, S.D., says his asphalt costs have doubled in the last year. He figures he has lost $3 million because governments, balking at the asphalt tab, have suspended projects that he has bid on recently.

"It's a big industry concern," Kading says. "It affects how much work we've got. Consequently, it affects how many hours our employees can get. And they have families to feed."

Wachovia's Schenker says the squeeze on companies could become more severe if oil prices exceed $70 a barrel for a considerable period.

Making matters worse, many companies are being hit with higher energy prices on a number of fronts. Not only are prices of oil-based goods increasing, but so are transportation costs and electricity prices.

But an extremely competitive market limits price increases. As the product gets processed further, the price increases typically get smaller because of strong competition at that level. By the time the product is in the hands of the average U.S. consumer, the gains are barely noticeable.

"The further out you get from the initial increases, the less you see them," says Stephen Brown, director of energy economics at the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas.

Don Norman, economist at industry group Manufacturers Alliance/MAPI, says U.S. companies are at a distinct disadvantage compared with companies in other parts of the world.

"While the price of oil may be the same in the U.S. and China, the other cost of production, namely labor … gives foreign competitors that much more of an advantage," he says.

At Wellman, oil and natural gas account for approximately three-quarters of the company's total costs — including payroll and health care, typically the biggest costs for companies. In addition to making polyester, Wellman manufactures a BB-sized material made from energy-derived chemicals used to produce plastic containers made to hold everything from water to shampoo to peanut butter.

"We like to say we control costs well, and we cut costs and we do all the things that we are supposed to do, but when you have that big a piece of it that gets controlled by the price of oil and natural gas, it's much more difficult to be able to keep your costs under control," CEO Duff says. So the company tries to save on energy-related costs anywhere it can.

At its 760-acre factory in Darlington, just a few minutes from the famous NASCAR racetrack, Wellman has installed new software to maximize the efficiency of the company's boilers. The software has reduced energy use in that area by 5%, says plant manager Ian Shaw.

The factory, which operates 24 hours a day, 365 days a year, also cuts some production during peak hours in the summer, when the local utility charges more to encourage conservation during what is typically a two-hour window in late afternoon. And throughout the million-square-foot plant, workers save every scrap — including small, wayward strands of polyester — to be recycled.

Recycling is a way the company has tried to reduce the impact of higher energy costs.

The company is stepping up its use of recycled plastic bottles to make fiber products rather than manufacturing the products using chemicals. Using recycled materials is typically far more expensive than manufacturing with the energy-derived chemicals. But that is no longer a given.

Wellman is also promoting its product that is made from recycled carpeting fibers.

For decades, auto companies have been using the chemicals for "under the hood" applications, Duff says. Wellman in recent years has been working to make the process of separating out the fibers more efficient.

DOJ_NMG_0031950

The company has also raised prices several times in recent months. But the increases do not come close to offsetting the gain in the company's energy costs, Duff says.

"The margins have been tightening because you just haven't been able to pass everything through," he says.

Companies — big and small — that depend on oil as a key ingredient are trying to cope with the higher costs:

•Wilmington, Del.-based DuPont announced May 17 its intent to raise prices for a variety of its products. The company previously increased prices 5% in the fourth quarter and 3% in the first quarter.

But the increases won't completely cover the higher costs. Raw material costs have risen 85% in four years and hit a record in the first quarter, the company says.

"The cost increases have been so significant, so rapid and so sustained, you have a triple whammy," DuPont's Hodgson says. "There comes a point where you say, 'I just can't absorb it anymore.' "

•Profit margins at Erie Molded Plastics in Erie, Pa., have been reduced. Phil Tredway, president of the firm that makes plastic caps for soda and water bottles, says the price of oil-based plastic resin is up as much as 70% from a year ago. He says his suppliers are announcing price changes weekly, making it hard to draw up contracts with his clients.

Tredway says he can pass some of those added costs along to his customers, but not all.

"It makes a difficult business even more difficult," he says.

•Paraffin wax, an oil-based product, is one of the key ingredients in Crayola crayons. Paraffin costs have risen 60% since 2004 and are up 80% from five years ago, Crayola spokesman Eric Zebley says.

But the company has not raised prices. Crayola is taking a number of steps to make its factory in Easton, Pa., more efficient, including reusing more scrap materials.

"We are doing everything we can to keep our crayons affordable and not raise prices," Zebley says.

•Akron, Ohio-based Goodyear Tire and Rubber has raised tire prices five times, 5% to 6% each time, since the start of 2005 in response to the higher raw materials prices.

Approximately two-thirds of Goodyear's raw material costs are related to oil, spokeswoman Tricia Ingraham says. The company's raw materials prices nearly doubled from 2004 to 2005 to $5.6 billion. Raw materials now account for more than two-thirds of Goodyear's total costs.

In addition to raising prices, the company is focusing on higher-end tires, which bring in more money. "Our main focus has been on the higher-margin, higher-technology tire," Ingraham says.

Wellman's Duff warns that high energy costs will likely pose a challenge to companies for many years. And although consumers might not be paying now for the increased costs, they may end up paying for it later, in the form of lost jobs when companies start losing money and are forced to shut down, he says.

"The consumer doesn't want to pay more for the end product," Duff says. "But at the end of the day, (the high cost of energy) gets pushed back to that consumer, whether they recognize it or not."

Runoff For Disgraced Congressman's Seat May Be Bellwether (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, June 6, 2006

A special election today in San Diego to fill the seat of a congressman imprisoned for bribery has become a test of voter discontent with Republican leadership and frustration over the porous border with Mexico.

In the race to replace disgraced Republican former congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, Republican nominee Brian Bilbray, a former three-term congressman from a neighboring district, would in any other time be a heavy favorite against a Democratic opponent.

California's 50th Congressional District tilts heavily Republican in registration. A Democrat hasn't won here in modern times, and President Bush twice carried the district by 10 percentage points.

Yet the race between Bilbray and Francine Busby, a relative newcomer to politics, appears to be coming down to a tight finish. Both candidates have said their private polling shows each with a very slight lead.

DOJ_NMG_0031951

"If Republicans lose a district that is this Republican, they ought to be real worried," says Gary Jacobson, political scientist at the University of California, San Diego. "It's driven by unhappiness with the state of the nation."

The winner will serve out the remaining seven months of Cunningham's term. Whoever wins, Jacobson says, will prevail for reasons that transcend "local politics or local issues."

Bilbray has focused on illegal immigration, criticizing Bush for what he says is amnesty for illegal immigrants and Busby for supporting a bill that would permit those who got into the country illegally to qualify for legal status. Bilbray calls for a crackdown on employers who hire illegal immigrants, thousands of whom have used the area as a port of entry from Mexico.

"The choice between Busby and Bilbray is between benefits for illegals and amnesty, or no benefits," Bilbray says.

With Bush's popularity low in polls in California as well as nationally, Bilbray has made a point of separating himself from the president even as Vice President Cheney visited recently to help Bilbray raise campaign money.

On immigration, Bilbray says of Bush: "We don't casually disagree. We strongly disagree."

Busby has tried to capitalize on voter discontent on issues such as gas prices, deaths of servicemembers in Iraq, and a lobbying scandal in Washington she ties to the Republicans.

"I think people are looking at me as a messenger of hope and a symbol of change in Congress," she says. "People are dissatisfied both with his direction and that of Congress. They see Congress rubber-stamping everything."

She calls Cunningham the personification of corruption and has tried to tie Bilbray to it by pointing to his work as a Washington lobbyist. After losing his House seat in 2000, Bilbray lobbied for clients including an anti-illegal-immigration group and a utility company.

A TV ad she is airing charges Bilbray "flip-flopped on a guest-worker program" and plugs a third candidate — independent anti-illegal-immigration hard-liner William Griffith — as an alternative for conservatives.

"Don't expect lobbyist Brian Bilbray to fix Washington or fix our borders," her ad says.

A school board member who lost overwhelmingly to Cunningham two years ago, Busby has been catapulted to contender status by Cunningham's bribery convictions and Bush's difficulties. She has raised more campaign money, $2.25 million to Bilbray's $1 million as of May 17 federal reports.

Bilbray says his victory would dampen national Democrats' hopes for a House majority.

"Mrs. Pelosi," he says, referring to the House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi who hopes to be elevated out of the minority, "shouldn't be measuring the speaker's office just yet."

All Eyes On California-50 (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan And Patrick O'connor

The Hill, June 6, 2006

SAN DIEGO — Trying to leave nothing to chance, Republicans sought to ensure victory in today's runoff election to replace imprisoned Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham (R-Calif.), while Democrats sought to shape the post-election spin by arguing that even losing is winning.

Hoping to push former Rep. Brian Bilbray (R-Calif.) into office, the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) paid for automated phone calls recorded by President Bush, Laura Bush and Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and kept up its television advertising campaign.

After today's vote, the NRCC will have spent $5 million on the race. Over the weekend, the Republican National Committee (RNC) paid to send approximately 160 "deployed volunteers" to San Diego to help the Bilbray campaign turn out supporters, an RNC official said. An estimated 65 of those volunteers, working 10- to 12-hour days making phone calls and knocking on doors, are Republican staff members on Capitol Hill.

RNC spokesman Josh Holmes said the national party also has from six to eight field staffers in San Diego, including some of their regional directors from other parts of the country.

The RNC's deployment of Hill staff marks a planning shift from at least the past two cycles, when the NRCC was responsible for sending volunteers to the tightest races. The NRCC will no longer operate its Strategic Taskforce for Organizing and Mobilizing People (STOMP) this cycle and instead will allow the RNC to organize those efforts.

DOJ_NMG_0031952

Without a presidential election to dominate the national committee's planning efforts this cycle, the RNC has more flexibility than either of the two congressional campaign committees to coordinate the flow of money, staff and volunteers for these get-out-the-vote drives in the days before an election, the RNC official said.

That means the RNC is in a better position to focus partywide efforts while the congressional committees can focus their planning on individual races.

"It's a more streamlined process," the official said. "There are not as many moving parts."

Carl Forti, spokesman for the NRCC, said, "Bush-Cheney '04 ran one of the best turnout operations in history. [RNC Chairman] Ken Mehlman ran that effort, and it makes total sense for him to be in charge of turnout in November."

As Californians began voting early for today's special general election in the heavily Republican 50th District, Bilbray spent the overcast morning at home with his family while Democrat Francine Busby shook hands with voters at a commuter train station in Encinitas.

Political observers expected the race to be close, although they disagreed on whether it would be a harbinger of Democrats' fortunes for winning the House in November's midterm elections.

If Busby upsets Bilbray, political experts expect that K Street PAC money will flow to Democrats and that it will shape the national media's storyline in a way that is favorable to Democrats.

"This is a psychological race," said former House Democratic Whip Tony Coelho (Calif.). "If the Democrats won it's a foregone conclusion" of a Democratic sweep in November.

Coelho added, "If they lose closely, it will continue the paranoia among Republicans to separate themselves from President Bush."

But Republican strategists said the race to fill Cunningham's seat is a function of circumstance: Cunningham's corruption and the difficulties of motivating voters in a midterm election without a competitive statewide GOP primary.

"Of course the seat itself is a prize, but a win for Democrats would give them drip-drip press coverage for the next couple of months," said a GOP lobbyist. "Republicans can't let that happen."

But the fashion in which the candidates spent the morning could foreshadow tomorrow's results. Bilbray's confidence appeared to grow — his northern San Diego suburban campaign office was relatively quiet as campaign aides listened to Rush Limbaugh and ridiculed Busby for misspeaking about the voting rights of illegal immigrants.

He later appeared, in a dark suit and blue tie, his wife and college-aged daughter in tow, at the San Diego County office building to cast his vote and take a few questions from reporters.

A Survey USA poll released yesterday found that Bilbray led Busby, 47-45 percent. The poll had a five-point margin of error. Busby had led in previous polls.

"It's too close to call," said Jon Fleischman, former executive director of the California state GOP and editor of FlashReport.com. "There's a slight edge to Bilbray because of the numbers in the district, and he's benefiting from Busby's last-minute gaffe."

The potential spoiler in the race, anti-immigration independent candidate William Griffith, spent the day teaching geometry to students in a Carlsbad high school. He started campaigning when school let out late yesterday afternoon, he said.

While Bilbray might have some breathing room, the final days of his campaign have not been easy. McCain pulled out of a fundraiser because he and Bilbray disagree on whether to grant a form of amnesty to illegal immigrants.

And Bill Hauf, a conservative Republican whom Bilbray faces in the GOP primary to run for a full two-year term in November, continued to pummel him on the immigration issue.

"The question is whether Hauf's $1 million will further suppress the conservative vote," Fleischman said, noting that Hauf has sent out several hard-hitting direct-mail pieces criticizing Bilbray and carefully explaining to voters that they do not have to vote for the same person in the special general election and in the primary.

As Republicans ran scared in the final day before the election, Democrats worked overtime to shape the storyline about what a victory or loss would mean — or would not mean — about the Democrats' shot at winning the House in November, or coming up short.

Strategists argued that, win or lose, they have triumphed because they forced Republicans to spend millions to win Cunningham's overwhelmingly GOP district — the equivalent of their spending millions to save Rep. Barney Frank's seat in Massachusetts. They suggested that Busby, who lost to Cunningham in 2004 and would likely win the Democratic nomination to run again for a full two-year term in November, has been a less-than stellar candidate who nonetheless has turned a race that should have been a GOP rout into a nail biter.

That an inexperienced candidate could run a close race in a heavily GOP district, a Democratic source said, should worry Republican incumbents running against seasoned politicians in Ohio, Pennsylvania, Florida and Connecticut.

Since the April primary, Democrats have spent $2 million on phone banks, direct-mail pieces and television advertisements attacking Bilbray or encouraging conservative voters to support Griffith.

Bilbray downplayed the national implications of the race and complained to reporters that the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee and Busby had distorted his 25-year record in public service, adding that it was "unheard of" for a candidate of one party to run ads supporting a candidate of another party.

Conducting morning drive time radio interviews by cell phone and shaking hands with voters in the coastal town of Encinitas, Busby agreed that the race would be a harbinger for November even if she lost.

"Yes, absolutely," Busby said. "When I first ran I was dismissed as a sacrificial lamb, but I am where I am in such a tight race because people in this district have a desire for change."

Parties On Edge In California (RC)

By David Drucker

Roll Call, June 6, 2006

The wild special election to replace former Rep. Duke Cunningham (R) in California's 50th district comes to a head today, and the outcome will have broad implications in the battle for the House and on the role issues such as illegal immigration and ethics might play in the fall.

In a normal year, the race probably wouldn't be close.

But Cardiff school board member Francine Busby (D) has pushed ex-Rep. Brian Bilbray (R) to the limit in the special election runoff that was forced by Cunningham's resignation and subsequent incarceration after he admitted to taking bribes. Republicans acknowledge that she effectively has exploited Bilbray's post-legislative career as a lobbyist in a San Diego-area district that has experienced multiple corruption scandals of late, including at the local government level.

But Bilbray, a longtime, staunch opponent of illegal immigration despite other views considered moderate by Republican standards, successfully has nailed Busby on that subject. His support for the hardline House immigration bill — and his opposition to the Senate bill — has been well-received by voters and the local newspapers.

The race also has enabled national organizations to give the strategies they plan to use in the fall a trial run.

"This election, five months out, has given both parties a chance to test the messages they will use in November," said Martha McKenna, campaign services director for EMILY's List, which is playing heavily in the race on Busby's behalf.

Republicans, who have been apprehensive about their chances for weeks despite the 50th district's solid GOP tilt (there are about 50,000 more registered Republicans there than Democrats), now feel cautiously optimistic that Bilbray will squeak out the victory.

Republican sources both in the district and in Washington, D.C., said that Bilbray turned the corner in the past five days, partly because for the past two weeks of the campaign the main topic of debate had been illegal immigration.

Although the GOP base there has been described as unhappy with the party's leadership on Capitol Hill and ambivalent toward Bilbray, one Republican said that the GOP has returned to the fold in recent days.

"Bilbray's camp is now super energized — just where you want to be the day before a tight election," a Republican House aide with knowledge of the race said Monday.

Even if Busby loses today, some Democrats believe the race will have helped them toward their goal of taking back the House

this November. The National Republican Congressional Committee will end up spending up to $4.8 million to defend a GOP seat, said one Democratic strategist, giving Republicans less money to use in the fall to either defend more vulnerable Republican seats or target Democratic seats. The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee had spent $2 million on this race as of Friday.

That Busby has benefited in this campaign from the fact that Bilbray has worked as a lobbyist since losing his House seat to now-Rep. Susan Davis (D) in 2000 also has buoyed Democrats. This proves, the Democratic strategist indicated, that a message centered around the need to send "change" candidates to Washington to address the lobbying scandals — many of which have been associated with GOP lawmakers — could be a potent strategy.

If Busby wins, look to hear one word spouted by Democrats over and over again: momentum; as in, positive momentum for fundraising, volunteer recruitment, media coverage and overall excitement about November.

McKenna, of EMILY's List, believes Busby's message of clean government has resonated with the district's voters in the wake of the Cunningham scandal and said Bilbray's move to change the subject to illegal immigration has failed. But conservative activist Grover Norquist said the jury's still out on that claim.

Norquist argued there is no better district to test the effectiveness of the Democrats' "culture of corruption" message, at least as one that can help Democrats pick up the 15 seats they need to take control of the House.

If Busby loses in a district whose former Congressman went to jail for taking bribes, Norquist said it effectively eliminates "culture of corruption" as a Democratic trump card in November.

"If you're going to have tsunami in November, you're going to have to surf a wave in San Diego in June," he said.

Ron Nehring, chairman of the San Diego County Republican Party and vice chairman of the state GOP, cautioned against reading too much into the results of this race.

Nehring said the race revolves around a number of issues, and he predicted that individuals and political factions looking for evidence to support a particular point of view will cherry-pick from the election's results and spin those results to prove the point that suits them.

"This special election is awash in externalities: Duke Cunningham, national mood, national issues, and forces outside the 50th, all acting on this special election — so I think it's easy to overestimate the impact of those externalities," Nehring said. "I think we're looking at a confluence of factors that is unlikely to be repeated in any Congressional district."

As they have for weeks, both parties are playing heavily in this race. Estimates peg the number of Democratic volunteers on the ground for Busby at around 400, with at least 160 Republican volunteers under the supervision of about seven Republican National Committee staffers on the ground for Bilbray.

The RNC is coordinating the get-out-the-vote effort for Bilbray, and in recent days volunteers have logged about 105,000 phone calls and knocked on nearly 20,000 doors. Meanwhile, both the DCCC and the NRCC have been on television and radio for weeks with independent expenditure campaigns.

With the polls closing at 8 p.m. PST tonight, a number of wildcards remain that could affect the outcome of this race.

The regular statewide primary is also being held today, and voters in the 50th district essentially will have two ballots. One is for the special election and features Bilbray, Busby, a Libertarian candidate and an Independent; the other is for the regular primary and includes the party primaries for the 50th district race for the right to run for a full term in November.

The winner of the special election earns the privilege of serving only the remainder of Cunningham's term. In addition to fending off Busby from the left, Bilbray has had to deal with multimillionaire Bill Hauf (R) on the right, running against the former Congressman on the regular primary ballot for the GOP nomination to the November election.

The Independent candidate on the runoff ballot, William Griffith, was endorsed by the San Diego Minuteman, the local chapter of an outspoken, anti-illegal immigration group whose volunteers have patrolled the Mexican border.

Busby has had the luxury of a unified Democratic Party behind her candidacy and might also benefit from the gubernatorial primary on the ballot today between state Treasurer Phil Angelides (D) and state Controller Steve Westly (D). Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) is not being contested in his primary.

But Busby's biggest problem might be of her own making. She was recorded at a campaign event Friday telling a group of supporters, many of whom were Latino and spoke Spanish as a first language, that "you don't need papers to vote." Busby said she simply meant to say that non-citizens were allowed to volunteer on her campaign, but Republicans have used the recording against her.

The NRCC went up with radio ads about the recording Monday morning, and it has been playing repeatedly on conservative talk radio. Republicans monitoring the race credit this statement with sending undecided voters and unenthusiastic Republicans into Bilbray's camp.

GOP Seeks To Capitalize On Busby Remarks (AP-Y2)

By Allison Hoffman

AP2, June 5, 2006

Republicans seized on Democrat Francine Busby's comments that sounded like encouragement for illegal immigrants to help her campaign as the GOP sought an edge in the final hours of a surprisingly close House race.

Immigration looms large in the runoff election Tuesday in the San Diego-area district some 30 miles from the U.S.-Mexico border. Busby's remarks, and her subsequent explanation that she misspoke, has drawn much of the attention in the race's last days.

Speaking to a largely Hispanic audience last Thursday, Busby faced a Spanish-speaking questioner who said he wanted to help her campaign but lacked voting papers. The question was translated into English and she responded, "Everybody can help. You can all help. You don't need papers for voting, you don't need to be a registered voter to help."

Busby's GOP rival, Brian Bilbray, criticized the Democrat, saying she was encouraging possible illegal immigrants to volunteer for the campaign. On Monday, the GOP launched a radio ad that said, "That's right. Francine Busby says you don't need papers to vote."

Busby said repeatedly throughout the weekend that she misspoke. She said she had been trying to encourage underage high school students or people who weren't registered — but are in the country legally — to participate in the political process.

"I had a slip of the tongue and I corrected it immediately," Busby said. "I want to make it unequivocal that I do not support anyone who is here illegally voting or working on campaigns."

In the traditional GOP stronghold, registered Republicans outnumber Democrats, 3-to-2. But the downfall of convicted former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, doing time for accepting bribes, has given Democrats hope of capturing the seat.

The winner of Tuesday's runoff will serve the remaining seven months of Cunningham's term. The prevailing party will play up the outcome as an early barometer of the November midterm elections.

Reflecting the high stakes, the two parties have spent more than $6 million combined on the contest. President Bush and first lady Laura Bush recorded automated telephone messages for Bilbray. A mass e-mailing from Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., the party's 2004 presidential nominee, was sent last week to more than 100,000 supporters urging them to help get out the vote. Early voting began this weekend at county registrars' offices, with several hundred casting ballots. Busby and Bilbray voted on Monday.

Busby, a local school board member, has focused her campaign on an anti-corruption theme and assailed Bilbray, a former congressman, for his time working as a lobbyist. On immigration, she backs the Senate-passed bill that combines enhanced border security with a guest worker program and a shot at citizenship for many of the 11 million illegal immigrants in the country.

Bilbray, who highlights his congressional experience, favors construction of a fence "from the Pacific Ocean to the Gulf of Mexico," and barring "illegal aliens from any access to Social Security benefits."

On his Web Site, he offers no plan for treatment of the illegal immigrants currently in the country.

A fractious Republican Party base and the presence of a third candidate are the wild cards in the race.

Some conservatives consider Bilbray too liberal on social issues and even on immigration. The ultraconservative San Diego Minutemen have endorsed William Griffith, an American Independent on the runoff ballot who won less than 1 percent in the April special election that led to the runoff.

Griffith has spent only a few thousand dollars on his campaign, but last week got a boost from Busby's campaign, which ran ads on conservative talk stations encouraging listeners concerned about immigration to vote for Griffith.

Bilbray also faces a primary challenge from self-financed candidate Bill Hauf, who backs Bilbray in the runoff but has recently spent more than $100,000 on radio ads running to his right for the Republican berth in November's election.

"The Republican Party is splitting 14 ways from Sunday on border issues, along with fiscal issues and social issues," said Carl Luna, a political scientist at Mesa College. "The real conservatives may just take their jacks and go home."

8 States Hold Primaries For Some Offices (AP-Y2)

By Robert Tanner

AP2, June 5, 2006

The old adage says all politics are local. But challengers this year are convinced that national dissatisfaction with Iraq, immigration and political corruption give them an unusual chance to topple sitting governors, senators and House members.

Primaries on Tuesday for governor in Alabama and California, a Senate seat in Montana and a handful of House contests, among other races, will put their faith to the test.

The most-watched congressional contest is the only one that will actually put someone in office — a special election in southern California to replace jailed former Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham. Democrats hope to win in what has long been a conservative, GOP stronghold, and the race is seen as a bellwether for fall midterm elections.

In all, eight states are holding primaries, with polls also open in Mississippi, New Jersey, New Mexico, South Dakota and Iowa, where there is an open governor's seat.

In Montana, revelations of three-term Republican Sen. Conrad Burns (news, bio, voting record)' ties to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff have made him one of the most vulnerable members of Congress, inspiring a vigorous contest among Democrats for the right to face him this November.

The issues in Alabama include tax policy, social conservatism and immigration, as GOP Gov. Bob Riley's failed tax increases have spurred both a Republican primary and a heated contest among Democrats. Former Judge Roy Moore is challenging Riley for the GOP nomination, after gaining social conservatives' notice for his unsuccessful fight to put a Ten Commandments monument in his courthouse.

Among the Democrats hoping to get Riley's job is former Gov. Don Siegelman, who will likely be in federal court on racketeering and bribery charges. His toughest opponent is Democratic Lt. Gov. Lucy Baxley.

In California, early polls that showed a drop in GOP Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's popularity raised Democratic hopes. But he's benefited from a mean-spirited Democratic primary campaign between Treasurer Phil Angelides and Controller Steve Westly. Schwarzenegger faced no major primary competition.

"It seems clearly to be a time when people are not real happy and not thrilled with incumbents almost anywhere," said Norm Ornstein, a political analyst at the American Enterprise Institute. "There's no doubt you're getting highly attractive (challengers) running because of the peculiar circumstances."

It's always uncertain whether national dismay will trickle down when people vote for their own members of Congress, and the connection is even harder to make to governors.

But already this year, possible signs of anti-incumbent sentiment have emerged in Oregon, where Democratic Gov. Ted Kulongoski won a hard-fought primary with only 54 percent support; GOP Rep. Don Sherwood (news, bio, voting record), a Pennsylvania congressman, faced a surprisingly strong challenge from a poorly funded, little-known opponent; and voters threw out more than a dozen Pennsylvania state legislators over a legislative pay raise.

Polls track the discontent: An AP-Ipsos poll last month found the electorate's mood souring, with 73 percent of those polled saying the nation is on the wrong track. That poll had President Bush's approval ratings down to a low of 33 percent, with Congress even lower at 25 percent.

The efforts to highlight discontent over national issues pops up in primary campaigns everywhere. Immigration has been argued in Alabama, California and New Mexico; Iraq in California and New Mexico; political corruption in Montana; ties to oil companies and complaints about gas prices in California; abortion in Iowa.

DOJ_NMG_0031957

California's special election pits Republican former House Rep. Brian Bilbray against Democrat Francine Busby for Cunningham's former seat in a conservative San Diego-area district. It's brought national money and speculation that a Democratic win would be a taste of bigger victories in the fall.

Their ads: Bilbray featured his fight against illegal immigration, while Busby promised higher ethical standards.

Democrats also are hoping for a critical autumn victory in Montana, where Burns, seeking a fourth term, has denied that Abramoff or his money ever influenced him. He has blamed the "Eastern liberal press" for his troubles and predicted that Montana voters "will make the right judgment call."

Among other races that Tuesday's primaries will sort out for the fall:

• An open governor's seat in Iowa brought out four Democrats hoping to face GOP Rep. Jim Nussle (news, bio, voting record).

• Republican Tom Kean Jr., son of the former governor, was favored in the GOP primary to challenge New Jersey Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez.

• Former California governor and presidential candidate Jerry Brown, term-limited from staying on as Oakland mayor, is running for state attorney general.

In many cases, Democrats are hoping to capitalize on anti-incumbency sentiment — a reflection on the GOP control of the House, the Senate and a majority of the nation's governorships.

"All the short-term factors are working in the Democrats' favor," said Merle Black, an expert at presidential and Southern politics at Emory University. "To the extent that these elections are nationalized, the Democrats ought to come out better. But I don't know if the national thing really plays out in state contests."

Up For Grabs Midterm Tea Leaves Signal Hot Water For Republicans (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- As a bad year for Republicans keeps getting worse, expectations are growing that Democrats could capture at least one house of Congress, ending one-party dominance of the nation's capital and crippling President Bush for his final years.

If the current mood holds, Democrats are in a position to win the 15 seats they need to take control of the House. They have a harder task, however, snagging the six seats needed in the Senate. As the list of vulnerable Republicans grows, all sides are scouting for signs of an electoral wave like that of 1994, which swept away the Democrats' four-decade control of Congress.

A key factor is the president's approval ratings, which are even lower in states featuring key battles than they are nationally. A recent poll had him at 23% in New York, home to as many as six endangered Republicans. Particularly threatened are Republican moderates in Democratic-leaning areas, including the Northeast, the Ohio River Valley and Florida.

In all these areas, seniors are disgruntled about the new Medicare prescription-drug benefit and the administration's now-dead proposal to remake Social Security. In midterm elections, with their low turnouts, seniors account for roughly 40% of the vote.

Two elections being held today are being closely watched as potential barometers for the fall: a special election in California to replace former Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, who has pleaded guilty to bribery charges; and a Senate primary in Montana, where scandal-touched Sen. Conrad Burns faces a Republican challenge.

Democrats are hoping that Iraq, gas prices, immigration and the environment will boost turnout for their side just as conservatives demoralized by spending and scandals opt to stay home. (See related article1.)

Much can change between now and the elections. Democrats are sparring over what agenda, if any, to put forward and their leaders don't have the tactical vision of former Rep. Newt Gingrich, who inspired the 1994 Republican revolutionaries. Scandals have embroiled two of their House members and voters appear to be turning against all incumbents, putting some Democrats at risk, too.

DOJ_NMG_0031958

Recent polls and primaries, however, suggest voters are gunning for the party in power. If the elections were held today, "Democrats would take at least one of the houses," says analyst Bernadette Budde, senior vice president of the Business Industry Political Action Committee, which typically favors Republicans.

Republicans won't lose for lack of funds. Mr. Bush may be a drag on his party, but he remains a money magnet. He recently raised $860,000 at one Florida event for endangered Rep. Clay Shaw -- nearly as much as many House members spend in a whole campaign.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois and Sen. Chuck Schumer of New York, who head the Democrats' House and Senate campaign committees, have raised more than ever before. Yet Democrats fear -- and Republicans hope -- that the minority party could fall short when it comes to buying costly TV ads in suburban battlegrounds later this year. The House

For Democrats to net 15 seats for a bare majority of 218 is harder than the number suggests. The remapping of the 435 districts after the 2000 census leaves no more than several dozen seats up for grabs. Currently Republicans have 231 to Democrats' 202, which includes one Independent ally. (Two seats are currently vacant.)

Democrats have one big advantage: few vulnerable seats of their own. The anti-Bush climate has a lot to do with that. Also, Democrats have few seats in the conservative South, reflecting the Republican realignment since the civil-rights era.

Stuart Rothenberg, an independent analyst once skeptical of Democrats' chances, now says: "Although I can't count the seats right now to get Democrats to 218, my gut tells me that by November they'll be there."

The Northeast

With a big wave of support, Democrats could plausibly reach a majority without leaving the Northeast and Mid-Atlantic, home to about a third of the 40 to 50 hottest races.

Mr. Bush's approval rating is in the low 30s nationally. In these states it is generally lower. Half of the 18 House districts with Republican representatives that picked Al Gore or John Kerry for president are located here. The Iraq war is especially unpopular as are Mr. Bush's environmental policies. Many voters, including moderate, suburban Republicans, also dislike the party's emphasis on cultural issues such as gay marriage, as well as its fiscal record.

Even the head of Republicans' House campaign committee, Rep. Tom Reynolds of New York, now is on some handicappers' watch lists. Republican turnout in New York could be particularly low because the party doesn't have strong candidates to excite voters running against Democrats Sen. Hillary Clinton and gubernatorial aspirant Eliot Spitzer.

On election night, northwest Connecticut's Rep. Nancy Johnson will be "my canary in the coal mine," says Amy Walter of the Cook Political Report. In a normal year, the 12-term Republican congresswoman would be safe, even though Mr. Bush twice failed to carry her district. If Mrs. Johnson loses, Ms. Walter says expect a national Republican wipe-out. Mrs. Johnson is a popular, well-funded moderate who is already running TV ads.

The Midwest

In the Ohio River Valley, home to economic troubles and scandals both local and national, nine House Republicans are targets. They include Ohio Rep. Bob Ney, who faces possible indictment in the widening corruption scandal relating to convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Mr. Bush twice carried Ohio, Kentucky and Indiana, but polls show that only a third of their residents approve of his performance. All three states have unpopular Republican governors.

Central Ohio's seven-term Rep. Deborah Pryce is threatened as never before. With Congress so unpopular, her status as the fourth-ranking House leader could become a liability. Mr. Bush easily carried her Columbus-based district in 2000, but nearly lost it in 2004 after a Democratic voter-registration drive.

Republicans take heart that Democrats failed to recruit strong challengers to face other vulnerable incumbents, such as Kentucky's Anne Northup -- whose district went for Gore and Kerry -- or even the embattled Mr. Ney. Republicans also seem prepared for the challenge. That is a contrast, says Carl Forti, communications director of the National Republican Congressional Committee, with the complacency of many Democrats in 1994.

"Anyone who could potentially be in trouble is already paying attention," Mr. Forti says. "That makes it harder to sneak up and beat them."

Florida and the Southwest

DOJ_NMG_0031959

While Florida and the southwest have been friendly areas to Republicans, Democrats have made inroads. Republican seats from Florida to California could now be at risk as a potential Hispanic backlash to the House's hard-line immigration bill combines with seniors' worries about Social Security and Medicare, as well as well as voters' vexation generally with war, scandal and deficits.

That dynamic threatens conservative Rep. J.D. Hayworth, the firebrand from suburban Phoenix, and New Mexico's Heather Wilson. Democrats hope to pick up the Texas seat of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay, who is officially stepping down this week to face trial on corruption charges.

In Florida, five of 18 Republican-held seats are at risk -- none more so than that of 13-term Rep. Clay Shaw. The district, which Mr. Bush lost twice, includes more voters over the age of 65 than any other and Mr. Shaw was a prominent backer of the administration's Medicare and Social Security policies. Such issues have been used against him before, but not in a year so hostile to Republicans. The Senate Democrats' chance for a Senate majority is limited by the lineup of races. Democrats already hold 18 of 33 seats up for grabs. Seven of the Republicans' 15 seats are considered safe, putting eight Republican seats in play. Handicappers say three of those are reachable only in the event of a Democratic landslide.

That leaves five. And with the Senate divided 55 Republicans to 45 Democrats, counting one Vermont Independent, Democrats need six to get to a majority of 51. Moreover, the minority party has several seats of their own to protect.

Top Targets

In most danger are two Republicans from opposite ends of the party's spectrum -- liberal Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and conservative Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania. Both states twice went for Democrats over Mr. Bush. In Rhode Island, Mr. Bush's 21% approval rating in one poll has been his worst anywhere.

Democrats say the two-term Mr. Santorum, the third-ranking Senate leader, is too conservative for the state. Unlike other Republicans, he didn't flinch last year from supporting Mr. Bush on Social Security. Democrats recruited state Treasurer Bob Casey, son of the popular late governor, to run against him, over the objection of women's groups. The Democrat, like Mr. Santorum, opposes abortion rights.

Mr. Chafee is doubly threatened. He faces an intraparty challenge from a conservative backed by the antitax Club for Growth, which seeks to punish Mr. Chafee for opposing the Bush tax cuts. If Mr. Chafee survives the September primary, he has just weeks to campaign against Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse, a former prosecutor and state attorney general. Normally Mr. Chafee would be favored to win a second full term. He didn't vote for the president in 2004 and his opposition to Mr. Bush may provide some protection in November, if it doesn't cost him the primary.

Ohio's Mike DeWine and Missouri's Jim Talent are also big targets. Mr. DeWine has upset social conservatives for his position on judicial nominations, among other issues, and is also facing scandals within the Ohio Republican party, in addition to national ones. In Missouri, Mr. Talent has a conservative base unhappy with his vacillation on a stem-cell research issue that will be on November's ballot.

Montana's Mr. Burns was fairly well prepared to run for a fourth term -- until his contacts with Mr. Abramoff drew Justice Department scrutiny. He has denied any wrongdoing. He faces several challengers in today's primary. Although he is expected to survive, some Republicans still hope he will drop out by August. Democrats have made gains in the populist state and have a couple of credible candidates. A poll that ran in some Montana newspapers recently suggested either could beat Mr. Burns.

Other Notable Battles

In the case of a big swing to Democrats, Republicans could lose seats in Tennessee and Arizona. Democrats are even targeting a Virginia seat long thought safe.

Three Tennessee Republicans, including two former House members, are vying for the nomination to succeed Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, who is retiring and weighing a 2008 presidential campaign. The winner will face Democratic Rep. Harold Ford Jr., who would be the state's first black senator. Mr. Ford has a moderate record and has already run TV ads, although he would have to overcome the state's Republican tilt.

Arizona's Jon Kyl is favored for a third term but he could be hurt by a Hispanic backlash. Mr. Kyl wants a tougher approach to illegal immigrants than either Mr. Bush or Arizona's better-known Republican senator, John McCain.

DOJ_NMG_0031960

Virginia's George Allen once was considered a shoe-in, but he is now on handicappers' watch lists. As he focused on a possible 2008 presidential campaign, two potent opponents emerged. Some national Democratic leaders support Vietnam veteran James Webb, a former Republican and Reagan administration Navy secretary who opposes the Iraq war.

Democrats on the Defensive

Half of Democrats' 18 seats are safe and in several red states, Republicans failed to recruit strong challengers. Democrats are indeed being tested -- but in blue states, such as Maryland, New Jersey, Michigan and Washington.

In Maryland, Republicans are united behind Lt. Gov. Michael Steele to be the state's first black senator. Democrats won't pick their nominee until Sept. 12. Rep. Ben Cardin is favored over Kweisi Mfume, former head of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and Democrats fear disgruntled black voters might jump to Mr. Steele.

Michigan's Debbie Stabenow is weakened by local conditions. Michigan has missed the nation's economic recovery and its unpopular Democratic governor heads the party ticket.

In New Jersey, Robert Menendez is facing his first election for a seat to which he was appointed. His Republican foe, Tom Kean, has a valuable name: His father was a popular former Republican governor and recent co-chairman of the 9/11 commission.

House At Stake, Midterm Election Gets Early Start (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 5 — Congressional campaigns have begun early and with unusual intensity this year in many districts across the country, reflecting a consensus in both parties that Republicans could lose control of the House and perhaps the Senate.

A special election in a bedrock Republican Congressional district in San Diego on Tuesday — for the seat left vacant when Representative Randy Cunningham resigned after pleading guilty to corruption charges — has sharpened the early intensity and could provide the clearest evidence so far about whether Democrats can capitalize on the unsettled political climate.

The National Republican Congressional Committee, fearful that a loss or meager victory could further rattle the party and give Democrats a huge boost, has poured at least $4.5 million into the district. And it has enlisted President Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and Laura Bush to make automated telephone calls to voters, putting the prestige of the White House on the line.

But even for candidates who will not face the voters for five months, the campaign is shaping up as not only the most contested midterm election in over a decade, but also the most substantive.

In a typical election year, intense campaign activity normally does not begin until around Labor Day.

Democrats and Republicans said they were struck by the level of political activity now going on. Television advertisements have been shown by candidates in at least five districts, party officials said, and there are radio and Internet advertisements popping up around the country. Moveon.org, the liberal advocacy group, began broadcasting hard-hitting advertisements attacking Republican incumbents in four states nearly three months ago and is about to start a second round on Thursday, officials with the organization said.

Visits last week to three competitive districts — encompassing an endangered Republican in Pennsylvania, an endangered Democrat in Illinois and a race for an open seat in upstate New York — found incumbents and their challengers locked in debates over a strikingly wide range of issues, including the war in Iraq, tax cuts, immigration, stem cell research and raising the minimum wage.

If this early pattern holds, it could undercut Republican efforts to prevent this election from becoming a national referendum on Mr. Bush and Republican policies.

In New York's highly contested 24th District, left vacant by the retirement of Representative Sherwood Boehlert, a Republican, the Democratic candidate, Michael A. Acuri, called for the United States to get out of Iraq as soon as possible.

"We shouldn't have been there in the first place," Mr. Acuri said, "and we really need to start bringing the troops home."

DOJ_NMG_0031961

His opponent, Ray Meier, speaking over coffee before holding a news conference with Republican supporters in Seneca Falls, N.Y., said that the United States should stay until the situation there stabilized, and that Mr. Bush had been correct in taking the country to war.

"History will judge this as having been the right thing to have done," Mr. Meier said. "Saddam Hussein was a regional security threat for well over a decade before we went in."

In the suburbs of Philadelphia the other day, Lois Murphy, a Democratic challenger to Representative Jim Gerlach, one of the Democrats' top targets, called a news conference to attack Mr. Gerlach for not supporting an increase in the minimum wage. "The minimum wage hasn't been raised in a decade by the U.S. Congress," Ms. Murphy said. "In that period of time, Congress has given itself a raise five times."

And sitting in his campaign headquarters in Lake Zurich, Ill., outside Chicago, David McSweeney, a Republican challenger to Representative Melissa Bean, said Ms. Bean's re-election would lead to the repeal of Mr. Bush's tax cuts and legislation that would permit some illegal immigrants to gain citizenship, something he has campaigned against.

"Melissa Bean has voted with Democrats in Congress 83 percent of the time," Mr. McSweeney said. "Her first vote would be to make Nancy Pelosi speaker of the House. I'm talking about the implications of what happens if Democrats take control of the House."

The contours of the gathering debate became clear in interviews in these three districts, along with others during a Memorial Day recess that took candidates to V.F.W. halls, parades and news conferences. After a decade in which Congressional elections have been derided as often being free of issues, or characterized by personal attacks, there seems to be an abundance of things for the candidates to talk about. And they are talking about them.

Mr. Acuri is drawing a contrast with Republicans on stem cell research. "Ray Meier and George Bush both oppose stem cell research — and I think that's where we should be going," he said.

In Illinois, Tammy Duckworth, a Democrat given a strong chance of winning a Republican seat being left vacant by the retirement of Henry J. Hyde, attacked Republicans on earmarks, a budgetary process used by members of Congress to send federal dollars to favored projects.

"Earmarks can have some benefit, but I just think that approaching $9 trillion in debt, where we are borrowing millions of dollars from China, there has got to be a line," Ms. Duckworth said at a V.F.W. picnic in Addison, outside Chicago.

Abortion rights are emerging as an issue, on both sides of the divide. In Pennsylvania, Ms. Murphy said of her opponent: "That's one way that Congressman Gerlach is out of step with this district. He opposes the right to choose, and that's not what this district supports."

Mr. Meier, seeking the seat of Mr. Boehlert, who supported abortion rights, said he would emphasize his own opposition to abortion. "You'll find that my record is consistent, and I'm strong on the issue," he said. "I won't dodge or waver if it is raised."

Candidates from both parties are battling over whether Mr. Bush's tax cuts should be made permanent. Mr. McSweeney called them essential for the nation's prosperity. Ms. Bean said she would support making the tax cuts permanent only "so long as we're cutting spending," adding, "Otherwise it's not a tax cut; it's just a deferred tax increase."

Mr. Acuri, the Democrat running in New York, said Congress should roll back tax cuts for the upper-income taxpayers. "We have these record deficits," he said, "and we are mortgaging our country to reduce the taxes on the top 1 percent."

Ms. Murphy attacked Mr. Gerlach for supporting the strict House immigration bill sponsored by Representative F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Republican of Wisconsin. "He voted for the Sensenbrenner bill — he's a hard-liner," she said. "I would not. Making it a felony for clergy to assist people in need? I think that's totally inappropriate."

Mr. Gerlach said: "I do not support amnesty. I think we need to continue to work through this issue of guest workers."

Not surprisingly, Mr. Bush is hovering over the races in these early days. When Ms. Murphy campaigned in Pottstown, Pa., the other night, she told a small crowd, "You probably know that President Bush came in and did a fund-raiser for Congressman Gerlach, and Congressman Gerlach has been very close to the administration."

Mr. Gerlach said he was not concerned by such criticism. "We're not running away from the president," he said. "We're not running to the president. We're running for the House of Representatives. When we agree with the president, we talk about that, and when we disagree with the president, we'll talk about that."

Democrats Advised On Military Relations (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

Democrats are seeking ways to reach out to military families, hosting a discussion yesterday to help congressional staffers better communicate with men and women serving in the armed forces.

Kathy Roth-Douquet and Frank Schaeffer, authors of "AWOL: The Unexcused Absence of America's Upper Classes from Military Service -- and How it Hurts Our Country," spoke in a Capitol basement office filled with Democratic staffers who shared their personal stories of military service and examples of being part of a military family while trying to relate to "elite" colleagues who "dismissed" their experiences.

"To trivialize this doesn't win any friends or sense of understanding," Mrs. Roth-Douquet said of the "great disconnect" between liberal and military culture.

Mrs. Roth-Douquet and Mr. Schaeffer presented their "top 10 mistakes people make when dealing with the military" as a what-not-to-do list when communicating with those in the military.

While it was noted that those in attendance were already likely to be "sensitive to the disconnect," Mrs. Roth-Douquet and Mr. Schaeffer said it would be beneficial to have military officers visit congressional offices.

Yesterday's discussion was sponsored by the Truman National Security Project, a Washington think tank that declares its aim is to boost Democrats' "national security credentials" through an "innovative, distinctly Democratic approach to national security."

Mr. Schaeffer described himself as someone "from Massachusetts who usually votes for the Republicans," adding that he thinks the disconnect he and Mrs. Roth-Douquet describe comes from "a guilty relationship between Democrats and the military" after Vietnam

"It wasn't necessarily Democrats spitting on the troops when they returned home," Mr. Schaeffer said. "But those events are certainly more associated with the left."

An unidentified Democratic staffer in attendance said, "When you get down to it, most military values are really Democratic values," which received a warm applause from the estimated two dozen fellow staffers in attendance. Mrs. Roth-Douquet said she agreed with the statement -- but when asked if politicizing military values was dangerous, added, "The military shouldn't be an institution that belongs to either party."

Mr. Schaeffer said he thinks "Congress would be better served" if it was more representative of the American population in the percentage of its members who have served in the military. Mr. Schaeffer, whose son served in the Marines, said part of his motivation for writing the book was to "take it to my rich friends and stick it in their faces."

Mrs. Roth-Douquet, who is the wife of a Marine and has worked on every presidential campaign of the past 20 years, said that Sen. John Kerry, Democrat from Massachusetts, made two mistakes in communicating with veterans during his 2004 presidential campaign.

"He talked about how he was a war hero," Mrs. Roth-Douquet said. "That's not received well in the military. He should have let other people do the talking." Mrs. Roth-Douquet said Mr. Kerry's second mistake was in never publicly apologizing for accusing fellow Vietnam veterans of war crimes.

Webb's Support Of Affirmative Action At Issue (WP)

By Rosalind S. Helderman

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

RICHMOND -- Democratic Senate candidate James Webb has a childhood memory of relatives living hard lives in southwest Virginia communities with no electricity.

That's why when he started studying affirmative action programs as a law student, he came to a question: Why was preferential treatment given on the job to all kinds of ethnic groups that were considered disadvantaged -- Latinos, Asians, blacks, Native Americans -- but not to working-class whites struggling to overcome poverty?

DOJ_NMG_0031963

"The original intent of affirmative action expanded, and a lot of different ethnic groups who never suffered state-sponsored discrimination at all came under the rubric of affirmative action," he said recently. "The assumption that everyone who was white had a benefit and anyone who was not white didn't have a benefit, it was not a fair assumption."

If there was ever proof that Webb, who served as secretary of the Navy in the Reagan administration, is not a typical candidate for a Democratic Party nomination, it is his nuanced -- and, opponents charge, shifting -- position on affirmative action, which has been endorsed by the party establishment for decades.

Webb, a former Marine who joined the Republican Party after the Vietnam War and has returned to the Democratic Party over the Iraq war, said he has been writing and thinking about the issue for years.

On the one hand, he argues that diversity programs that were once intended to help African Americans have been extended to benefit everyone except whites. On the other, he recently has made a point of singling out hardships faced by African Americans, who he said still experience lingering effects of government-sponsored oppression and discrimination.

So Webb comes to an unusual view among candidates in either major party: He supports affirmative action for blacks but otherwise thinks preferential job and education programs should be awarded based on economic conditions or eliminated altogether.

"I think it's time to either open this thing up to poor white groups or just go back to a level playing field -- while keeping an eye on African Americans," said Webb, who is white. "I'm a strong supporter of affirmative action in its original intent, which is to help African Americans."

His opponent in next Tuesday's primary -- to determine who will face Sen. George Allen (R) in the November general election -- is longtime Democratic operative Harris Miller, a former technology industry lobbyist. Miller has characterized Webb's views as out of step with most party members, using affirmative action as a prime example.

"Webb is a Republican disguised as a Democrat," said Del. Lionell Spruill Sr. (D-Chesapeake), a Miller supporter and one of seven members of the Virginia Legislative Black Caucus to endorse the former Fairfax Democratic Committee chairman. "Harris Miller and I go way back, and he has always been for affirmative action."

In a low-turnout primary, Webb's position could cost votes in critical black communities. At the same time, his criticism of diversity programs intended to help groups other than blacks could jeopardize support among such constituencies as women and Latinos who also have benefited from diversity initiatives.

"He's essentially articulated a position on affirmative action that almost no one articulates today," said Robert D. Holsworth, a professor of government at Virginia Commonwealth University who has written a book on affirmative action. "It's not an indefensible position, but it's not a position that fits comfortably into the normal debate."

Webb acknowledges his textured stand is not ready-made for a stump speech and hardly a "30-second sound bite."

For opponents, it's not the issue's complexity but Webb's writings on the topic that are problematic. Webb, a journalist and novelist, wrote a highly complimentary book review in 2000 of the autobiography of Ward Connerly, a prominent opponent of affirmative action who was then a University of California regent.

"Affirmative action, which originally sought to repair the state-induced damage to blacks from slavery and its aftermath, has within one generation brought about a permeating state-sponsored racism that is as odious as the Jim Crow laws it sought to countermand," Webb wrote in the Wall Street Journal.

Nowhere in the column did he suggest that he would support continued affirmative action programs for African Americans, as he has on the campaign trail in recent days.

"I'm not sure where the real Jim Webb is," said state Sen. Henry L. Marsh III (D-Richmond), a longtime civil rights leader and the first black mayor of Richmond. "Why doesn't he just do the manly thing and retract his statement, admit he was wrong, rather than trying to come up with these bizarre explanations?"

Webb insists that his position has not changed since he started thinking deeply on the issue as a Georgetown law student -- shortly after the decorated veteran ended the Marine Corps stint that has formed the backbone of his campaign. He said his ultimate goal has always been to ensure an equal shot at success for everybody.

As for the different emphasis in his Wall Street Journal writing, he said he covered as much ground as he could in a short piece: "How much can you do in a book review?" he said. "Give me a break."

DOJ_NMG_0031964

Last week, Webb countered the criticism by announcing he has the backing of Del. A. Donald McEachin (D-Richmond), also a member of the Legislative Black Caucus and the Democratic nominee for attorney general in 2001.

On Monday, Webb added the support of civil rights leader Milton A. Reid, a former chairman of the Virginia unit of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference. McEachin said he had discussed the issue fully with Webb and pronounced himself more than satisfied.

"It just doesn't get any better than that from an African Americans perspective on affirmative action," he said.

N.H. Democrats Warm To Feingold, Warner (WT)

By Christina Bellantoni

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H. -- Democrats here love to bash President Bush, and cheered wildly for their prominent political visitors over the weekend, when they took aim at the administration.

But while Wisconsin Sen. Russ Feingold fired up the crowd by urging his party to stand up and fight against the Iraq war, former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner gave a broad speech focused mostly on domestic issues, prompting some Democrats to say the Virginian seemed a more likely contender to make it all the way to the White House.

"Senator Feingold spoke to the Democrats, and I felt that Governor Warner spoke to everybody," said Kermit Williams of Wilton, one of about 800 at the New Hampshire Democratic Convention. "It's great to be very focused on a philosophy, but winning in the end is the important thing."

Mr. Feingold and Mr. Warner advised the crowd Saturday on how the party can regain congressional majority and win back the presidency in 2008.

Mr. Feingold, who has called for censuring Mr. Bush, threw the audience political red meat with lines like: "The Constitution and the Bill of Rights were not repealed on 9/11" and "We have got to show that we will stand up to the mistakes of this administration." He also called for universal health care.

Mr. Warner kept the Bush-bashing to a minimum and instead espoused centrist themes of deficit reduction, better math and science education, and ensuring localities have adequate infrastructure to avoid catastrophes like the flooding during Hurricane Katrina.

"We have an administration and Congress that is more interested in building a bridge to nowhere than it is about laying any kind of foundation for future success," he said.

He called for funding alternative-energy research, adding the applause line: "Of course, that would require an administration that believes in science."

The starkest contrast between the Wisconsin senator and the former Virginia governor was their positions on the war in Iraq.

"Why are so many Democrats too timid to say what everybody in America wants? It's time to redeploy the troops. ... I say bring them home by the end of 2006," Mr. Feingold said, bringing most in the crowd to their feet.

Mr. Warner opposes a fixed timetable for troop withdrawal, but said the Bush administration has created a haven for al Qaeda and a frightening situation in Iran with its botched foreign-policy decisions.

"Going out without a plan is just as bad as going in without a plan," Mr. Warner said. "This government has months, not years, to demonstrate its willingness to step up, eliminate the militias and stabilize the country."

Judging by applause and standing ovations, the Democrats were more excited by Mr. Feingold's breakfast keynote than Mr. Warner's lunch speech, but the differing impressions the two men left behind were clear, with most saying the former governor had a better shot at winning the Democratic nomination.

State Sen. Joe Foster of Nashua said Mr. Warner has an impressive record and his speech was well-received by delegates.

Patty Giguere of Goffstown liked both men, but thinks Mr. Warner "is going to go a little farther, that he is maybe a stronger leader."

DOJ_NMG_0031965

State Rep. Jackie Cilley of Strafford said many Democrats will say Mr. Feingold is not "electable" because he is outspoken, but rejects that notion.

"It is well past the time that we should be settling for mediocrity in this country, the lowest common denominator, the safest bet, the candidate that won't get us into trouble," said Mrs. Cilley, 54. "Senator Feingold challenges me. He makes me want to be a better Democrat. He makes me want to be a better citizen of this country."

Both men made their records known -- Mr. Feingold proudly outlined his votes against the Iraq war, USA Patriot Act and NAFTA, while Mr. Warner showed a slick video outlining how he worked with Virginia's Republican legislature to improve education and the state budget.

Clinton Is The Life Of The Democratic Party (NYT)

By Raymond Hernandez

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 5 — In what promises to be his most intensive campaign season since he left office, former President Bill Clinton is scheduled to appear at more than two dozen fund-raisers for Democrats around the country, hoping to collect at least $20 million for his party's drive to recapture Congress.

"In contrast to Republican candidates who are running away from George Bush, our candidates are clamoring for him in every part of the country," said Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

But a spokeswoman for the Republican National Committee, Tracey Schmitt, said President Bush was very much in demand this campaign season, noting that he had appeared at 37 fund-raising events that had raised nearly $125 million since the beginning of 2005.

Ms. Schmitt also took a jab at Democrats, criticizing them as relying on the assistance of a politician no longer in office. "Given the current lineup of Democratic leaders in Washington," she said, "it's no surprise that many Democrats would turn to Bill Clinton for help."

Mr. Clinton's advisers say he is entirely motivated by his desire to resurrect his party's political fortunes.

"President Clinton's goal here is helping Democrats win in 2006 to put Congress in the hands of the party that will get the country back on the right track," said Jay Carson, a spokesman for Mr. Clinton.

Yet there is another potential beneficiary of his largess: his wife, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, who is running for re-election in New York this year. Should Mrs. Clinton decide to run for president in 2008, some Democrats who reap the benefits of her husband's fund-raising this fall may feel a loyalty to him that could extend to her.

In the coming weeks, for example, Mr. Clinton plans to appear at a fund-raiser for Democrats in New Hampshire, an important presidential primary state that his wife has avoided so as not to fuel speculation about any presidential ambitions.

Mr. Clinton has already made a series of appearances on behalf of other Democrats. One was at an event in New York a few weeks ago that raised $1.5 million for the Democratic National Committee, whose fund-raising lags behind that of the Republican National Committee by about $72 million in the current campaign season.

In the last week, Mr. Clinton made five appearances, collecting $3.5 million in visits to Arizona, California and Maine. He has also taken time to help his wife, appearing at several events for her in recent weeks that brought in $1.5 million, his office said. (In all, he has raised $3.4 million for Mrs. Clinton in the current election cycle.)

That said, Mrs. Clinton is a fund-raising machine in her own right, and her efforts on behalf of the Democratic Party have made her a popular headliner among Democrats nationwide. She has helped the party and its candidates raise about $55 million since taking office in 2001.

Mr. Clinton's office says he also intends to appear on behalf of Democratic candidates for governor around the nation. He is scheduled to appear in nine states but is likely to add more as the campaign season heats up, his office says.

Democrats need to pick up 15 seats to win control of the House and six to capture the Senate. Mr. Clinton's aides say he believes the Democrats are in their best position in years to retake control of Congress. But Republicans and many analysts say his emergence in the 2006 campaign also comes at a time when Democrats are still trying to find galvanizing themes to pull together the disparate elements of their party.

Mr. Clinton was a tireless fund-raiser throughout his time in the White House. And despite his busy summer schedule, his office said, he also plans to continue focusing his energies on the Clinton Foundation, the nonprofit organization he set up to work on issues including AIDS, poverty, childhood obesity, and religious and racial reconciliation.

In some places, Mr. Clinton plans to squeeze political and foundation work into the same trips. He will appear at the New Hampshire fund-raiser, for instance, after attending an event highlighting childhood obesity with Dr. Susan Lynch, a pediatrician and the wife of Gov. John Lynch.

Mr. Clinton's fund-raising schedule has included states with competitive races, like Arizona, where Democratic efforts to unseat Senator Jon Kyl, the two-term incumbent Republican, could prove crucial to the party's goal of recapturing the Senate.

Mr. Kyl's Democratic challenger, Jim Pederson, a wealthy shopping mall developer, said in an interview that Mr. Clinton's presence in the state had helped elevate the profile of his campaign.

"I think people will stand up and take notice," said Mr. Pederson, whose campaign collected $500,000 at a recent event featuring Mr. Clinton.

The former president also plans to appear in Denver at a June 16 fund-raiser for Senator Robert Menendez, who faces a strong challenge in New Jersey. Mr. Menendez said in an interview that he had asked Mr. Clinton to headline the event — which was being set up by his colleague from Colorado, Senator Ken Salazar — when he learned that Mr. Clinton would be in town that day.

Mr. Menendez estimated that the former president's presence would increase the total proceeds of the event by about 50 percent. "He is of enormous value to Democrats," Mr. Menendez said.

A Little More Clinton At Clinton Library (WP/AP)

By The Associated Press

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

LITTLE ROCK -- Welcome to the William J. Clinton Presidential Center. Your personal tour guide: President Bill Clinton.

"There were lots of times when Republicans thought I was right about an issue but they were determined not to let anything happen," Clinton says in a new audio tour of his presidential library. "I know that when I got elected president, a lot of those folks just went into denial."

The library, along the Arkansas River in downtown Little Rock, will begin offering the audio tour Saturday. The tour was Clinton's idea and is the first narrated by a former president for a presidential library, said Jordan Johnson, spokesman for the William J. Clinton Foundation.

Visitors pay an extra $3 for a device shaped like an oversize cordless phone. For each exhibit, Clinton recounts his thoughts on and memories of the topic.

He describes the impeachment hearings, for example, as an ideological battle that went overboard.

"So when I won, it was a profound sort of psychological shock to a lot of them," he says of his opponents, with a chuckle. "Then they went into overdrive fighting me. They weren't accomplishing anything, just banging away. Then they did what people who care too much about power do: They overdid it."

Clinton's commentary also addresses his childhood as well as issues such as crime, foreign affairs and the economy. He speaks of hosting state dinners for foreign leaders and his wife's role as first lady.

He describes choosing a running mate as one of the most important decisions for a presidential hopeful. He says he chose Al Gore because the Tennessee Democrat complemented him and provided a more moderate perspective.

Although Clinton says the Oval Office was "the best place in the world to work," he had another favorite spot in the White House: his private office. "I restored it to look the way it did after the Civil War, and I brought in a desk, which was Ulysses Grant's Cabinet table," Clinton says.

DOJ_NMG_0031967

"And I would go in there, often after Hillary went to bed, or late at night, play my music, and that's where I did my reading and thinking and that's where my daughter would find me late at night when she called me from Stanford. I had a lot of happy times there."

Johnson said Clinton spent hours walking through the library while aides followed with a tape recorder. He recorded his thoughts in a handful of visits.

"Hopefully, visitors will go away with an experience that sheds some light on the personal experience of being president," Johnson said.

Kansas Political Shifts Sign Of Things To Come? (USAT)

By DeWayne Wickham

USA Today, June 6, 2006

Mark Parkinson thinks it's time Thomas Frank wrote a sequel to his 2004 best seller, What's the Matter with Kansas?, which explains how the descendants of abolitionists, free-soilers and trustbusters became the backbone of the conservative movement in U.S. politics.

Frank made his home state the focus of his contention that cultural issues have been used by conservatives to get Midwesterners (and other Americans) to vote against their economic and political interests. But Parkinson says a lot has changed in the Sunflower State and Frank's new book should be called "What's Right with Kansas."

He ought to know. A Republican for 30 years, Parkinson is a former GOP state party chairman. In that job, he spearheaded the unsuccessful effort to derail the 2002 gubernatorial campaign of moderate Democrat Kathleen Sebelius. Sebelius made funding for public education — not hot-button social issues — a major plank in her campaign. She won with 53% of the vote in a state where Democrats are just 28% of registered voters.

Last week, Sebelius named Parkinson her running mate in this year's gubernatorial campaign. He replaces John Moore, the current lieutenant governor, who decided not to seek re-election. Like Moore, Parkinson is a Republican-turned-Democrat.

No joking matter

When Moore bolted the GOP four years ago to become Sebelius' running mate, Parkinson called his selection a "gimmick." Now he says what the Democratic Party has to offer is no joke.

Republicans have branded Parkinson a traitor, but he told me he didn't break with the GOP, it broke with him. It became more interested in cultural warfare than improving schools, economic development "for everyone" and the idea that government should not be involved in people's personal lives.

"What's happened in Kansas, and what's attracted me and excited me about serving on this ticket is that the person that's captured (the political middle) of Kansas is Gov. Sebelius," Parkinson said.

And that's got to worry Republicans all over this country. Just as Kansas was once a bellwether state for the ascendancy of Republican power, what's happening there now may be evidence of its decline.

Party hopping

Johnson County prosecutor Paul Morrison also became a Democrat and is now challenging Phill Kline, Kansas' GOP attorney general.

When key members of the dominant political party jump ship, there's good reason to believe the ship has sprung a serious leak — in Kansas and elsewhere.

In Virginia, one-time Republican and former Reagan administration Navy secretary Jim Webb is seeking the Democratic Senate nomination. He says he split with the GOP after deciding Democrats care more about working-class people.

In February, South Carolina prosecutor Barney Giese, a moderate Republican, joined the Democrats. His defection was the result of frayed relations with conservatives.

In states such as New York, Pennsylvania, Connecticut and New Hampshire, moderate Republicans are struggling to hold onto elected offices at a time when the party's conservative leaders have been hurt by self-inflicted wounds.

President Bush's approval rating now hovers around 33%. Dogged by high-profile scandals and the dissatisfaction of moderate Republicans, conservative leaders are now scrambling to avoid losing control of Congress in November.

"Kansas is ready to lead us singing into the apocalypse," Frank wrote in his 2004 book. "It invites us all to join in, to lay down our lives so that others might cash out at the top; to renounce forever our middle-American prosperity in pursuit of a crimson fantasy of middle-American righteousness."

That Kansas doesn't exist anymore, Parkinson said.

While it's too soon to say whether he is right, Sebelius' election and Parkinson's defection suggest that it may well be time for Frank to consider penning another book about the effects that politics in Kansas have on this nation.

In Echo Of A Murder, Two $1 Million Gifts Stir School Protests (WSJ)

By Paul Davies

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

The headmaster of Archmere Academy in Wilmington, Del., called his teachers together last year for a surprise champagne reception.

A former student had pledged $1 million for a new student center at the Roman Catholic high school. But not everybody shared The Rev. John Zagarella's enthusiasm. Some looked stunned, two people who were there say. Two people walked out after learning the identity of the donor: a wealthy property developer who played a pivotal role in one of the state's most infamous murder trials.

Almost exactly a decade ago, Louis Capano Jr. helped his older brother cover up a murder -- a case that riveted Delaware for years. Now his philanthropy -- two $1 million donations to put his family's name on buildings at elite Catholic schools he attended -- is triggering a debate over whether charity can help earn forgiveness.

The murder generated two books and a television movie. Thomas Capano, a Wilmington attorney who had been a state prosecutor and a governor's counsel, had an extramarital affair with Anne Marie Fahey, scheduling secretary for then-Gov. Tom Carper. After she tried to end it, Thomas Capano shot and killed her in his home on June 27, 1996.

A state-court jury convicted him three years later, after authorities unraveled a coverup engineered with two brothers. Gerard Capano helped Thomas Capano dump the body in the ocean. Louis Capano disposed of a bloody sofa, tampered with a witness and lied to a grand jury. Threatened with prison, both pleaded guilty to crimes, testified against their brother and were put on probation. Thomas Capano initially was sentenced to death but appealed and got life in prison without parole.

The family has had its share of brushes with the law. Louis Capano Jr., head of a property-development company founded by his father, also named Louis, bribed a county councilman in 1989 to get a favorable rezoning ruling. He escaped prosecution by cooperating in a federal sting to catch the official.

Another brother, Joseph, was charged with rape in 1991 and pleaded guilty to charges of misdemeanor assault, unlawful sexual contact and criminal mischief.

A fund-raiser at Archmere says Louis Capano, 54 years old, said he wanted to make amends for his family's past. The donation was to be in the name of his parents: Louis Capano Sr., who died in 1980, and 82-year-old Marguerite Capano.

"I have got to make an attempt to show the younger kids there's a better way to go," Mr. Capano said, according to John E. Healy III, a construction-company chief who is helping spearhead Archmere's fund-raising campaign. "He's making an effort to walk to the light," Mr. Healy says.

Mr. Capano didn't respond to interview requests. In a statement issued through his attorney, Mr. Capano says the schools approached him as part of a fund-raising campaign, and that he appreciated the education he received and wanted to honor his parents. He says he is sorry for the suffering his brother Thomas caused, and that his donation is an attempt "to do something positive for the community."

When the fund-raising committee at Mr. Capano's old elementary school, St. Edmond's Academy, informed its board of directors of his $1 million donation for a new gymnasium in March 2005, several members expressed dismay.

One of St. Edmond's directors was Louis Freeh, who headed the Federal Bureau of Investigation during the Clinton administration and assigned agents to investigate the Fahey murder.

DOJ_NMG_0031969

"This is a school for boys, and what message do we send to them when we take $1 million and put his name on the building?" Mr. Freeh asked at a board meeting last spring, according to someone who attended the meeting.

St. Edmond's headmaster Michael Marinelli responded that the building would bear the parents' name, not Mr. Capano's. Another member argued that good Catholics believe in forgiveness.

"I am a good Catholic, but there is a difference between forgiveness and honoring someone," Mr. Freeh shot back, according to a person who attended the meeting.

Mr. Marinelli says he doesn't recall the specifics of the conversation.

Delaware U.S. Attorney Colm F. Connolly also urged representatives of the schools not to name buildings for the Capanos. Mr. Connolly led the prosecution of Thomas Capano and became a close Fahey family friend. He is also an Archmere alumnus, and briefed St. Edmond's board of directors on the Capano brothers' legal troubles.

"The schools are naming the buildings after a family that has not one, not two, not even three, but four criminals," says Mr. Connolly.

St. Edmond's approached Mr. Capano to see if he would consider naming the building after a religious figure, people familiar with the matter say. Mr. Capano rejected the idea, and suggested doubling Archmere's donation instead, Archmere's Mr. Healy recalls.

After learning that Archmere might get all the money, St. Edmond's board reversed course. The majority of its 18 directors felt the decision followed the Church's teaching of "fairness and forgiveness," says Mr. Marinelli, St. Edmond's headmaster. "At what point do you continue to punish and at what point do you begin to heal?" he asks.

St. Edmond's board member Brian Gimlett, head of the U.S. Secret Service's New York office before moving to Delaware, quit in protest. "My action speaks for itself," he says.

Mr. Freeh, his board term at St. Edmond's expiring, declined another term. "I love the schools; they just got this one wrong," says Mr. Freeh, who has children at both schools.

Archmere's board also voted to accept Mr. Capano's donation. Construction begins this month. "We're a family here," says Thomas Mallon, Archmere's public-relations director. "We embrace everyone. Not everyone is perfect. We accepted this as a heartfelt gift."

The school had originally planned to name the building for another well-known alumnus, Democratic Senator Joseph Biden, who co-chairs the school's fund-raising committee. Bishop Michael Saltarelli of Wilmington, however, invoked a Church directive that opposes honoring politicians who support abortion rights.

A Biden spokeswoman says the episode "hasn't diminished his affection for the school," and that "he continues to work on the capital campaign knowing that the building will be named after the Capano family."

As word of Mr. Capano's donations spread, some parents spoke up, including Marybeth Phillips, who has one son who graduated from Archmere and another going into his senior year there.

"This is immoral and dead wrong," Ms. Phillips recalls telling Father Zagarella, the Archmere headmaster, last year as she waited at an airport for one of her sons to fly to Rome for a school trip. "You're selling out Christ for a lousy million bucks."

"That's a lot of money -- I wish parents like you would give me $1 million," the headmaster replied before walking off, according to Ms. Phillips. She says he apologized minutes later. Mr. Mallon says Father Zagarella recalls the conversation but not his exact words. Father Zagarella declined to comment.

The late Ms. Fahey's family also is upset. "We have to live with the hurt every day," says Debbie Gioffre, mother of Ms. Fahey's nephew Brian, 14, a St. Edmond's eighth grader who plans to attend Archmere next year. "It's not fair to have to live with other reminders."

Ms. Fahey's sister, Kathleen Fahey-Hosey, says "it was like a kick in the stomach" when she heard about Mr. Capano's donation. Her children are on another school's basketball team that competes against St. Edmond's.

"My kids play basketball there, and if they are going to put that name on the gym, I don't want to go in there," she says.

Apparent Victory By Islamists In Somalia Poses Questions For U.S. (KRT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

DOJ_NMG_0031970

Knight Ridder, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - Muslim militias claimed Monday to have routed warlords allegedly backed by the United States after weeks of fighting for control of the Somali capital, Mogadishu, dealing a setback to U.S. efforts to contain the spread of militant Islam.

U.S. officials and other experts warned that if the militias consolidated their victory they would establish an Islamist state where al-Qaida could secure bases from which it could spread its violent ideology to other East African and Horn of Africa nations.

The Islamists' claim of victory in Mogadishu comes as the United States and its allies struggle to contain growing Islamic violence in Iraq and some of the fiercest attacks in Afghanistan by the Taliban since that Islamic militia was driven from power in 2001.

Al-Qaida-inspired extremists might be allowed to use Somalia as a refuge from which to support and mount operations against Yemen and Saudi Arabia, the world's No. 1 oil producer, located a boat ride away across the Red Sea, said U.S. officials and other experts.

Somalia "can be a platform for further action," warned Bruno Schiemsky, the chairman of a group of experts appointed by the U.N. Security Council to monitor Somalia, in a telephone interview from Nairobi, Kenya.

With Mogadishu under their control, the Islamist militias are expected to quickly move on other cities, he said.

"If they can grab control and maintain it, Somalia becomes a little place that becomes important to al-Qaida and other Islamists," agreed Michael Scheuer, who was the first chief of the CIA unit that tracks Osama bin Laden and his network.

John Prendergast of the International Crisis Group, a conflict prevention organization, said it's too early to predict what could happen. The secular warlords could rebuild their forces with outside aid and launch a counteroffensive for Mogadishu.

Territory has frequently traded hands since central government rule collapsed in 1991, plunging Somalia into anarchy and civil strife that has claimed tens of thousands of lives.

But a U.S. counterterrorism official, who requested anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue, said that the Islamic militias' apparent seizure of Mogadishu is "certainly not a positive development in terms of (U.S.) efforts to fight terrorism. It's worrisome."

U.S. officials said the Islamists are already hosting the al-Qaida planner of the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania and two organizers of a failed 2002 attempt to down an Israeli passenger jet in Kenya with a missile.

The Somali Islamists also have received training from militants from Pakistan, Indonesia and Arab countries, including Syria and Algeria, said Schiemsky.

The United States hasn't been directly involved in Somalia since 18 U.S. troops were killed in Mogadishu in 1993 during vicious street fighting depicted in the film "Black Hawk Down."

But the Bush administration has deployed about 1,500 U.S. troops in the tiny nation of Djibouti, on Somalia's northern border, as part of a regional strategy of preventing al-Qaida and other radical Islamic groups from operating in the rugged, poverty-stricken and largely lawless Horn of Africa.

The United States has been secretly supporting a coalition of secular Somali warlords, the Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counter-Terrorism, according to leaders of a largely powerless transitional central government restricted to the city of Baidoa, according to regional observers and news reports.

Prendergast said that three alliance leaders recently told him that they were receiving funds from the CIA.

"Our assessment is between $100,000 and $150,000 per month," said Prendergast, who served on the National Security Council staff in the Clinton administration.

The CIA declined to comment.

Other countries, including Italy, Ethiopia, Eritrea and Saudi Arabia, also have been backing various Somali factions, according to a May 4 report to the U.N. Security Council by the experts group led by Schiemsky.

The bloodiest fighting in more than a decade erupted in February between the alliance and the Islamic militias. The militias are associated with Islamic courts that have succeeded in the past several years in bringing order to some areas by enforcing Islamic law.

DOJ_NMG_0031971

The violence escalated last month as the Islamic militias moved to take control of Mogadishu, with hundreds of people dying in fierce street battles.

Princeton Lyman, a former senior State Department official, likened the emergence of the Islamic militias to the Taliban's takeover of Afghanistan during the mid-`90s. The Taliban gave refuge to bin Laden and his followers.

In both cases, he said, the Islamists won support from ordinary people weary of years of violence, corrupt warlords and the absence of a functioning government.

"For the United States, this is a serious problem," said Lyman, a former ambassador to South Africa and Nigeria who's with the Council on Foreign Relations, a foreign policy organization.

He said the Bush administration should begin working urgently with regional governments and Somaliland, an unrecognized self-declared independent nation in northern Somalia, to contain Somalia's Islamic militias.

Somali Islamists Declare Victory; Warlords On Run (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya, June 5 — After months of fierce fighting, Islamic militias declared Monday that they had taken control of Somalia's capital, Mogadishu, defeating the warlords widely believed to be backed by the United States and raising questions about whether the country would head down an extremist path.

The battle for Mogadishu has been a proxy war, of sorts, in the Bush administration's campaign against terrorism, with the warlords echoing Washington's goal of rooting out radical Islam and the presence of Al Qaeda in the region.

But as the warlords who have ruled over Mogadishu for the last 15 years went on the run on Monday, it appeared that Washington had backed the losing side, presenting the administration with a major setback at a time of continued sectarian violence in Iraq and the resurgence of the Taliban in Afghanistan.

One of the warlords, Muse Sudi Yalahow, was holed up in a hospital north of the city on Monday, surrounded by his enemies. Others fled the capital after their forces had been pushed from the strategic center, diplomats and local journalists said.

The heavily armed militias driving them back are allied with the Islamic courts that have grown in influence throughout Somalia in recent years, filling a void left by the lack of a central government since 1991. The courts are made up of a loose coalition of religious leaders who have put forward Islam, the predominant religion in Somalia, as the way out of the country's long decline into anarchy.

On Monday, at least, the capital appeared to be calm, after hundreds of civilian deaths there in recent months.

"The people of Mogadishu have finally gotten some peace today," Ali Mohammed, 32, a schoolteacher, said in a telephone interview from the capital on Monday night. "We've had war for so long, and we're tired of it."

But he also said he and others feared that the Islamic courts might clamp down and impose a stricter form of Islam on residents. "We don't know what's next," he said.

The United States has been widely reported to have secretly financed the capital's warlords, who fashioned themselves into a counterterrorism alliance to track down and apprehend Al Qaeda elements in Mogadishu.

American officials have said they fear that the country may descend into a situation similar to that of Afghanistan, where a hard-line Islamist group, the Taliban, seized control of the country and then gave safe haven to Al Qaeda. Already American officials have said that a handful of foreign fighters with links to Al Qaeda are being shielded by Mogadishu's Islamist leaders.

The spokesman for the State Department, Sean McCormack, appeared to repeat those concerns at a news briefing on Monday when asked about the takeover in Mogadishu. "We don't want to see Somalia turn into a safe haven for foreign terrorists," he said. "We do have very real concerns about that."

But some analysts were not surprised that the battle for Mogadishu turned out as it did. "The so-called Islamists provided a sense of stability in Somalia, education and other social services, while the warlords maimed and killed innocent civilians," said Ted Dagne, the Africa analyst at the Congressional Research Service in Washington.

He expressed doubt that the takeover indicated the rise of extremists in the capital. "Somalis are secular Muslims, and the presence of the so-called Islamists is not an introduction of new ideology or religion," Mr. Dagne said in an e-mail message.

Administration officials have not said whether American intelligence agents have made payments to the warlords, though academics, security analysts, politicians in the region and other Africa experts assert that they have. Many in Mogadishu said the common belief that the United States was taking sides only strengthened the Islamists, who accused the warlords of being puppets of Washington.

According to one Somalia expert, the amount of payments to the warlords has increased significantly in the past year. "By our own estimates, the payments have been between $100,000 and $150,000 per month," said John Prendergast, who monitors Somalia for the International Crisis Group, a nonprofit research organization.

Initial statements from the Islamists emphasized a need for dialogue instead of warfare. Since February more than 300 people have been killed and more than 1,700 injured in what was called the fiercest fighting Mogadishu had seen in the 15 years since Somalia's central government collapsed.

"We want to restore peace and stability to Mogadishu," Sheik Sharif Ahmed, chairman of the alliance of Islamists, known as the Islamic Courts Union, said Monday on a radio broadcast, according to The Associated Press. "We are ready to meet and talk to anybody and any group for the interest of the people."

Still, he made clear the religious nature of the rule to come. "We won the fight against the enemy of Islam," he said.

Backing the Islamists have been business leaders eager to end the arbitrary rule of the warlords, as well as freelance gunmen willing to work for anyone who pays them a salary and supplies them with a daily fix of khat, the leaf that is widely chewed among Somalis for its stimulant effect.

Now that the Islamists have taken over, it remains to be seen how they will choose to govern and whether infighting among them may send the city back into the chaos it has long known.

"We have to appeal to the moderates in this Islamist movement," said Mario Raffaelli, the Italian special envoy for Somalia. "We have to make clear that we are supporting the government."

The outcome in Mogadishu has occurred as a transitional government created after two years of peace talks struggles to establish a toehold in the country. Based in Baidoa, 155 miles from Mogadishu, because it lacked the strength to take on the warring gunmen based in the capital, the government finds itself negotiating with a new center of power.

In a late-night cabinet meeting on Sunday, as the victory by the Islamic courts became clear, the government decided to open talks with the new rulers of Mogadishu. It also fired the four Mogadishu warlords who held cabinet positions in the transitional government but had flouted calls by their colleagues to stop the fighting.

The four men are Mohamed Qanyare Afrah, who was national security minister; Muse Sudi Yalahow, commerce minister; Botan Isse Alin, demobilization minister; and Omar Mohamed Mohamud, religious affairs minister.

The Islamist militias had been slowly gaining control over the capital for weeks. On Sunday they took over the strategic town of Balad, 20 miles north of Mogadishu, in fighting that killed 18 people. That cut off the warlords' northern supply route. Then on Monday the Islamic fighters took Davniile, the stronghold of Mr. Qanyare, a major warlord who left the area two days ago after elders in his clan criticized the heavy civilian casualties that fighting by his men had caused.

Somalia has been without a central government since the country slipped into civil war more than a decade ago. An American-led relief effort in 1993, which metamorphosed into a hunt for one of the warlords whose fighting with one another interfered with food distribution, ended tragically after 18 American soldiers were killed in a battle made famous by the film "Black Hawk Down."

The United States has largely kept the country at diplomatic arm's length ever since, viewing with skepticism the 14 failed rounds of peace negotiations over the years. The latest one produced an interim government carefully balanced by clan representation, which has been urging Washington to back it more vigorously.

U.S. Has Somalia Terrorism Concerns As Islamists Take Mogadishu (BLOOM)

By Paul Tighe

Bloomberg, June 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0031973

June 6 (Bloomberg) -- The U.S. government said it is concerned that Somalia will become a haven for terrorists after an Islamist militia said its forces seized control of the capital, Mogadishu, after weeks of fighting.

``We don't want to see Somalia turned into a safe haven for foreign terrorists," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said in Washington yesterday, according to a transcript. ``We do have very real concerns about that."

The Joint Islamic Courts said militiamen from an alliance of warlords were driven from the capital, Agence France-Presse reported yesterday, citing a statement broadcast by local radio stations from Sheikh Sharif Sheikh Ahmed, the group's chairman. The militia declared Islamic or Sharia law in areas of Mogadishu it controls.

Somalia, an East African country slightly smaller than the U.S. state of Texas and with a population of almost 9 million, has been divided by factional fighting since the regime of President Siad Barre was ousted in 1991. The U.S. hasn't confirmed reports that it supports the warlords' Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counter-Terrorism, which has accused the Islamists of sheltering al-Qaeda members.

The U.S. wants to see Somalia build government institutions and end the factional fighting, McCormack said. Such institutions need to be responsive to the Somali people and become ``democratic institutions that respect the rights of all individuals there," he said.

Warlord Control

Ahmed, in his statement, said 15 years of warlord control of Mogadishu is over, AFP reported. More than 300 people were killed in fighting in the past month in the city that had an estimated population of 1.2 million people in 2000.

``The JIC will take care of the safety of the people and freedom of individuals and will eradicate any sort of hostilities brought about by inter-clan fighting," Ahmed said.

Many of the warlords left the city after Islamist fighters took control of a main supply route north of the capital at the weekend, AFP reported.

The fighting in Mogadishu is fueled by arms, military material and financial support that ``flow like a river" to militia groups, the United Nations monitoring group said in a report to the Security Council last month.

Forces of Somalia's Transitional Federal Government, the Mogadishu-based opposition alliance, the Islamist militia, the business elite and feuding clans are among the groups fighting in the city, the monitors said.

Somalia's transitional government is working with the UN and the African Union to try to establish a plan for national security, Francois Lonseny Fall, the UN special representative for Somalia, said last month. For the first time in 15 years, Somalia's parliament has been meeting in Baidoa, about 240 kilometers (149 miles) to the west of Mogadishu.

UN Appeal

UN Secretary General Kofi Annan yesterday appealed to all groups to stop fighting and begin talks, the UN said on its Web site. Thousands of people have been displaced from their homes in Mogadishu, the UN said.

An estimated 1.4 million people in Somalia are in ``urgent" need of aid, including about 400,000 displaced people in 34 sites across the nation, the UN said June 2. The world body is seeking $326 million from international donors this year to support aid projects in the country in the Horn of Africa.

Islamic Militia Seizes Somalia's Capital (AP)

By Mohamed Olad Hassan

AP, June 5, 2006

An Islamic militia with alleged links to al-Qaida seized Somalia's capital Monday after weeks of fighting with U.S.-backed secular warlords, raising fears that the nation could fall under the sway of Osama bin Laden's terrorist organization.

The advance unified the city for the first time in more than a decade and after 15 years of anarchy in this Horn of Africa nation. But it also posed a direct challenge to a fledging U.N.-backed Somali government.

"We won the fight against the enemy of Islam. Mogadishu is under control of its people," Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, chairman of the Islamic Courts Union, said in a radio broadcast. The militia, which has formed an alliance that transcends clan, controls a 65-mile radius around the capital after fighting off a secular alliance of warlords.

DOJ_NMG_0031974

The Islamic militia is gaining ground just as the U.N.-backed interim government struggles to assert control outside its base in Baidoa, 155 miles from Mogadishu. The prices of weapons soared there Monday as fears grew that the militia could head to Baidoa next.

The militia is the first group to consolidate control over all of Mogadishu's neighborhoods since the last government collapsed in 1991 and warlords took over, dividing this impoverished country of 8 million people into a patchwork of rival fiefdoms.

Omar Jamal, director of the Somali Justice Advocacy Center in St. Paul, Minn., said the Islamic militia's victory in Mogadishu was a turning point in the country's history.

"It is exactly the same thing that happened with the rise to power of the Taliban" in Afghanistan, he said, adding that the extremists are "using the people's weariness of violence, rape and civil war" to gain support for a government based on Islamic law.

The battle between the militia and the secular alliance has been intensifying in recent months, with more than 300 people killed and 1,700 wounded — many of them civilians caught in the crossfire of grenades, machine guns and mortars.

Alliance leaders could not be reached for comment Monday and had likely fled Mogadishu. One of them, warlord Mohamed Dheere, was believed to be in neighboring Ethiopia seeking reinforcements.

The United States is backing the secular alliance in an attempt to root out any al-Qaida members operating in the Horn of Africa. U.S. officials, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue, have confirmed cooperating with the warlords. Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed, president of Somalia's transitional national government, has said Washington is funding the alliance.

The Bush administration has not confirmed or denied backing the alliance, saying only that they support those who fight terror.

On Monday, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said he could not offer any details about Monday's advance by the militia.

"We do have real concerns about the presence of foreign terrorists in Somalia, and that informs an important aspect of our policy with regard to Somalia," he said.

The United States has not carried out any direct action in Somalia since the deaths of 18 servicemen in a 1993 battle depicted in the film "Black Hawk Down."

The U.S. officials said recently that Islamic leaders in Mogadishu are sheltering three al-Qaida leaders indicted in the deadly 1998 U.S. Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania. The same al-Qaida cell is believed responsible for the 2002 suicide bombing of an Israeli-owned hotel in Kenya that killed 15 people and a simultaneous attempt to shoot down an Israeli airliner over Kenya.

The Islamic militants and their secular rivals began competing for influence in earnest after a U.N.-backed interim government slowly began to gain international recognition. The government, weak and wracked by infighting, has not even been able to enter the capital because of the violence.

Interim Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi recently fired four ministers who were part of the secular alliance, leaving the alliance without any support in the government.

Mogadishu residents expressed relief at Monday's relative peace, but had mixed responses to the Islamic militia's advance.

"The victory of Islamic courts is a major step toward a lasting peaceful settlement in Mogadishu," said Somali economist Abdinasir Ahmed. "We are tired of the deception and rhetoric of the warlords."

Abdulqaadir Bashir, a computer engineer, disagreed. "The Islamic clerics want to be like Taliban regime in Afghanistan," he said. "People have no hope at all."

Jamal said it will take time for the militants to consolidate their power in Mogadishu, and that the struggle to control the country will not end there. He called on the international community to do everything possible to support the U.N.-backed government to keep the Islamic radicals from expanding their power base any farther.

"This war will not stop in Mogadishu," Jamal said.

Islamic Militias Claim Seizure Of Mogadishu (FT)

By Andrew England And Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, June 6, 2006

Islamic militias claimed on Monday to have seized control of the Somali capital, Mogadishu, after months of fighting against an alliance of warlords alleged to have been backed by the US as proxies in the war on terror.

Several hundred people are reported to have been killed in recent months in the worst violence in Mogadishu for a decade.

The capture of Somalia's war-ravaged capital, if enduring, would mark another US policy failure in the Horn of Africa nation, which has been without an effective government for 15 years and is cited by the Bush administration as a potential haven for terrorists.

The Union of Islamic Courts proclaimed their victory on local radio stations. Their chairman, Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, urged residents to accept the new leadership and said they were ready for dialogue with any group. Local journalists said the city was in Islamic hands after 15 years under warlord control, and that some had fled.

Visiting the White House, the head of the African Union, President Denis Sassou-Nguesso of the Republic of Congo, discussed the crisis with President George W. Bush and Condoleezza Rice, secretary of state.

Mr Sassou-Nguesso indirectly expressed concerns over US policy, telling reporters that more should be done to support the transitional government that emerged from a peace process in Kenya in 2004 but has not been able to establish its authority. "All these different groups and warlords are not the answer," he said.

Sean McCormack, the US State Department spokesman, said he could not confirm that Mogadishu had fallen to the Islamic militias. "We do have real concerns about the presence of foreign terrorists in Somalia and that informs an important aspect of our policy with regard to Somalia," he said.

The US, which does not deny allegations that it has funded the alliance of warlords, alleges that a small number of suspected al-Qaeda members, including some suspected of having taken part in attacks in Kenya in 1998 and 2002, have used Somalia as a hideout and transit centre.

Most Somalis follow a moderate form of Islam, and Islamic courts, which the militias are loyal to, have operated for years, providing services the state would normally provide.

However, analysts say a number of courts have become dominated by extremists. The US suspects that some have sheltered foreign terror suspects. Allegations that the US backed the unpopular warlords increased local support for the Islamic militias.

The transitional government sits in Baidoa, a central town, plagued by divisions and with little power.

Islamist Militias Declare Victory In Somali Capital (USAT)

By Rob Crilly

USA Today, June 6, 2006

NAIROBI, Kenya — Islamist militias that the United States suspects have links to terrorists claimed victory Monday in Mogadishu after months of fighting with Somalia's secular warlords.

More than 350 people have been killed in clashes this year between militias that want to establish an Islamic state based on sharia law and a coalition of warlords who receive U.S. financial support, according to a human rights group and a member of the transitional government.

In a statement read over local radio stations, the chairman of the city's Joint Islamic Courts, Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, declared victory and urged residents to accept the new leadership. "The Joint Islamic Courts are not interested in a continuation of hostilities and will fully implement peace and security," he said.

Mogadishu has been the scene of intense fighting this year — its worst since a United Nations peacekeeping mission that included U.S. forces withdrew in 1995. Two years earlier, 18 U.S. soldiers died trying to detain a warlord. The incident was recounted in the book and movie Black Hawk Down. The country has been without a functioning government since 1991.

Fighting intensified in February with the formation of the secular Alliance for the Restoration of Peace and Counter-Terrorism. Suleiman Baldo, Africa program director of the International Crisis Group, says his organization has evidence from warlords that they received cash from U.S. agents. Ahmed Mohamen Suleiman, a member of Somalia's transitional government in Baidoa, says he believes U.S. support for the warlords "is tipping the balance to the (Islamist) militias."

After meeting at the White House on Monday with President Bush, African Union chief and Congo Republic President Denis Sassou-Nguesso asked the United States to help end the crisis in Somalia but urged Washington not to give aid to warlords.

The State Department has declined to comment on whether warlords have received U.S. support. Spokesman Sean McCormack said only that the United States was working with individuals and the transitional government to oppose terrorists. A recent department report said al-Qaeda members responsible for the bombings of U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998 "continue to operate in Somalia."

In a letter published last week in Kenya's Daily Nation newspaper, U.S. Ambassador to Kenya William Bellamy said, "The U.S. has encouraged a variety of groups in Somalia … to oppose the al-Qaeda presence in Somalia and reject the Somali militants who shelter and protect these terrorists."

In a telephone interview shortly before he fled Mogadishu, warlord Mohamed Qanyare Afrah denied receiving U.S. funding. He said his fighters were the only way to stop Islamic fundamentalists from spreading their influence.

Omar Jamal, director of the Somali Justice Advocacy Center in St. Paul, called the Islamist militias' victory a turning point. "It is exactly the same thing that happened with the rise to power of the Taliban," he said. The extremists are "using the people's weariness of violence, rape and civil war" to gain support for a government based on Islamic law.

Mohamed Abdi Hayir, information minister in the transitional government, said Monday that ministers agreed to offer Cabinet seats to the sharia court leaders if they would agree to peace. "We have some extremist elements in this country, but there are also many more moderate Islamists," he said. "We hope that we can work with the moderates."

Militia Seizes Somali Capital (WP)

By Mohamed Olad Hassan

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

MOGADISHU, Somalia, June 5 -- An Islamic militia with alleged links to al-Qaeda seized the Somali capital Monday after weeks of fighting with secular warlords covertly backed by the United States. The victory raised concerns that Osama bin Laden's terrorist organization could gain new influence in the impoverished Horn of Africa country.

The militia's advance unified battle-scarred Mogadishu for the first time in 15 years of anarchy that followed the collapse of national government.

"We won the fight against the enemy of Islam. Mogadishu is under control of its people," Sharif Ahmed, chairman of the Islamic Courts Union, said in a radio broadcast. The militia, whose membership transcends the clan lines that traditionally dominate Somali politics, appears to control a 65-mile radius around the capital.

The group has gained ground as a U.N.-backed interim government struggles to assert control outside its base in Baidoa, 155 miles from Mogadishu. The price of weapons soared there as fears grew that the militia could try to capture Baidoa next.

This country of about 8 million people has been divided into a patchwork of rival fiefdoms since 1991, when clan-based warlords drove President Mohamed Siad Barre from power and promptly began fighting one another. U.S. troops landed in 1992 to help ensure delivery of food aid. They withdrew after 18 troops were killed in a Mogadishu gun battle depicted in the book and film "Black Hawk Down."

Omar Jamal, director of the Somali Justice Advocacy Center in St. Paul, Minn., called the Islamic militia's victory in Mogadishu a turning point in the country's history. "It is exactly the same thing that happened with the rise to power of the Taliban" in Afghanistan in the 1990s, he said, adding that the extremists are "using the people's weariness of violence, rape and civil war" to gain support for a government based on Islamic law.

When in power in Afghanistan, the Taliban allowed al-Qaeda to operate training camps.

[Bush administration officials say they believe that several al-Qaeda associates, including Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, who has been tagged as an organizer of the 1998 bombing of the U.S. Embassy in Nairobi and a 2002 suicide bombing at an Israeli-owned hotel in Mombasa, Kenya, have found refuge in Somalia, Washington Post staff writer Karen DeYoung reported from Washington.

[But officials are uncertain of the relationship between what they describe as an East African terrorist cell directed by Mohammed and the Islamic fighters now in control of Mogadishu. "It's worrisome and a matter of concern, no doubt about it," one counterterrorism official said of events in the Somali capital, speaking on condition of anonymity. "But it's too early to tell" their importance.

["In terms of the terrorist angle, there has been concern about Somalia all along, well before today's developments," a senior administration official said. Recalling Osama bin Laden's establishment of al-Qaeda headquarters in Afghanistan after the Taliban takeover there, the militia taking power in Somalia "certainly doesn't make anyone feel any better about that situation," the official said.]

The battle between the militia and the secular alliance has been intensifying in recent months. More than 300 people have been killed in fighting, many of them civilians caught in the crossfire of grenades, machine guns and mortars. About 1,700 people have been wounded.

Islamic Militia Storms Capital (WT/AP)

MOGADISHU, Somalia -- An Islamic militia said to have links to al Qaeda seized Somalia's capital yesterday after weeks of fighting with U.S.-backed secular warlords, raising fears that the nation could fall under the sway of Osama bin Laden's terrorist organization.

Congo President Assails US Backing For Somali Warlords (AFP)

AFP, June 6, 2006

Congo's president and current African Union head Denis Sassou Nguesso hit out at US support for Somali warlords and expressed hope Washington would work to establish a government in Mogadishu.

"We think, and what we told president (George W.) Bush, that most important is to establish a government that must help the Somali people to have a real government," Sassou Nguesso told journalists after meeting Bush and US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

"We think that if this effort is needed, we have to move in this direction, in order that the Somali government can truly be established in Mogadishu," he said, referring to the exiled government in Kenya.

"The presence of various groups, the warlords, is not a permanent solution."

Washington has given financial support to Somalian warlords in their fight against militias controlled by Islamist judges, who are strongly suspected by Western intelligence services of protecting suspected terrorists linked to Al-Qaeda's network.

On Monday the Joint Islamic Courts claimed victory in the four-month battle to seize control of Mogadishu from warlords who ruled the city for 15 years.

U.S. Is Offering Deals On Trade To Entice Iran (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 5 — The European Union's foreign policy director, Javier Solana, arrived in Tehran on Monday night with incentives intended to resolve the nuclear crisis with Iran, including a proposal to allow Iran to upgrade its aging civilian air fleet through the purchase of aircraft parts from an American company, Boeing.

The package, to be presented Tuesday to Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki and to Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, is to include waiving trade sanctions against Iran to allow the purchase of American agricultural technology, said European diplomats and a senior Bush administration official.

The five permanent members of the Security Council — Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States — plus Germany, agreed on the package last week in Vienna, but declined to make the proposal public.

Officials first wanted to present the package to Iranian authorities. But with Mr. Solana's arrival in Tehran, several European and American diplomats described parts of the proposal, speaking anonymously because they were not authorized to comment publicly.

The offer includes a commitment from the six nations to support Iran's plan for a nuclear energy program for civilian use, including building light-water reactors through joint projects with other countries, the diplomats said.

The United States and Europe also agreed to back Iran's membership in the World Trade Organization.

The package is aimed at encouraging Iran to return to a freeze of its nuclear activities, including turning off the fast-spinning centrifuges that enrich uranium.

The most compelling item, though, may be the American offer to end its nearly three-decade policy against direct talks with Iran and to join in the negotiations over Iran's nuclear program.

That proposal is the centerpiece of the administration's recent shift in strategy toward Iran, which President Bush views as the No. 1 state sponsor of terrorism.

The decision to include the sale of Boeing aircraft parts, along with aircraft and parts from Airbus, is a huge step, particularly for the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0031979

Since the 1979 revolution, Iran has been subject to American sanctions that hinder the purchase of spare parts for nearly all the planes in its air force, the civilian carrier Iran Air and domestic airlines. The sanctions cover not only American-made airplanes and parts, but also European planes like Airbus, when they use parts made in the United States.

Because Iran can shop only for used Airbus or Boeing planes, its civilian fleet is notorious for the age of planes and parts. Iranian officials regularly blame the sanctions for plane crashes.

The offers that Mr. Solana is to make are contingent on an agreement by Iran to suspend its enrichment-related and reprocessing activities, which the United States contends are a cover for developing nuclear arms.

If Iran does not agree to suspend those activities, the package includes possible "disincentives," as Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has described them in the past.

They include a travel ban against Iran's ruling religious leaders and government officials involved in the nuclear program, and a freeze of Iranian financial assets abroad.

The package does not include any specific threat of military action should Iran refuse to suspend its uranium activities. If Iran rejects the offer, differences are likely to re-emerge among the six nations as they consider more specific punishments.

It was unclear whether the package includes a guarantee that the United States will not attack Iran if it agrees to suspend uranium enrichment.

An earlier version of the proposal contained three sentences to that effect, but they were a matter of intense debate in Vienna, and the diplomats would not say whether the wording remained in the final package. The United States has resisted giving those guarantees, while France and Russia have pushed for them.

A resolution is currently before the Security Council under Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter, which invokes the Council's power to demand compliance of member countries and threaten punishment if they refuse.

But the emphasis of the package brought to Tehran by Mr. Solana is less on how to punish Iran than on how to reward it for agreeing to freeze its enrichment-related activities.

Before traveling to Tehran, Mr. Solana stopped in Israel, where he discussed the package with Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. Western diplomats say Israel backs the package.

"The proposal we bring along, the one that we carry, we think that will allow us to get engaged in that negotiation, based on trust and respect and confidence," Mr. Solana said at the airport in Tehran.

Shortly after his arrival, Mr. Mottaki, the foreign minister, told reporters, "If their aim is not politicizing the issue, and if they consider our demand, we can reach a logical agreement with them."

Iran has said it considers its nuclear program, which it insists is for peaceful purposes, a national right.

Hopeful US Urges Patience On Iran (AFP)

AFP, June 6, 2006

The White House pleaded for patience with overtures to Iran, saying "there is hope" that Tehran will accept an internationally brokered compromise on its nuclear programs.

"I would counsel patience," spokesman Tony Snow told reporters. "At this point, as we've said all along, let's give it time. Let's let the Iranians take a look at what the offers are, at the incentives and disincentives."

The United States charges that Iran is using its nuclear program to hide a quest for atomic weapons. Tehran denies the accusation.

Snow said that the package crafted by the United States, Russia, China, Britain, France and Germany has yet to be formally presented to Tehran, and he again discounted early Iranian rejections of a call to freeze sensitive nuclear activities.

With European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana due to present the offer in Tehran, Snow said "there's neither optimism nor pessimism; there is hope" that Iranian leaders will accept.

"The condition for getting to the negotiating table is to suspend enrichment-related and reprocessing activities. That's the first step. Should that happen, then the whole series of other things can take place," he said.

"What's going to happen is that the Iranians are going to have to determine for themselves how seriously they want to take the proposition from the EU-3 (Britain, France and Germany) and the United States," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0031980

"And I think that sometimes goes through several iterations before we get a final answer. So we're not quite ready to give the final answer," said Snow.

A Legal Case Against Iran (WP)

By David B. Rivkin Jr. And Lee A. Casey

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

Speaking last October at a Tehran conference on "The World Without Zionism," Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, referred to Israel as a "disgraceful blot" and called for it to be "wiped off the map." This was not an isolated or idle threat. In the same speech, he defended Iran's determination to press ahead with its nuclear program -- which would give it the practical ability to achieve this result.

Although Ahmadinejad's bellicose statements were condemned by the United States and a number of its European allies, the condemnation was not followed up by a concerted diplomatic and legal effort in the U.N. Security Council. It ought to be, especially given the uncertain prospects of the council's current consideration of Iran's nuclear activities, further complicated by the just-announced offer of direct negotiations between Tehran and Washington.

There is a good legal basis for such action. Ahmadinejad's words clearly violate Article 2.4 of the U.N. Charter. This provision, to which Iran has agreed, requires all U.N. member states to "refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state." Ahmadinejad's specific formulation -- wiping Israel off the map and prophesying a coming nuclear conflagration in which much of humanity would expire -- also clearly entails a threat of committing genocide, which member nations are obliged, under the Genocide Convention, to prevent.

Both the nature and context of Ahmadinejad's manifesto set it apart from such harsh but legally permissible rhetoric as President Bush's talk of an "axis of evil" or President Ronald Reagan's reference to the Soviet Union as an "evil empire." Such statements do not threaten the existence of a sovereign member of the international community. Likewise, expressing a view that a particular undemocratic regime or an otherwise odious government would not survive the rising anger of its people, or will fall prey to certain forces of history, does not amount to a legally proscribed challenge.

But Ahmadinejad's rant features a direct and unequivocal threat, and it gives Israel a valid casus belli -- under both Article 51 (self-defense) of the U.N. Charter and customary international law -- to use preemptive force as a means of ensuring that Iran cannot make good on its stated intentions.

Indeed, the International Court of Justice, in a 1996 opinion analyzing the legality of the threat or use of nuclear weapons, found that use-of-force threats that violated Article 2.4 and were not otherwise justified under Article 51 also posed a threat to international peace and security, thereby further infringing the U.N. Charter. Since Israel has not committed aggression against Iran, Ahmadinejad's statements cannot be justified as self-defense. They have, in fact, created a legally cognizable threat that can, and should, be addressed by the Security Council under its Chapter VII powers, which are concerned with threats to peace.

So far U.S.-led efforts to have the Security Council directly condemn and impose sanctions on Iran under Chapter VII for its nuclear ambitions have not succeeded. That's why seeking the council's intervention on Iran's illegal threats to use force makes excellent diplomatic sense. Such an approach would provide multiple and reinforcing benefits.

First, it would broaden the international dialogue beyond Tehran's breach of nonproliferation obligations, focusing on the real underlying problem: the bellicose nature of the Iranian regime and the use it might make of nuclear weapons. And since Tehran's violations of the U.N. Charter are, by their nature, issues that can be handled only by the Security Council, bringing them to the council would counter Iran's efforts to displace the U.N. framework in favor of direct negotiations with the European Union and the United States. Indeed, a serious debate on Ahmadinejad's illegal threat would give the United States a unique opportunity to focus the Security Council on the shrill anti-Israeli rhetoric emanating not just from Iran but also from numerous other Islamic countries. This rhetoric fosters regional tensions and nurtures the dangerous "jihadist" sentiments.

Second, demands that Iran withdraw its threat and acknowledge its obligation to peacefully resolve any dispute it may have with Israel would be firmly grounded in international law -- so much so that Security Council members Russia and China would be hard-pressed to oppose the effort. Both of those countries have routinely cloaked their objections to E.U.-U.S. policy toward

Iran in the language of international law, arguing, for example, that Iran has a legal right to pursue civilian nuclear activities. No country, of course, is entitled to violate the U.N. Charter.

Not to put too fine a point on it, but this is how the U.N. system was, and is, supposed to work. When a clear threat to peace arises, it is incumbent upon the Security Council to act in defense of the threatened party to head off the unilateral use of force and to advance "collective security." This imperative is particularly compelling when the very legitimacy of the threatened party and its right to independent national existence have been challenged. Such a challenge goes beyond the violation of Article 2 .4 and raises the specter of the most heinous international crimes, including genocide.

If Iran genuinely desires the peaceful atom as an energy source, then it should have no problem retracting its threats against Israel and reaffirming its commitment to resolve any differences it may have with Jerusalem through peaceful means. If it refuses, it will provide compelling evidence that Iran's current government cannot be expected to act as a responsible member of the international community. Then the world can take stock of its true intentions and act accordingly.

Rumsfeld, Visiting Vietnam, Seals Accord To Deepen Military Cooperation (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

HANOI, Vietnam, June 5 — The United States and Vietnam agreed Monday to increase their military contacts and to discuss additional ways to broaden their defense cooperation, American officials said.

The understanding was sealed in talks between senior Vietnamese officials and Donald H. Rumsfeld, who was making his first visit to Vietnam as defense secretary.

The two nations, he declared Monday evening with evident satisfaction, had decided to step up "exchanges at all levels of the military."

Vietnam was an important stop on an Asian swing that has already taken Mr. Rumsfeld to a meeting of defense experts in Singapore. During the Singapore sessions, Mr. Rumsfeld denounced Iran as a "terrorist" nation, complained that Russia was bullying its neighbors and criticized China for being secretive about its level of military spending.

In contrast, here in Vietnam's capital he heaped praise on his hosts. He lauded Vietnam's economic development, which he inspected Sunday night with a walk through the city's streets.

"I was and remain struck by the economic success that you can see and the activity and the change in this city," said Mr. Rumsfeld, who noted that he had previously visited the country as a congressman and as a private citizen.

During a visit to the Temple of Literature, which was established in 1070 as Vietnam's first university, Mr. Rumsfeld enthusiastically struck a ritual gong. When the university was founded, Mr. Rumsfeld told Vietnam's defense minister, Pham Van Tra, American Indians were still living in "mud huts."

"That's impressive," Mr. Rumsfeld added.

The Vietnamese greeted their guest with a resplendent military honor guard, which played "The Star-Spangled Banner" before the talks began at the Defense Ministry.

The Vietnam War still casts a long shadow. There are 1,805 American troops unaccounted for from the war, including 1,376 in Vietnam, according to United States military officials. A small team is based in Vietnam to carry out the accounting and excavating in the search for the lost Americans, efforts that have been complicated by Vietnam's building boom and the dwindling ranks of witnesses from the war era. Vietnam has generally been cooperative, and Mr. Rumsfeld encouraged the government to provide additional support.

But it is China, a subject that Mr. Rumsfeld said went unmentioned Monday during his talks with Mr. Tra and Prime Minister Phan Van Khai, that has added impetus for the new courtship.

The Pentagon has been increasingly concerned over China's growing military strength. Vietnam has its own reasons for trying to establish more balance with its neighbor to the north.

DOJ_NMG_0031982

Still, the Vietnamese have moved deliberately. "They have China next door to them and they're careful to keep good relations with China and they want a balance in relations with us and relations with China," said a senior Pentagon official, who asked not to be identified because he was not authorized to comment publicly on the talks.

One step in the still evolving relationship is to be taken later this month when two Vietnamese officers are scheduled to begin English language classes at a military language school in San Antonio. The instruction, which was previously agreed upon, is being financed by the Pentagon's program for International Military Education and Training.

A likely next step is the expansion of that effort to include medical training for Vietnamese officers, a Pentagon official suggested.

American officials also said Monday that there had been discussion of expanded cooperation in clearing mines left over from the war. One American official said Vietnamese officials expressed interest in acquiring American mine-clearing equipment and military spare parts. A request for military equipment is likely to stir debate in Congress, where Vietnam's record on human rights has undergone close scrutiny.

During his discussions with Mr. Tra, Mr. Rumsfeld suggested that Vietnam might play a role in international peacekeeping. But Mr. Tra noted that the Vietnamese military could not take part in any operation that was not specifically approved by the United Nations, according to an American official who said he did not want to be identified because he was explaining what had occurred in private talks.

Access to Vietnamese ports and bases for American military forces was not on the agenda, Mr. Rumsfeld indicated before his visit.

Mr. Rumsfeld was not the first American defense secretary to visit Vietnam since the end of the Vietnam War — William S. Cohen, President Bill Clinton's defense secretary, made the trip, as did Mr. Clinton.

Mr. Khai visited the United States last June, the first such visit since the end of the Vietnam War. Vietnam, which signed an important trade agreement with the United States in 2000, has been pushing for membership in the World Trade Organization. President Bush is expected to visit Vietnam when it will be the host of an Asian economic summit meeting in November.

Still, the visit of the hard-line Mr. Rumsfeld was noteworthy, as was his enthusiasm. He noted that during the prime minister's meeting last year with President Bush, the two leaders talked about their desire to raise the relationship between the countries to a new level.

"And certainly that has happened," Mr. Rumsfeld said.

Rumsfeld Presses Vietnam On Finding MIAs (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, June 5, 2006

The U.S. is pressing Vietnam for underwater searches and access to aging witnesses in stepped-up efforts to recover remains of Americans missing from the Vietnam War, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Monday.

"We still have work to do," Rumsfeld said, though he added that he was pleased Vietnamese military officials had pledged in meetings with him to do more to help recover the remains. "As we all agree, we don't want to forget the importance of this."

Rumsfeld told reporters U.S. officials will work to see if the U.S. can provide technical assistance with underwater recovery efforts.

There are 1,805 American troops unaccounted for from the war, including 1,376 in Vietnam, according to Marine Maj. Jay Rutter, deputy commander of the Joint POW/MIA Accounting Command, which heads the recovery efforts here.

Of those still missing, 453 were lost at sea or over water, according to the Pentagon data.

For Angela Cooke, whose father was missing in Vietnam for 34 years, the MIA recovery work is personal. Just six weeks ago, U.S. military officials in Hanoi notified family members that the remains of Staff Sgt. Calvin Cooke — whose C-130 Hercules cargo plane was shot down over An Loc City in what was then South Vietnam — had been identified.

Later this month, Cooke will finally bury her father at Arlington Cemetery, with full military honors.

DOJ_NMG_0031983

"This means a whole lot to all of us — finally being able to say goodbye," Angela Cooke said in a recent phone call from her home in Everett, Wash. And she said the Pentagon's efforts to recover the soldiers' remains in Vietnam must continue. "It's important that they still do this."

Cooke will travel with the remains from the POW/MIA office in Hawaii to Arlington Cemetery, where they will bury her father by her mother's grave.

"It feels so good to finally have closure," Cooke said.

With increased Vietnamese help, more families may get that closure.

According to Rutter, the Vietnamese have agreed to allow U.S. teams to conduct longer searches — for 45 days rather than the previous 33.

U.S. officials are hoping to get access to restricted sites, as well as more archives. He said the U.S. is also hoping to gain broader access to the western highlands, where a large number of losses took place.

"It's getting harder," he said, in part because villagers who were witnesses to many of the crashes during the war are getting older. "The age of the witnesses is a huge issue."

The U.S. also wants greater access to information about MIAs lost in Laos and Cambodia.

Critics of the current Iraq war and Rumsfeld's leadership have likened it to the Vietnam War, noting that in both, public support eroded as time went on with little to show for the loss of American lives.

Despite their bitter history, relations between the U.S. and Vietnam have steadily improved. The U.S. has become Vietnam's top trading partner since the two established diplomatic ties a decade ago, with two-way trade worth $6.4 billion last year.

"I think that it is, it ought not to be surprising, it seems to me, that the United States is developing a very good relationship with Vietnam, just as it ought not to have been surprising that we did so with countries that were engaged on the other side in previous conflicts, whether World War II or Korea," Rumsfeld said.

Rumsfeld, making his first trip to Vietnam as defense secretary, told Vietnamese defense minister Gen. Pham Van Tra that he took a walk around Hanoi and could "feel the energy, the vibrancy of the city."

In another sign of changing times, Rumsfeld stayed only a few blocks away from what was called the Hanoi Hilton, where U.S. prisoners of war, including Sen. John McCain (news, bio, voting record), R-Ariz., were held.

"A Pacific Nation" (WSJ)

By Donald H. Rumsfeld

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

The historic shifts taking place in Asia-Pacific security cooperation were highlighted at the "Shangri La Dialogue" in Singapore last week -- a gathering of senior defense representatives from more than 20 Asia-Pacific nations, including the United States, to discuss security issues of mutual concern. The meeting was an important reminder of just how far many nations of this region have come in building new relationships and arrangements to address the challenges that have emerged since the end of the Cold War.

These security concerns range from violent extremism to piracy, narcotics and infectious diseases, in addition to traditional geopolitical challenges such as the situation on the Korean Peninsula and the Taiwan Strait. In such an environment, cooperation among free nations is not simply desirable, but critical. And that has led to major changes -- both in America's approach to long-standing allies, and in the emergence of new U.S. partnerships in Asia that involve multiple nations working together on shared security concerns.

In the past five years, the U.S. has done more things, in terms of defense and security cooperation in Asia, with more nations, and in more constructive ways, than at any other time in its history. Relationships which, in some cases, stretch as far back as World War II have been updated and modernized to meet the new challenges of the 21st century. For example, we are working with the Philippines -- one of America's oldest allies -- to transform its armed forces. We have cultivated security relationships -- with Mongolia, Vietnam, India, and Indonesia -- that barely existed a few years ago, but are growing in importance today. And we have welcomed the emergence of Japan, South Korea and Australia -- longstanding treaty allies -- as important players in global, as well as regional, security.

There is another historic and welcome shift taking place in the Pacific region. For much of my adult life, security arrangements and stability in the Pacific were rooted in a network of bilateral defense relationships between the U.S. and its allies and partners. This contrasted with the situation in Europe, where the U.S. participates in a relatively large, formal alliance -- the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Now, we see an expanding network of security cooperation in this region, both bilaterally between nations and multilaterally among nations -- often with the U.S. as a partner.

The U.S. and Thailand, for instance, were able to respond quickly and work together seamlessly after the catastrophic tsunami that killed tens of thousands in December 2004 because the two countries have shared several decades of joint military training and collaboration. These programs include the annual Cobra Gold exercises, which have been expanded in recent years to include Singaporean, Indonesian and Japanese forces. The exercises now have a new focus on peacekeeping and humanitarian disaster response -- a focus validated by recent events such as Indonesia's latest earthquake.

We also see this kind of cooperation at work in the Straits of Malacca, where Singapore, Malaysia, Thailand and Indonesia are coordinating patrols to combat the ancient scourge of piracy on the high seas. Since this effort began two years ago, there has been a decrease in reported criminal incidents in the area.

Multilateral institutions and activities, such as last week's meeting in Singapore -- organized by the International Institute for Strategic Studies, as well as the Association of Southeast Asian Nations' Regional Forum and the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation -- are leading the way. These institutions are not military alliances or signatories to treaties such as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or the World Trade Organization, carrying with them binding commitments. Uniquely, they provide arenas for dialogue where diverse nations with shared interests can engage each other in different and flexible ways, and fashion constructive approaches to common problems.

With regard to the small minority of violent extremists in the region, America's friends and partners face a set of challenges and choices: whether to openly combat the messages of hate, intolerance, and incitement -- that can, in some cases, gain traction -- or to try to placate and accommodate those whose vision of the future deems that it is acceptable, even desirable, to kill innocent men, women and children to promote their goals.

In addition to the choices made by other countries, there are choices to be made by America. From time to time, in past decades and even today, some Americans have questioned whether the U.S. should be actively engaged in the world.

But the U.S. is -- and always will be -- a Pacific nation. The American people have expended no shortage of blood and treasure in this region over the past century. And the U.S. must, and we will, stay engaged here to address a range of traditional, as well as unconventional, security concerns. By continuing to work together in constructive ways -- while respectful of different perspectives and different interests -- we can ensure that in this uncertain new century, this hemisphere will be freer, more peaceful and more prosperous for our citizens, as well as for the citizens of Asia.

Mr. Rumsfeld is the U.S. secretary of defense.

Bush, President Of Congo Discuss Darfur (AP)

AP, June 5, 2006

President Bush said Monday that it's important for United Nations forces to take over peacekeeping as soon as possible in the Darfur region of Sudan where nearly 200,000 people have died in a three-year conflict.

Bush met at the White House with Denis Sassou-Nguesso, president of the Republic of Congo and head of the 53-nation African Union, to discuss Darfur, AIDS and other issues.

"We talked about our common commitment to help end the genocide in Darfur," Bush said in the Oval Office. "I appreciate the president's leadership in helping negotiate a peace agreement, and I appreciate his leadership in working with the United Nations so we can get the AU forces blue-helmeted as quickly as possible."

DOJ_NMG_0031985

The African Union has a 7,300-member peacekeeping force in Darfur and is mediating the conflict. The AU troops are getting support from NATO and the European Union and are due to hand this responsibility over to a United Nations force in September.

This is the second time that Sassou-Nguesso was at the White House. He met with former President George H.W. Bush in 1990.

The African leader said the two talked about terrorism, Iran's nuclear ambitions, African development issues, the situation in the Gulf of Guinea, the Congo Basin and the New Partnership for African Development, known as NEPAD.

The concept of NEPAD is that in return for African efforts to fight corruption and modernize their economies, the international community agrees to forgive debts and expand trade opportunities and aid for projects developed by Africans for Africans. Critics of NEPAD say the ideas are not new and that passing out cash is not the answer.

"I was happy to see President Bush give his entire support to the development of Africa," Sassou-Nguesso said. "We discussed a lot of issues that we're all interested in: Peace, security, and not just in Africa, but beyond Africa, in the world."

Bush Hears Concerns From Honduran Leader (AP)

By Nedra Pickler

AP, June 5, 2006

President Bush heard concerns about immigration reform from south-of-the-border ally Honduras on Monday and offered assurances that he was committed to a bill that treats foreigners with respect while upholding U.S. laws.

Bush met in the Oval Office with Honduran President Manuel Zelaya, who took office in January with promises to create jobs in the Central American nation that has been mired in poverty and unemployment. Zelaya has backed the Central American Free Trade Agreement that eliminates trade barriers with the United States but has provoked protests throughout the region.

Bush said he and Zelaya discussed ways to expand commercial opportunities between their nations and to make sure democracies in Latin America are strong. He said they also talked about the immigration bill being negotiated on Capitol Hill.

"I assured him that my administration supports a comprehensive immigration bill that treats people with respect, and at the same time upholds our laws," Bush said. "And over lunch, I will give him our strategy to continue to press for a comprehensive bill that will enforce our borders but allow people to come to our country in a legal way to work on a temporary basis."

Zelaya, speaking through a translator to reporters brought in at the end of the meeting, thanked Bush for "the frankness with which he has spoken about the solutions to the common problems we face in the Western Hemisphere."

Abbas To Call National Referendum On Israel (USAT)

USA Today, June 6, 2006

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas said Monday that attempts to get the Hamas-led government to implicitly recognize Israel have failed to produce agreement and that he will call a national referendum on the issue. “President Abbas will set a date for the referendum after the meeting Tuesday of the PLO Executive Committee and parliamentary caucuses,” his office said in a statement.

The move sets Abbas on a collision course with Hamas. Hamas' hard-line stance has landed it in a violent power struggle with Abbas and his Fatah Party, and its refusal to recognize Israel has led Western countries to impose crippling economic sanctions. But passing the referendum could give Abbas an important boost in the standoff. “It would bolster his legitimacy and give him power to go ahead with negotiations with Israel,” said Azam al-Ahmad, a top Fatah official.

Alan Garcia capped a remarkable comeback in Peru's runoff election, beating a fiery nationalist to regain control 16 years after his first presidential term ended in economic ruin and rebel violence. U.S. Deputy Secretary of State Robert Zoellick hailed Garcia's win: “His own policy statements as he ran for office suggested that he learned from some of the mistakes of the '80s.”

Garcia, 57, said voters sent a clear message to Venezuela's leftist president Hugo Chvez: Stay out of Peru. Chvez had endorsed Ollanta Humala, a former army officer. “It's a huge slap in the face for Chvez,” political analyst Hugo Neira said.

Garcia led 53.1% to 46.9% with 93% of the vote counted, Peru's electoral authority said Monday.

Argentina's government expressed concern for the first time in years about discontent in the ranks of the military, which ruled the country in a bloody dictatorship from 1976 to 1983. Alberto Fernandez, the Cabinet chief, said the presence of six officers at an event in May to honor people killed by rebels in the early 1970s "is serious enough to warrant attention." The killings were used to justify a 1976 coup.

Up to 30,000 people were killed by the dictatorship, according to human rights groups.

The first African country led by a democratically elected woman began recruiting women into its new postwar army. Liberia's army will initially number 2,000 troops, and roughly 400 of them will be women, said Edith Bawn, spokeswoman for the government body responsible for overseeing its creation. "Women bring a special sensitiveness to the military," she said. "And they're very good at support roles."

Abbas To Call Referendum On Israel (AP)

By Mohammed Daraghmeh

AP, June 5, 2006

Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas said Monday he will call a referendum on a plan implicitly recognizing Israel after he failed to persuade Hamas to agree to the idea.

The Islamic militant Hamas, which heads the Palestinian government, strongly opposes a referendum.

"President Abbas will set a date for the referendum after the meeting Tuesday of the PLO Executive Committee and parliamentary caucuses," his office said in a statement.

Abbas had set a midnight deadline for agreement. But a participant in late-night talks with Palestinian factions said the president determined they had failed an hour before that.

The Hamas-led government is facing international isolation over its refusal to renounce violence and recognize Israel. The United States, European Union and Israel have cut off cash transfers to the Palestinian government since Hamas won legislative elections earlier this year.

Its hardline stance has landed it in an increasingly violent power struggle with Abbas and his Fatah party, the other main Palestinian faction. Since Hamas was sworn into office in March, Abbas has taken steps to curb its authorities.

The plan under discussion was formulated by Hamas and Fatah prisoners held in Israeli jails. But Hamas' exiled leaders, who make final decisions on policy, have refused to accept the proposal.

Hamas has been calling for more time to discuss the proposal and suggested changes in the language. But Abbas, who has avoided confrontation since taking office early last year, rejected Hamas' demands on Monday.

"If anyone wants to amend this document, then we will not reach any results," Abbas told reporters after meeting with European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana.

Abbas has endorsed the plan as a way to end the crushing sanctions against the Palestinians and allow him to resume peace talks with Israel.

Hamas reacted angrily to Abbas' threats Monday.

Hamas spokesman Sami Abu Zuhri insisted that the talks must continue.

"You cannot raise the sword of ultimatum, you cannot raise the issue of a referendum while you are talking about dialogue," he told reporters in Gaza. He said calling a referendum meant circumventing the elected government, led by Hamas.

Many Palestinians are uneasy about the referendum, though polls show the document would be approved easily.

In Gaza, Mohammed Abu Seido, 30, a coffee shop cashier, said he would vote for the document, but he worried that Hamas would react with violence if it is approved.

"Hamas is already failing," he said.

The Palestinians have never held a referendum before, and officials said the vote would not be binding. But passing the referendum could give Abbas an important boost in his standoff with Hamas.

"It would bolster his legitimacy and give him power to go ahead with negotiations with Israel," said Azam al-Ahmad, a top Fatah official. Al-Ahmad also said Abbas, who wields considerable powers, would consider calling elections for president and parliament if Hamas did not abide by the results of a referendum.

Hamas says that accepting the plan would mean abandoning its principles. It also says a referendum is not necessary because Palestinian voters chose its political program in legislative elections just over four months ago.

DOJ_NMG_0031987

The Palestinian infighting has turned deadly in recent weeks. Sixteen people have died in clashes between Hamas and Fatah loyalists, including five killed on Sunday. Five Palestinians were wounded in two clashes in the southern city of Khan Younis on Monday, security officials said.

Hamas has stuck to its tough line on Israel despite the crushing international boycott, which has left the government unable to pay the salaries of tens of thousands of civil servants for three months.

Hamas officials promised over the weekend to begin paying overdue salaries. But on Monday, the government failed to meet its pledge, causing widespread confusion in the Palestinian areas and prompting angry workers to storm one Gaza City bank.

Some banks advanced money to unpaid civil servants to help calm the situation. In some cases, people received money. In others, the promised payments failed to materialize. And tens of thousands of workers remained without paychecks, with the government as far away as ever from ending the boycott.

"These are people who don't have money to buy milk," said policeman Raed Abu Ghoneima, one of the protesters who stormed a Gaza City branch of the Arab Bank. "It has nothing to do with politics; it's about wages."

Also Monday, Israeli aircraft fired missiles at a car in the Jebaliya refugee camp next to Gaza city, the military said, killing two militants and wounding two bystanders, according to Palestinian hospital officials.

Israel said the main target, a militant from the renegade Popular Resistance committees, was involved in firing rockets at Israel. He died of his wounds.

Abbas Will Call For Palestinian Vote On Two-State Plan (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger And Greg Myre

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

JERUSALEM, Tuesday, June 6 — The Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, intends to call a referendum on a proposal developed by prisoners for a unified Palestinian political program that the governing Hamas faction opposes.

Talks on the proposal ended without agreement late Monday night, and early Tuesday morning Mr. Abbas's office said in a statement that he intended to live up to his ultimatum to Hamas, the militant Islamic faction that heads the government, and announce a referendum later on Tuesday after meeting with the executive committee of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

"In light of recent contacts, President Abbas will decide the date of the referendum after a meeting of the P.L.O. executive committee," the statement said.

The referendum is expected to be called for July and will be seen as a vote of confidence in Hamas, which won legislative elections in late January but has been isolated internationally and financially because of its refusal to recognize the right of Israel to exist, to forswear violence and to accept previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements.

The vote, if it takes place, will be a kind of showdown between Hamas and Mr. Abbas, who has insisted from the beginning of Hamas's rule that it accept the idea of a negotiated two-state solution, with an independent Palestine living in peace alongside Israel.

There is no precedent for a referendum among the Palestinians, and it is not clear that Mr. Abbas has the power to call one. Nor is it clear what would happen if the Palestinian parliament, where Hamas holds a majority, votes against a referendum or decides on wording different from that which Mr. Abbas might favor.

Hamas has rejected portions of the prisoners' document, which implicitly recognizes Israel by calling for a Palestinian state within the boundaries that existed before the 1967 Middle East war.

Khalida Jarar, a delegate from the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, told reporters after factions held talks with Mr. Abbas in Ramallah late on Monday that Mr. Abbas felt he had no option but to call the referendum.

Ms. Jarar said Mr. Abbas also had a 70-minute phone conversation with Prime Minister Ismail Haniya, of Hamas, about the proposal, which she said also ended without agreement.

"The document has to be accepted as it is," Mr. Abbas said at a news conference in the West Bank city of Ramallah after talks with the European Union foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, on Monday. "If we begin to change it, we will never reach a result."

DOJ_NMG_0031988

Ghazi Hamad, a spokesman for the Hamas government, said Monday that Hamas opposed a referendum, but believed a compromise could be worked out.

"I think there is an opportunity for us to reach an understanding on the prisoners' document," Mr. Hamad told Israel radio. "But if we hold a referendum, there will be a lot of problems, I think."

Mr. Abbas said on May 25 that he would hold a referendum within two months if Hamas did not accept the prisoners' plan within 10 days, a period that ended Sunday.

The prisoners' plan is in line with positions held by Fatah, and recent opinion polls show that a large majority of Palestinians support it.

Hamas has never recognized Israel and does not accept its existence on any territory in the region, contending that all the land belongs to Muslims.

The prisoners' document calls for negotiations based on the United Nations resolutions and other international proposals that call for two states existing side by side.

The political confrontation comes as violence continued both among Palestinians and between Israel and the Palestinians.

Five Palestinians were killed in the Gaza Strip overnight Sunday in internal Palestinian clashes.

The dead included a member of Hamas's military wing, who was killed when a large bomb went off near his home in the Jabaliya refugee camp, outside Gaza City. In southern Gaza, a pregnant woman and her brother were shot dead, Palestinian security officials said.

A Palestinian described by witnesses as a militant was killed and four people were wounded in a missile strike on a car in northern Gaza on Monday. The Israeli Army confirmed that it had carried out the strike.

During the day, Hamas gunmen stormed into a Palestinian television broadcasting center and smashed computers and other equipment in the southern Gaza town of Khan Yunis, employees said. But Hamas officials denied the group was involved. The gunmen said Palestinian television supported Fatah at the expense of Hamas, the employees said. No injuries were reported.

Marwan Barghouti, a hugely popular Fatah leader, was the driving force behind the plan supported by Mr. Abbas, though prisoners from other groups, including Hamas, also signed it. Mr. Barghouti was convicted in 2004 of orchestrating the killings of five people, and is serving five life sentences in an Israeli prison.

Mr. Barghouti and other Palestinian prisoners are seen as heroes by many Palestinians, and their opinions carry substantial weight.

The plan contains a number of provisions that Israel adamantly opposes. It says Palestinian refugees dating from the 1948-49 Arab-Israeli war must be allowed to return to their homes in what is now Israel. The plan also calls for Palestinian "resistance" in areas occupied by Israel, which effectively means the West Bank.

But Israel in response continues to insist that the way forward is through the stalled internationally backed Middle East peace plan, known as the road map, which calls on the Palestinian leadership to dismantle armed factions.

In general, though, Israeli officials have sought to distance themselves from the Palestinian debate over the prisoners' plan.

"Any move that occurs in the Palestinian Authority will be evaluated carefully, but this is an internal Palestinian process and it's preferable for Israel not to interfere," said Israel's defense minister, Amir Peretz, said Monday.

In another development, some Palestinian Authority workers were able to withdraw salaries from their banks on Monday for the first time in three months. The government has not been able to meet its payroll since Western governments cut off aid when Hamas took over the government.

U.S. And S. Korea Launch Free Trade Talks (AP)

By Martin Crutsinger

AP, June 5, 2006

The United States and South Korea held their first round of talks Monday aimed at achieving a free trade agreement between the two nations before the end of the year.

DOJ_NMG_0031989

An agreement with South Korea, America's seventh-largest trading partner, would be the most economically significant such pact the United States has reached since it tore down barriers with Mexico and Canada more than a decade ago.

Assistant U.S. Trade Representative Wendy Cutler, who is heading the U.S. delegation, expressed optimism that the talks can be concluded before the end of the year even though the negotiators will have to deal with such tough issues as removing barriers to American farm products, pharmaceuticals and U.S. autos.

"I remain optimistic about our ability to conclude a high-quality, comprehensive agreement," Cutler told reporters during a conference call Monday. "The political will is clearly there on both sides."

Cutler praised Kim Jong-hoon, the head of the South Korean negotiating team, and said both countries had put in a great amount of preparatory work that should speed the effort.

But as the two sides began negotiations at the U.S. Trade Office near the White House the sounds of protesters could be plainly heard.

About 40 South Korean farmers and laborers and their American supporters have planned a weeklong series of demonstrations and rallies to coincide with the talks. South Korean rice farmers have engaged in a number of violent demonstrations in their own country to highlight their opposition.

For American consumers, a free trade agreement with South Korea would hold out the prospect of lower U.S. tariffs and thus cheaper prices on such South Korean products as cell phones and automobiles.

Highlighting the complexity of the discussions, the negotiating teams, which for the first round numbered between 100 and 150 experts, will split into subgroups covering 19 different areas.

After this week's opening round in Washington, the teams will resume work in Seoul the week of July 10 with plans to meet every six to eight weeks after that time until the end of the year.

The administration next week will launch separate free trade talks with Malaysia, all part of its push to raise America's profile in Southeast Asia as a counter to the growing economic power of China.

President Bush has aggressively pursued free trade agreements since taking office but most of them were designed to bolster foreign policy goals, such as promoting democracy in the Middle East, and had little economic impact.

But U.S. industry has been pushing for an agreement with South Korea, seeing it as a fast-growing market in Southeast Asia.

"We are bullish that a free trade agreement provides an opportunity for the two countries to forge an even closer economic relationship," said Myron Brilliant, vice president for Asian affairs at the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. "Our country will benefit from an agreement that ensures that Korea's markets are open."

Flouting Syria's Martial Law, Bold Students Advocate Democracy (CSM)

By James Brandon

The Christian Science Monitor, June 6, 2006

ALEPPO, SYRIA - Two years ago, Syrian student Muhammad Arab was imprisoned for calling for reform of his country's political system. Now released and back studying at the Faculty of Medicine in the University of Aleppo, he is determined to continue promoting democracy.

"Prison wasn't great, but living without freedom is worse," says Mr. Arab, a broad-shouldered young medical student.

Arab is one of a handful of students agitating for reform and struggling to build a pro-democracy student movement in Syria, where martial law imposed in 1963 forbids unofficial political gatherings or groups.

"The student movements are not very significant in terms of being able to change things now," says Joshua Landis, professor of Middle Eastern studies at the University of Oklahoma. "But here is the very genesis of a new Syrian effervescence. This is the start of a 10- to 15-year transformation of society."

While no organized student movement exists at present, one may be emerging. A small number of students are loosely linked but have no official names, leaders, or organization. They simply come together to organize political debates, spread democratic ideas, and take opinion polls.

DOJ_NMG_0031990

"We're talking about little groups of 10 or 15 students," says Dr. Landis, who spent 2005 in Damascus and is the author of the blog Syriacomment.com. "They just appeared in the past two years. Every now and again, the government tries to smash them. When there are demonstrations, the police beat them up and their leaders are sent to prison for lengthy terms.

"Most of the time this is enough to convince most students not to get involved in politics," adds Landis. "But there are always some who are prepared to carry on."

Arab is a case in point. At his university in Aleppo, Syria's second-largest city, he ran against a candidate from Syria's Baath Party in student elections in March 2004. When he won, the university suspended him and 80 other students.

Undeterred, he traveled to Damascus, five hours south, to join a protest against the university's decision. There he was arrested and put on trial in Syria's State Security Court. "I saw my lawyer for only a few minutes before the trial, so there was no chance to prepare a defense," he says.

Then the court, Syria's highest, sentenced Arab to three years imprisonment. He served only eight months, but was regularly beaten and threatened, he says.

"The government is more afraid of secular opposition groups than religious ones," points out Ayman Abdul-Nour, a prominent reformist member of the Baath Party in Damascus. "Because any time the government wants to get rid of the Islamists, it can just call them terrorists and bomb them. The government also knows that the US will not seek to replace the regime with Islamic people."

But students face pressure not only from the government and the university authorities but also from their friends and parents. "Becoming involved in politics, I was aware that I might cross some of the regime's 'red lines,' but I suppressed my fear," says Nasser Babinsy, a friend of Arab and a fellow activist. "And 43 years of dictatorship teaches you a lot of fear."

But analysts point out that activists hoping to spread democracy must not only overcome official harassment, they must work against an educational and social system designed to support the regime.

"Syrian society is fighting against so many layers of authoritarianism," says Landis. "Arab nationalism is like a religion in Syria; it's not something that you can debate."

In addition, President Bashar al-Assad's limited economic reforms have removed some of the pressure for political reform. "Eighty percent of Syrians don't care about political freedoms," says Sami Moubayed, a writer and independent political analyst in Damascus. "They want jobs and more money."

But others argue that even religiously observant and less-educated Syrians are starting to see democracy as the best option. "Our country is tired of totalitarianism," says Mohammad Deeb Khor, a member of the opposition Revolutionary Workers Party, which formerly followed communist-style ideology. "People are thirsty for basic freedoms. Democracy is not paradise but it is a stage from which to meet society's interests."

As democratic ideas spread, Syrian democrats are also discovering the power of nonviolent protest. "Earlier this [year], a group of people demonstrated in Damascus, calling for an end to the martial laws," says Najib Dadam from the opposition Socialist Arab Democratic Union Party.

The regime sent 2,000 security men to beat them up, he says. "These things will continue to happen, and we will continue to build support, until this becomes a massive public movement."

While a mass movement might be some time off, analysts say exposure to satellite TV and the Internet is alerting Syrians to the possibilities of democracy. "If Iraq had been a success, the domino effect would have toppled all the dictatorships in the region," says Dr. Moubayed. "But America has lit a real interest in democracy in this region; the dominos are starting to fall, but slowly."

Ford Foundation To Announce Africa Initiative (NYT)

By Celia W. Dugger

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

The Ford Foundation will announce today the creation of a new philanthropic venture, led by Africans and based in Dakar, Senegal. The project, Trust Africa, aims to strengthen an expanding network of nonprofit groups across the continent that seek to hold governments accountable, whether elected or dictatorships.

DOJ_NMG_0031991

Ford has committed $30 million to this new foundation. Half the money will finance a permanent endowment, and the other half will be used to provide grants to many groups over the next five years.

Trust Africa's executive director, Akwasi Aidoo, a Ghanaian who formerly headed Ford's offices in Senegal and Nigeria, said it would strive to build links among civil society groups that could tackle regional problems of violent conflict, economic development and social justice.

The new foundation will bolster such groups, often vocal critics of those in power, in a period when Africa has been becoming more democratic. At the same time, some elected leaders — Meles Zenawi of Ethiopia, for example — have become intolerant of dissent.

"Left to themselves, many of these countries fall back into old habits," Mr. Aidoo said in an interview. He added later, "The best antidote is to amplify the voices of those for peaceful change."

Thomas O. Melia, deputy director of Freedom House, a research group that monitors political liberty, said efforts like those of Trust Africa represent the next frontier in deepening democracy in Africa and elsewhere.

"What has been missing, even in places establishing electoral democracy, is independent voices — think tanks, nongovernmental organizations, university centers — able to monitor government performance," he said. "It is the next step."

Mr. Aidoo said credible local groups capable of attracting international attention are needed to check repression, corruption and other ills.

Groups in one country also should be connected to like-minded outfits in other countries.

If dissenters are intimidated in one place, those in neighboring nations can speak up.

In addition to providing grants, Trust Africa plans to hold a series of workshops in Africa in the coming year to bring together scholars, business people, artists, government officials and rights advocates.

Over the past five years, as this new, Africa-focused foundation was developed, it financed a variety of groups to test its approach. It provided small grants to dozens of groups to strengthen them institutionally. It also gave $200,000 to Urgent Action Fund, Africa, which supported women agitating for peace talks in Liberia, as well as an investigation into accusations that women were being detained at a prison in Cameroon without justification.

Trust Africa hopes to build a base of support that goes well beyond the Ford Foundation. It plans to raise donations from the African diaspora. Millions of African migrants live and work in Europe, the United States and Canada, sending home billions of dollars annually in remittances, Ford says.

The United States has sizable communities of African-born immigrants in New York, Washington, Boston, Houston, Chicago and Los Angeles.

"Typically, they're helping their families and hometowns, but they're interested in what's happening in the rest of the continent," Mr. Aidoo said. "They want an effective vehicle that's African." Asked how the new foundation would avoid being seen as an arm of the Ford Foundation, with its deep American roots, Mr. Aidoo and Ford's president, Susan V. Berresford, said in the interview that Trust Africa would be an independent foundation governed solely by Africans.

Mr. Aidoo said the new foundation would establish "the connections among actors who can carry the work forward on their own feet."

In Praise Of The Maligned Sweatshop (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

WINDHOEK, Namibia

Africa desperately needs Western help in the form of schools, clinics and sweatshops.

Oops, don't spill your coffee. We in the West mostly despise sweatshops as exploiters of the poor, while the poor themselves tend to see sweatshops as opportunities.

On a street here in the capital of Namibia, in the southwestern corner of Africa, I spoke to a group of young men who were trying to get hired as day laborers on construction sites.

"I come here every day," said Naftal Shaanika, a 20-year-old. "I actually find work only about once a week."

DOJ_NMG_0031992

Mr. Shaanika and the other young men noted that the construction jobs were dangerous and arduous, and that they would vastly prefer steady jobs in, yes, sweatshops. Sure, sweatshop work is tedious, grueling and sometimes dangerous. But over all, sewing clothes is considerably less dangerous or arduous — or sweaty — than most alternatives in poor countries.

Well-meaning American university students regularly campaign against sweatshops. But instead, anyone who cares about fighting poverty should campaign in favor of sweatshops, demanding that companies set up factories in Africa. If Africa could establish a clothing export industry, that would fight poverty far more effectively than any foreign aid program.

Namibia was supposed to be a pioneer in Africa's garment industry, for it is stable, pleasant and safe, and its government has tried hard to entice foreign investors. On the edge of Windhoek are a series of low factories set up to produce garments for the American marketplace.

The biggest is the Ramatex Textile Factory, a Malaysian investment that employs 6,000 people. But the owners say they are losing money and will pull out, and other factories have stopped operating as well.

In Windhoek's Chinatown, I met Sun Zhimei, a Chinese woman who operates a small factory employing Namibians. "I'd like to help this country, by boosting its garment industry," she said. But on the day I visited, her factory was deserted. "It's cheaper to import goods all the way from China than to make them here," she complained.

The problem is that it's still costly to manufacture in Africa. The headaches across much of the continent include red tape, corruption, political instability, unreliable electricity and ports, and an inexperienced labor force that leads to low productivity and quality. The anti-sweatshop movement isn't a prime obstacle, but it's one more reason not to manufacture in Africa.

Imagine that a Nike vice president proposed manufacturing cheap T-shirts in Ethiopia: "Look, boss, it would be tough to operate there, but a factory would be a godsend to one of the poorest countries in the world. And if we kept a tight eye on costs and paid 25 cents an hour, we might be able to make a go of it."

The boss would reply: "You're crazy! We'd be boycotted on every campus in the country."

So companies like Nike, itself once a target of sweatshop critics, tend not to have highly labor-intensive factories in the very poorest countries, but rather more capital-intensive factories (in which machines do more of the work) in better-off nations like Malaysia or Indonesia. And the real losers are the world's poorest people.

Some of those who campaign against sweatshops respond to my arguments by noting that they aren't against factories in Africa, but only demand a "living wage" in them. After all, if labor costs amount to only $1 per shirt, then doubling wages would barely make a difference in the final cost.

One problem — as the closure of the Namibian factories suggests — is that it already isn't profitable to pay respectable salaries, and so any pressure to raise them becomes one more reason to avoid Africa altogether. Moreover, when Western companies do pay above-market wages, in places like Cambodia, local managers extort huge bribes in exchange for jobs. So the workers themselves don't get the benefit.

One of the best U.S. initiatives in Africa has been the African Growth and Opportunity Act, which allows duty-free imports from Africa — and thus has stimulated manufacturing there. But last year, partly because of competition from China, textile and clothing imports under the initiative fell by 12 percent.

The Congo Republic's president, Denis Sassou-Nguesso, told me that he would love to have more factories. It's incredibly frustrating, he noted, to see African countries export cotton, timber and other raw materials but rarely have the chance to process them. The American initiative "is a step in the right direction," he said. "But it needs more of a push."

One push needs to come from African countries themselves: a crackdown on corruption and red tape. But another useful step would be for American students to stop trying to ban sweatshops, and instead campaign to bring them to the most desperately poor countries.

Chinese Official Sees Private Role On Environment (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

BEIJING, June 5 (AP) — China's pollution problems cost the country more than $200 billion a year, a top official said Monday, as he called for better legal protection for grass-roots groups so they could help clean up the environment.

DOJ_NMG_0031993

Zhu Guangyao, deputy chief of the State Environmental Protection Agency, said that the importance of private environmental groups in China had lagged behind their role in other countries, and that his agency wanted to play a more important role in developing "legislation to secure their interests and existence in China."

Despite the efforts of half a million environmental officials in his agency and other organizations, China's environmental picture is worsening and "allows for no optimism," Mr. Zhu said, as he released a report that described China's environmental situation as "grave."

"Water, land and soil pollution is serious," the report said. "The Chinese government will mobilize all forces available to solve the pollution problems that are causing serious harm to people's health."

Damage to China's environment is costing the government roughly 10 percent of the country's gross domestic product, the total value of the goods and services produced in the country. The gross domestic product for 2005 was $2.26 trillion. Mr. Zhu said some local officials were reluctant to help — and sometimes even worked against — the central government's environmental protection efforts.

After more than 25 years of breakneck growth, China is in the midst of an environmental crisis that has continued to worsen, as the local authorities have failed to enforce regulations meant to counter severe air and water pollution.

Environmental groups cautioned that the environmental agency did not have the power to create or pass such a law without the support of top leaders, which was far from certain.

"China has not had the political environment" for the private groups to work independently, said Zhu Chunqian, the head of conservation operations at World Wildlife Fund China.

Greenpeace's government and public affairs officer, Yu Jie, said outspoken environmental advocates had risked retaliation, adding that if a group "has legal status, then it can use legal weapons to protect itself."

Biotech Food Tears Rifts In Europe (NYT)

By Elisabeth Rosenthal

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

ATHENS — In this famously fractious country, there is one thing on which almost all Greeks agree: They do not want genetically modified crops grown, sold or eaten here.

"All political parties are opposed," said Theodore Koliopanos, a legislator and former deputy environment minister, "which is odd because we disagree on everything else."

Greece and a few other countries in the European Union that have banned genetically modified organisms are on the front lines of a war over the future of modified food in Europe, the only large swath of the world that does not already grow or buy the crops. Facing international pressure and a lawsuit brought by the United States, Canada and Argentina at the World Trade Organization, the union said this year that all member states must open their doors to genetically engineered crops and prepare practical and legal regulations to ensure safety for health and the environment.

But five countries have imposed eight different types of bans. Many others use their votes in Europe's Council of Ministers to block the crops from entering.

The battle does more than pit the World Trade Organization against the European Union. It also creates a divide across the Atlantic, between European allies on the one hand, and the United States and Canada, which produce the vast majority of such seeds and crops, on the other. The United States is not shy about enlisting its diplomats to push European countries to admit the modified crops, European politicians say.

But European consumers and farmers generally do not want them, leaving the European Union to try to steer a Solomonic course between conflicting interests. The basic problem is that Europeans, whose food culture has developed over centuries, balk at putting biotech crops in their fields or their mouths.

"We think we have a good policy but we have discovered extreme reluctance among consumers and many member states to move forward with G.M.O.'s, who again and again block the approvals," said Barbara Helferrich, a spokeswoman for the union's Environment Directorate.

Since the union is a common market, lawmakers in Brussels demand a unified solution. So a seed that is sold in Britain has to be sold in Poland and Greece as well. But critics say that countries should be permitted to decide if they will accept a risk, however small, noting, for example, that unpasteurized milk is legal in France but not in Britain.

But while there is little, if any, scientific evidence that genetically modified foods are harmful, in much of Europe they are so unpopular that mainstream supermarket giants like Migros will not stock them. In surveys, consumers say they are unconvinced that genetically modified crops are safe, particularly for the environment.

"The environment minister who gives in and allows G.M.O.'s into this country will never be minister again," said Nikos Lappas, head of Greece's largest farmers' union. "For farmers, forcing G.M.O.'s would be economic suicide, since our market doesn't want them."

But producers of genetically modified products (and the countries they represent) are aggressively pursuing their case at the W.T.O. and with individual governments, spurred by an untapped European market.

"The first visit any new minister in Greece gets is from the U.S. ambassador saying, 'You need to have G.M.O.'s,' " said Mr. Koliopanos. "The pressure is incredible."

Biotech companies like Monsanto and Syngenta insist that the crops should be immediately admitted to Europe, because genetically engineered foods have been consumed in much of the world for a decade without obvious ill effects. Their safety, said Christopher Horner, a Monsanto spokesman, has been "ratified by numerous credible regulatory and scientific authorities."

Simon Barber, of EuropaBio, an industry group in Brussels, said: "The E.U. has put systems in place to deal with G.M.O.'s, and now the market has to be allowed to operate. If member states are breaking E.U. law, we expect the commission to take action."

The office of the United States trade representative maintains that "the E.U. is imposing undue delays on biotech approvals, resulting in delays and preventing the marketing of many crops grown in the U.S." The United States grows 220 million acres of genetically modified crops — by far the world's leader — and almost none of it is sold to the European Union. From 1998 to 2004, the European Union imposed a de facto moratorium on farming of genetically modified crops while its officials studied the issue and mulled ways to keep biotech crops and other crops distinct.

Genetically engineered seeds and plants contain genes that were inserted in a laboratory that give them special advantages, like resisting common pests. But pollen from those crops can spread in the air from field to field, intermixing with pollen from conventional crops.

Once genetically modified crops enter a country's food production, it can be difficult and costly to keep the food chain free of them because there is mixing of plants from farms in milling and in production.

Greece and other European Union members say such issues make any cultivation of biotech plants impossible because they would quickly infiltrate both agriculture and the food supply. In much of Europe, where small farms are the norm, it is hard to create "buffer zones" between fields on adjacent farms.

"I would guess we may be able to keep them apart in U.K., but it would be difficult in Greece because of the issue of size," said Julian Kinderlerer of the Institute of Biotechnical Law and Ethics at the University of Sheffield in England.

Europe's agricultural insurers will not cover farmers for liability should their genetically modified crops contaminate adjacent fields.

"I started with an open mind on this but now I think the answers are clear," said Mr. Lappas, of the Greek farmers' union. "If our market doesn't buy it, and insurers won't insure us, how can we grow it?" Indeed, in many areas that have blocked genetically engineered crops, small farmers survive by producing niche food, like unique, high-quality vegetables and grain; there is a premium for food that is not genetically modified.

"This is a cutthroat global market, and if all we do is cultivate mass-produced G.M. corn, we're finished, since other nations will be able to provide that cheaper," Mr. Lappas said.

In Poland, 1.5 million farms are still mostly farmed without pesticides, giving that nation the opportunity to become an important producer of natural foods, according to the International Coalition to Protect the Polish Countryside, which has lobbied for a national ban.

DOJ_NMG_0031995

To the biotech industry and major producers, the issue is simple: genetically modified corn is just corn, genetically modified wheat is just wheat and there is no scientific reason to differentiate.

Industry groups argue that products should not even be labeled modified or free of modification because the labels are unfair trade barriers.

"Labeling has turned out to be a stigma because the public is so frightened, and retailers have become easy targets," said Mr. Barber, of EuropaBio. "Look at the Greenpeace Web site with its list of brands that use G.M.'s. We're O.K. with consumers making a choice, but we're leery because they're scared, and we're labeling identical products."

Genetically modified seeds are approved case by case, and once the European Commission has approved a seed for planting, the only legal reason that a country can enforce a ban is if "new scientific evidence" shows it would be harmful.

But recently, each time the commission has approved a new product, the Council of Ministers (representing the member states) has voted against it, creating an impasse.

In addition, some countries still say modified seeds are unsafe, invoking the so-called scientific exception.

"They haven't provided any new evidence," said Michael J. Phillips, a vice president of the Biotechnology Industry Organization in Washington.

The European Food Safety Authority of the European Union provides scientific judgments on matters like new evidence. The European Commission and the Council of Ministers have also referred their impasses to the safety agency.

But this agency's core mandate concerns food safety, and even the union's environment commissioner, Stavros Dimas, said recently that it had not looked adequately at the long-term effects of biotech crops on issues like biodiversity.

At a recent meeting with disgruntled member states in Brussels, Harry A. Kuiper, chairman of the agency's panel on genetically modified crops, defended its work, noting that its experts had just six months to review each submission.

The European Union still hopes to win over reluctant members, and so far has taken none to court. But environmental groups vow to resist any pressure from Brussels.

"The E.U. policy of just pushing forward with the technology is utter blindness," said Helen Holder, a spokeswoman for Friends of the Earth in Europe. "Genetic contamination is unavoidable and irreversible and will only increase over time."

Ahead Of World Cup, U.S. Warns Germany About Sex Trafficking (NYT)

By Helene Cooper

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 5 — On the eve of the World Cup in Germany, the State Department's big concern is not over whether the American soccer team has a prayer of getting past the Czech Republic and Italy, but rather over the flood of prostitutes expected into Germany from Eastern Europe, Asia and Africa.

The United States, in its annual report on forced labor and trafficking in persons, called Germany, which has legalized prostitution, "a source, transit and destination country" for sex workers, the more so during the soccer tournament.

"Due to the sheer size of the event, the potential for human trafficking surrounding the games remains a concern," the State Department said in its report. It called on the German government to increase police enforcement during the games.

The warning to Germany was a rare slap at a close American ally.

The report did not include Germany in a list of 14 more serious offenders that the State Department says make little effort to control serious problems with trafficking in persons.

Some groups criticized the report, noting that most of the countries cited as the worst offenders — which can lead to economic sanctions — are not American allies. They include Iran, North Korea, Myanmar, Sudan, Venezuela, Syria, Cuba and Zimbabwe. The only countries on the list that are close American allies are Saudi Arabia and Belize.

India, Mexico and China were on a separate "watch list" for the second year, prompting complaints that the State Department was trying not to alienate them.

"What we want is for the United States to implement this law without any political considerations at play," said Jessica Neuwirth, president of Equality Now, an international women's rights organization.

DOJ_NMG_0031996

In 2000, Congress passed the Trafficking Victim Protection Act, which set out new penalties for slave traffickers and required the State Department to publish an annual report on slave trafficking worldwide. The sanctions are subject to the president's discretion.

Germany legalized prostitution in 2002, and German brothels have been gearing up for the confluence of legal sex and the World Cup, which is expected to bring 3.5 million tourists to the country for the monthlong tournament, which begins Friday. Berlin, Cologne and Hamburg have all expanded their red light districts for the tournament, and sex-trade entrepreneurs have opened mobile brothels.

The American World Cup team is staying in walking distance from Hamburg's red light district, known in Germany as the Sinful Mile.

German officials, while defending the country's policy of legalized prostitution, say they nonetheless do not condone human trafficking, and have intensified efforts to rein in the flow of prostitutes into their country in advance of the World Cup. But Rep. Christopher Smith of New Jersey, the chairman of the House subcommittee on global human rights, said that Chancellor Angela Merkel needed to do more.

"It's within her power to initiate some moves to protect these women," he said.

The fight against human trafficking is "a great moral calling of our time," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Monday.

The report says that between 600,000 and 800,000 people, most of them women and children, are trafficked across international borders every year. It cited Saudi Arabia, which it said "does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so." In Uzbekistan, the report said, "the majority of convicted traffickers received prison sentences of less than 10 years, were granted amnesty, and thus served no time in prison."

Countries that fail to crack down can be subject to a variety of economic and security sanctions. Since 2003, when the sanctions provision took effect, only two countries — Venezuela and Equatorial Guinea — have been cited.

Tourism Suffers In Indonesian City Caught Between Quake And Volcano (NYT)

By Peter Gelling

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

YOGYAKARTA, Indonesia, June 5 — In the southern part of this city a short street once alive with guest houses, restaurants, travel agencies and souvenir shops now sits quiet, with barely a soul to be found, just weeks before the onset of the tourist season.

The early morning earthquake on May 27 reduced the quaint street, Prawirotaman, to ruins. Throngs of half-awake, panicked tourists who were here that day and managed to survive relatively unharmed crawled out of rubble, wondering what to do and where to go.

The 15 guests at Hotel Prambanan, a two-story inn with about 30 rooms in the popular low-budget backpacking district, were all spared serious injury, as were the other visitors staying nearby.

"Blessed be to God that no one was hurt," said Jahyanto, 39, the manager of Hotel Prambanan, who like many Indonesians uses only one name. "They were confused and scared. I just tried to help them find the fastest way out of Yogyakarta."

Yogyakarta Province is the second most popular tourist destination in Indonesia, Bali being the first. Ancient temples, palaces and a vibrant artists' community draw hundreds of thousands of foreign tourists a year to this area. Tourism accounts for about 20 percent of the province's income and is second only to agriculture as a source of revenue.

Handicraft villages in Bantul, the hardest-hit district, supplied 40 percent of the souvenirs sold throughout Indonesia. Three thousand family kilns for pottery were destroyed in the quake, and most of the villages were nearly leveled.

On Monday, an official from Indonesia's Social Affairs Ministry announced that the death toll from the quake had been revised to 5,782 from 6,234, saying that some victims had been found alive and that others had been counted twice, The Associated Press reported.

Even before the quake, tourism here was threatened by fears of an eruption at Mount Merapi, just north of Yogyakarta. A marketing campaign to show tourists that Yogyakarta, 20 miles south of the volcano, is out of Merapi's reach began several weeks ago and included organized visits to the mountain's slopes.

DOJ_NMG_0031997

Two days after the program began, and the first tourists arrived at Mount Merapi, the quake struck.

Yet tourism officials are optimistic that they can recover. Most of Yogyakarta's major tourist sites were undamaged and remain open, including the city's biggest draw, the Borobudur Buddhist temple, which is more than 1,000 years old and is a Unesco World Heritage site.

"Re-establishing the tourism industry here won't be easy," said Wiendu Nuryanti, secretary general of Yogyakarta's International Center for Culture and Tourism. "But we are working together with a lot of different agencies to help the tourism industry."

Along with local and national government officials, Ms. Nuryanti has created a task force to help rehabilitate tourism in Yogyakarta.

The office of the task force, the Java Crisis Tourism Media Center, is busy with volunteers collecting data on damaged tourist areas. Regular meetings are held to discuss strategies for recovery.

Indonesia's minister of culture and tourism, Jero Wacik, has already indicated that the government will provide subsidized loans to ruined businesses, and tax incentives for struggling hotels and tourist agencies.

Condroyono, the provincial director of tourism, said strategies were being developed to use the earthquake and volcano as a way of diversifying tourism. Though Javanese culture will always be the primary reason tourists come here, he said, there are plans for tours to areas of geological significance, like massive fissures in the Gudung Kidul district, caused by the quake, or the ash-stained slopes of Mount Merapi.

"There is the potential for a kind of adventure tourism here now," he said. Indeed, in the last few weeks a large number of domestic and foreign tourists have brushed aside danger, driving to evacuated areas to take pictures in front of Merapi.

Ms. Nuryanti said her task force planned a major campaign for Mount Merapi, trying to capitalize on the recent international news coverage. The volcano is an important symbol in Javanese culture. Its spirits are believed to protect the ancient kingdom of Yogyakarta, and the designs of many of the temples are modeled after the volcano's shape.

Mr. Condroyono admitted that it would be a long time before most potential tourists saw Yogyakarta as something other than a disaster area. "This will take a long time, more than two years probably, before tourism can start growing here again," he said.

Standing alone among the remains of his former business, Mr. Jahyanto, the hotel manager, said all he needed was a little money to start again. "Maybe it's a dream," he said. "But it is the dream of everyone on this street to rebuild and reopen our businesses."

How To Beat The Muslim Brotherhood (WSJ)

By Bret Stephens

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

MANSOURA, Egypt -- No sooner does Mostafa El Gendy emerge from the governor's office in this provincial city in the Nile Delta than he is besieged by a small crowd of petitioners. A woman with a four-hour daily commute seeks a government job closer to home. Mr. El Gendy hands her an approval form, signed by the governor. A local official wants to drain and fill a fouled canal. Mr. El Gendy has the governor's signature for that, too. There's paperwork authorizing a mile of country road here, a few hundred yards there.

"It sounds like nothing," he says. "But farmers burn rice husks because that's the only way to get rid of it, and it creates pollution. A few hundred meters of road can make a huge difference."

Mr. El Gendy, a dapper man of 45 who made a fortune operating luxury cruise ships on the Nile, represents the nearby Temay district as an independent member of parliament. Last November, he won a landslide victory against candidates of both the Muslim Brotherhood (which elsewhere scored massive parliamentary gains) and President Hosni Mubarak's ruling National Democratic Party. Mr. Mubarak used those results as an excuse to cancel planned local elections, even as he imprisoned liberal opponents such as Ayman Nour. Now Mr. El Gendy is one of the few remaining third-party figures active in Egyptian politics. How he fares will be one indicator of whether a democratic Egypt, should it ever come about, will have a liberal or fundamentalist character.

So far the portents are good for Mr. El Gendy, but he faces an uphill battle. Driving from Mansoura to his ancestral village of Hagaiza along rutted roads and garbage-strewn irrigation canals, Mr. El Gendy makes repeated stops to meet constituents, who seem genuinely pleased to see him. "These people want services," he says. "The nation will follow the party that gives them services."

For years, the only group outside government that has reliably provided broad-based social services has been the Muslim Brotherhood, which, although officially banned, exists as a kind of parallel state within Egyptian society. Medical clinics operated by the Brotherhood, as well as schools and orphanages, can frequently be found alongside mosques throughout the country. Were a free and fair election held tomorrow, the Brotherhood would probably win about 40% of the vote according to Gamal al-Banna, the leading scholarly authority on the group.

This is all the more true because the Brotherhood isn't quite the jihadist, Khomeini-type movement frequently portrayed in the West. "They're less radical, and therefore more dangerous, than outsiders suppose," says an Egyptian journalist. Though the Brotherhood supports Hamas -- on the view that Muslims are religiously obliged to resist what they see as the military occupation of Palestine -- they otherwise forswear violence as a means of achieving or maintaining power, and their leaders do what they can to distance themselves ideologically from the Salafism of Osama bin Laden. "The thought of the Brotherhood doesn't have the tendency to condemn society as apostates, to take violent measures," says Muhammad Habib, the Brotherhood's deputy supreme guide.

None of this is to say the Brotherhood isn't a threat to Egypt's future. But it is a more subtle threat, more conservative than radical, and therefore more appealing to the Egyptian public. Mr. El Gendy speaks of the Brotherhood almost compulsively, as if the ruling party didn't exist and it was his only serious political opposition.

"The Brotherhood think the people voted for them because of them," he says. "I think they're wrong. The people voted for them because they were organized and because they were the 'alternative.' But they will be very strong if there is no third party in the game. If we do not exist they will do the same thing they did in Palestine."

Mr. El Gendy's formula for defeating the Brotherhood involves three ingredients. The first is public services, with a businessman's twist. In addition to doing the bidding of his constituents, he has launched a personal campaign to raise money for civic projects. "I tell people, I am one man, I have one million pounds [about $175,000]. You are a million; each of you give one pound [about 18 cents]." Approaching his village, he points to the shell of a hospital he's building using matching funds. "In Egypt, we have a heritage of people expecting they'll be taken care of" -- by their elders, by the state, by God. "That's wrong," he says. "We need to change the mentality."

The second ingredient is nationalism. In a recent interview, Muhammad Mahdi Akef, the Brotherhood's supreme guide, expressed his feelings about Egypt thus: "Screw Egypt and the Father of Egypt." For Mr. El Gendy, the quote exposed the Brotherhood's Achilles' Heel: Ultimately, it is more interested in the Muslim nation than the Egyptian one. Mr. El Gendy has introduced a bill in parliament to liberalize the display of the Egyptian flag, which had been strictly regulated since the days of Gamal Abdel Nasser and prohibits its use as, say, a bumper sticker. "You have to get people to look in the mirror and say, 'I'm Egyptian, that's fantastic,'" he says.

Finally, there is Islam, or Mr. El Gendy's version of it. "I'm one of those guys who represents 90% of Muslims who are looking for the right way." He proposes opposing the Muslim Brotherhood with what he calls the "Believer Brotherhood," the belief's particulars being less significant to him than the act of belief itself. "Whenever the prophet speaks of the believers in the Holy Koran, he also speaks of love. If you attack a believer, the first thing he'll ask is, 'What did I do wrong?'"

Whether this syncretic, tolerant and expansive form of religiosity has a fighting chance in today's Egypt is an open question, but Mr. El Gendy is convinced it better represents the country's history than the strict and humorless version represented by the Muslim Brotherhood.

Then, too, there's something to be said for starting traditions of one's own. "There is a concept called Sunna Hassana -- good imitation," he explains. "I had my life, my family, my business. I had my boat. When I went to elections, I jumped. Maybe now others like me will jump, too."

Anybody But Chávez (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

Governments that produce hyperinflation and unchecked terrorism have a way of ending political careers. So how then to explain the victory in Sunday's Peruvian presidential elections of Alan Garcia, whose 1985-1990 term included all that and more?

The answer is that Mr. Garcia's opponent was Ollanta Humala, a protégé of Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez. By electing Mr. Garcia, Peruvian voters sent a message that they don't want to follow Venezuela over the cliff. The same concerns have been evident in Brazil, Chile and Uruguay for some time, as left-of-center leaders have refused to join Hugo in his attempt to isolate the region. Now Mr. Chávez has lost another potential satellite.

Mr. Garcia is no free-market reformer, though he does claim to have learned from his mistakes. Yet many Peruvians found themselves voting for him because the prospect of Mr. Humala was so much worse. Mr. Humala had promised to copy the Chávez pattern of making threats against foreign investors. He also has some anti-democratic credentials in common with Mr. Chávez, such as having led a failed military coup. The Peruvian electorate may have also noted that since the Chávez-like candidate won the presidency in Bolivia in late 2005, that country has increasingly fallen under Venezuelan sway.

Late last month right-of-center Colombian President Alvaro Uribe won a landslide re-election against a pro-Chávez candidate. Mr. Uribe could point to four years of antiterror accomplishments, but his victory and Mr. Garcia's are hopeful signs that most of Latin America does not want to return to the isolationism and authoritarianism of the 1970s and early '80s.

TERRORISM NEWS:

U.S. Links To Canadian Plot Probed (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

U.S. and Canadian officials are investigating links between Canadian terror suspects accused of plotting to bomb government buildings and Islamic militants in the United States and other countries.

Investigators are looking at links between two Atlanta men arrested in March after they videotaped the U.S. Capitol and at least three other Washington locations and two Canadians identified as part of a terrorist ring. The Canadians were arrested last year trying to smuggle weapons into Canada.

Ehsanul Islam Sadequee, 19, and Syed Haris Ahmed, 21, both U.S. citizens and Georgia residents, were arrested and later indicted after they traveled to Canada to meet with at least three other targets of an ongoing FBI terrorism investigation in March 2005.

An FBI affidavit said they discussed "strategic locations in the United States suitable for a terrorist strike."

The affidavit said Ahmed, charged with giving material support of terrorism, and Sadequee, accused of making materially false statements in connection with an ongoing federal terrorism investigation, talked about attacks on oil refineries and military bases and planned to travel to Pakistan to get military training at a terrorist camp, which authorities said Ahmed then tried to do.

U.S. authorities have established that the two men also had been in contact via computer with some of the 17 terror suspects arrested Saturday in Canada.

During a hearing in their case, Assistant U.S. Attorney Colleen Kavanagh said Sadequee and Ahmed made videos in Washington of the U.S. Capitol, the Masonic Temple, the World Bank and a fuel storage facility and were preparing to send them to "overseas brothers." She said Sadequee gave Ahmed information on how to receive military-style training in Pakistan.

FBI spokesman Richard Kolko acknowledged over the weekend that some of the Canadian suspects had been in "contact" with the two Georgia men but said there was "no current outstanding threat to any targets on U.S. soil emanating from this case."

"There is preliminary indication that some of the Canadian subjects may have had limited contact with the two people recently arrested from Georgia," Mr. Kolko said.

Yesterday, he noted that the bureau had been working with Canadian authorities on the suspected terrorist cell for "some time" and had established "a working relationship with the Canadians in the prevention of terrorism."

Authorities said Canadian investigators have focused on Mohammed Dirie, 22, and Yasin Abdi Mohamed, 24, both Somali immigrants living in Kingston, Ontario, who were taken into custody Aug. 13 on weapons charges at the Peace Bridge between Canada and Buffalo, N.Y. Stopped by Canadian Border Services inspectors, they later were convicted on weapons violations and are serving two-year prison sentences in Canada.

Listed among the 17 charged with being members of the Canadian terrorist organization, Dirie and Mohamed attempted to smuggle three handguns and 200 rounds of ammunition into Canada from the United States.

"This investigation is not over," Royal Canadian Mounted Police Assistant Commissioner Mike McDonell told the Canadian Broadcasting Corp. "We will be following every investigative lead we have to its conclusion, and anybody that aided, facilitated or participated in this terrorist event will be arrested."

The Canadians are accused in a scheme to buy 3,000 pounds of ammonium nitrate for bombs, which were to be used against buildings and landmarks in that country. The amount is three times what was used in the 1995 Oklahoma City bombing, which killed 168 persons.

Twelve of those charged are accused of participating in a terrorist group, including Dirie and Mohamed, who were also named on charges of importing weapons and ammunition for the purpose of terrorist activity. Another man, Fahim Ahmad, 21, an Afghan national living in Canada, also was named on weapons charges. Dirie and Mohamed reportedly were driving a car rented by Ahmad at the time of their arrest last year.

Nine of the men are facing charges of receiving training from a terrorist group, and four others are accused of providing training. Six are also charged with intending to cause an explosion causing serious bodily harm or death.

Five youths have also been charged in connection with the plot, but details of their charges were not released.

U.S. authorities have been concerned for some time about the possibility of terrorists coming into the United States from Canada.

The Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) first reported in December 2002 that al Qaeda terrorists had established "sleeper cells" in Canada whose members had the "capability and conviction" to support terrorist activities all across North America. The agency called the cells secretive, operational and loyal to Osama bin Laden, named as the mastermind of the September 11 attacks.

More Vigilance Seen On U.S.-Canada Border (AP)

By David Crary

AP, June 5, 2006

U.S. authorities tightened their checks of traffic from Canada on Monday as debate over the long and hard-to-police border intensified following the weekend arrests of 17 Muslim Canadians in a suspected Ontario terror plot.

Calls for tougher security measures were countered by pleas from business and civic leaders on both sides to keep border crossings as quick and simple as possible.

"Terrorism is clearly part of the North American environment whether we like it or not, but closing down the border is not going to eliminate it," said Arlene White, a Canadian who is executive director of the Binational Tourism Alliance in the Niagara Falls-Buffalo area.

In Washington, U.S. Border Patrol Chief David Aguilar said patrol stations along the 4,000-mile border — especially those adjoining Ontario — are on high alert because of the arrests, although investigators say the suspects' alleged plot apparently involved only targets in Canada.

U.S. agents already deployed to the Canadian border will work overtime and some will be moved closer to the areas where the arrests occurred, Aguilar said.

U.S. Customs and Border Protection official Kristi Clemens said some traffic headed into the United States would under go tougher procedures at the 89 ports of entry along the border.

"The current events may result in some additional questions of commuters and travels," Clemens said. She also said, without elaborating, that her agency has added some "enforcement capabilities" following the arrests.

Security along the border has been increasing ever since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001: new surveillance camera systems, new scanning devices to check on trucks' cargo, and many more agents on duty.

But concerns remain high among some politicians and experts, such as David Harris, former chief of strategic planning for the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. He contends that Canada's immigration policies are too lax, enabling more than 50 terrorist organizations to have a presence in the country.

"Canadians are determined to keep the border open at almost any cost, because so much of Canada's economy relies on U.S. trade," said Harris, who now is a private security consultant in Ottawa. "The general theory of the trade devotees is the border should be open all the time, at virtually any cost — but you can only enjoy your prosperity if you're alive to do so."

Harris has urged Canada to tighten its immigration policies — it welcomes some 250,000 new immigrants and refugees each year — and work with the United States on bolstering border controls with such high-tech devices as such as sensors and infrared cameras.

Prior to the weekend arrests, the U.S. debate over immigration and border security been focused on border with Mexico. Said Harris: "A sole American preoccupation with the southern border is living in the past."

About 1,000 U.S. Border Patrol agents work along the U.S.-Canada border, roughly triple the 2001 force but a fraction of the 9,600 agents who patrol the Mexican border, about half as long at 1,900 miles.

Though often depicted as porous, controls along the U.S.-Canada border have entrapped some terrorist suspects, such as Ahmed Ressam, who was arrested as he drove off a ferry in Port Angeles, Wash., in 1999 and was later convicted of plotting to bomb the Los Angeles airport.

Last summer, two men believed to be part of a terrorist ring in Canada were arrested in Buffalo while trying to smuggle guns and ammunition from the United States. The men are serving two-year jail sentences.

One initiative to change border procedures has been mired in controversy — the Western Hemisphere Travel Initiative. It would require Americans re-entering the United States after short visits to Canada and Mexico to show passports or other high-tech ID cards — a change from the current practice in which a driver's license usually suffices.

The Senate — concerned about border-crossing snarls — recently voted to delay implementation of the measure from January 2008 until June 2009.

Arlene White, the binational tourism official, said confusion about the passport requirement already had reduced cross-border visits.

DOJ_NMG_0032005

"I recognize the immigration issue is huge in the states," White said. "But the northern border is very, very different, and we must continue to appreciate those differences."

White acknowledged, however, that some of the security measures implemented since the Sept. 11 attacks have actually speeded border crossings. These include the use of high-tech x-ray scanners to screen vehicles and a binational program that allows speedier crossings for people accepted into a special program for low-risk frequent travelers.

"The border's definitely safer — and more efficient," said Kevin Corsaro, a spokesman for U.S. Customs and Border Protection in Buffalo.

Canada is the United States' largest trading partner, conducting an estimated $1.5 billion in business daily.

Arrests Raise Questions About U.S.-Canada Border Security (KRT)

By Dave Montgomery

Knight Ridder, June 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - The breakup of an alleged terrorist bomb plot in Canada late last week has raised new fears that the next terrorist attack could come from the north.

The 4,000-mile border between the United States and Canada is twice as long as the one with Mexico, but it's guarded by fewer than 1,000 Border Patrol agents - one-tenth of the force in the Southwest. Vast stretches of unpatrolled terrain offer potential terrorists an easily accessible gateway into the United States.

"Do the math," said T.J. Bonner, a San Diego agent who serves as the president of the National Border Patrol Council, a 10,500-member union that represents nonsupervisory Border Patrol agents. "We're very vulnerable out there."

While boosting border enforcement and national security have emerged as central elements of the immigration legislation that's moving through Congress, attention has centered on the porous Southwest border, where more than 1 million illegal immigrants are arrested annually.

But some lawmakers are calling for a harder look at the northern border after Friday's arrests of 12 men and five juveniles who allegedly had stockpiled three tons of ammonium nitrate fertilizer to carry out terrorist bombing attacks in Canada. Timothy McVeigh used two tons of the highly destructive chemical substance in the 1995 attack that demolished the Oklahoma City federal building, killing 168 people.

Although the suspects appeared to be targeting sites in Canada, including the Parliament building in Ottawa, investigators fear they'd established a U.S. link with two terrorism suspects in Georgia who may have been plotting attacks in the United States, but that remains unconfirmed.

The Canadian Security Intelligence Service, the government's chief national-security agency, has estimated that as many as 50 terrorist organizations and 300 individual terrorism suspects have bases of operations in Canada. Active groups, the agency said, include Shiite and Sunni Islamic extremists, the Irish Republican Army and all major Sikh terrorist organizations.

"We're aware that there is a terrorist infrastructure within Canada, no different than within the United States and other countries, that contains a variety of elements ranging from fundraisers, ideological support, to direct membership," said Ben Venzke, who heads the IntelCenter, a private contractor that does counterterrorism support work for the U.S. government.

"Despite all of the security measures and procedures put in place to stop terrorists" from crossing the border, Venzke said, "it is extremely difficult. Even if you do the best possible effort, there are still going to be a fair number to get through."

Even before the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the northern border had a reputation as a potential open door for extremists who'd settled in Canada to take advantage of its liberal immigration policies. One Canadian officer was quoted as describing the country as "Club Med for terrorists."

In December 1999, authorities arrested Ahmed Ressam after he drove from Canada to Washington state in a rental car packed with bomb-making material, which he'd planned to use to bomb Los Angeles International Airport on New Year's Eve. He later was sentenced to 22 years in prison.

In 1997, Ghazi Ibrahim Abu Maizar, a would-be suicide bomber who planned to detonate a pipe bomb in a New York subway station, crossed illegally into the United States three times, once by bus and twice by hiking across, according to news accounts. Several of the Sept. 11 hijackers also crossed into the United States from Canada.

The scramble to toughen national security after Sept. 11 prompted a nearly threefold increase in Border Patrol agents at the U.S.-Canada border, from 340 in 2001 to 980 by this year, according to U.S. Customs and Border Protection.

U.S. officials also doubled inspectors at the 89 ports of entry, from 1,615 to 3,391, expanded cooperative law-enforcement operations with Canada and have increasingly employed sensors, cameras, aircraft and marine patrols.

Even so, law enforcement authorities acknowledge the immense challenges of patrolling a 3,987-mile stretch that cuts along 12 states, traversing waterways, mountainous terrain and dense forests.

DOJ_NMG_0032006

Some illegal crossers have been known to enter the United States on snowmobiles. Others fly across unpatrolled airspace or simply walk down deserted farm roads.

Smugglers also exploit the remote terrain, transporting drugs and human cargo. In recent months, agents with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement have smashed smuggling rings that transported Asians, Pakistanis and Eastern Europeans.

"I don't care how much technology you have up there, you'll still have trouble getting agents to respond in a timely fashion," Bonner said. "There's vast stretches that make it very difficult, depending on the season. For the well-trained, determined crosser, it's actually an advantage for them."

Montgomery covers Washington for the Fort Worth Star-Telegram. Star-Telegram researcher Marcia Melton contributed to this report.

Charges In Canadian Bomb Plot Isolate 6 Ringleaders (WP)

By Doug Struck

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

TORONTO, June 5 -- Six men arrested in a broad police sweep last weekend have been charged with hatching the alleged plot to set off a powerful bomb somewhere in Ontario, according to charges made public Monday.

A total of 17 people were arrested -- 12 adults and five juveniles -- and all have been charged under Canada's post-Sept. 11, 2001, terrorism laws. But details made public Monday suggest that some members of the group may have had more limited knowledge of the alleged plot than others.

All 12 adults are charged with "knowingly participating, directly or indirectly, in the activity of a terrorist group." The terrorism-related charges against the juveniles, all of them males, have not been disclosed.

A report in the Toronto Star said police had intercepted the fertilizer to be used in the bomb and substituted a harmless powder before the arrests were made. Police officials said Monday they stood by their statement that three tons of the fertilizer, which is highly explosive when mixed with fuel oil, was "delivered" to the bombers.

Mike McDonell, assistant commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, said on Saturday that police had swooped in as the danger increased and that the detained men had the "intent and capability" to carry out the bombing.

The RCMP and intelligence agents said they had been closely watching the activities of at least some of the men for an extended period before Friday's arrests. According to their statements and reports here, several members of the group came under scrutiny as a result of political conversations on the Internet that were monitored by authorities.

The investigators' interest was heightened after the visit to Toronto in March 2005 of two men from Georgia, Syed Ahmed, 21, and Ehsanul Sadequee, 19, who were later charged under anti-terrorism laws. The men allegedly met with at least three Canadians to discuss potential bombing targets, the FBI has said. The charges revealed Monday said the terrorism activity in Canada began on March 1, 2005.

According to those charges, 10 of the men gathered in a vacant wooded area north of Toronto for what authorities call "terrorism-related training." Residents of the rural area say they heard the sounds of automatic weapons and saw men in camouflage uniforms in the woods near Washago, about 90 miles north of Toronto, several times last year.

Police swept the area for evidence after the men had left, according to reports here.

Several of the men attended a storefront mosque in Mississauga, an incorporated suburb west of Toronto that is home to many immigrant groups. A key and, to some, troubling figure in that mosque was Qayyum Abdul Jamal, 43, the oldest of those arrested. Some people who heard Jamal discuss politics at the mosque objected that he was trying to teach younger men that Western countries are at war with Muslims.

It is unclear how far their complaints went, but Wajid Khan, a member of Parliament and one of those who confronted Jamal at the mosque last year, said Sunday that "many people in the community were cooperating" with authorities.

The charged men, all of them said by authorities to be Canadian citizens or longtime residents, are from areas around Toronto and Kingston, Ontario. Two of those charged, Yasim Abdi Mohamed, 24, and Mohammed Dirie, 22, both of whom moved from Somalia to Kingston, are already in jail, having been caught at the U.S. border last August attempting to bring handguns into Canada.

Plot Puts Focus On Security, Immigration Agencies (WT)

By Fawzia Sheikh

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

TORONTO -- Canadian security and immigration practices came under scrutiny yesterday after the weekend arrests of 17 persons suspected of plotting to blow up southern Ontario landmarks.

DOJ_NMG_0032007

About 90 percent of immigration applicants from Pakistan and Afghanistan in the past five years have not been sufficiently screened for security concerns, Jack Hooper, deputy director of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), told a Senate committee last month.

Security analysts, meanwhile, warned that past cuts in staffing and funding for the nation's security services have left them short of manpower to search for terrorist cells.

Seventeen Canadian residents, many of them regular attendees at a Toronto mosque, were arrested Friday and Saturday after members of the group purchased 3 tons of ammonium nitrate, a fertilizer that can be used to make bombs.

Authorities said the suspects had been monitored by security agencies since 2004, but few details of the plot were offered ahead of a court hearing today. News reports said investigators had been eavesdropping on Internet chat rooms espousing anti-Western sentiment that are frequented by some of the accused.

John Thompson, president of the MacKenzie Institute think tank, said he thinks at least one other terrorist cell and "probably more" were still operating.

"Most of them would be in the Toronto area. It's the largest concentration of Muslims," he said.

If he is correct, finding such groups will be a challenge for the CSIS, which worked with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and local and federal agencies in the weekend roundup.

The budget of CSIS was cut by about 20 percent in the 10 years before the September 11 attacks in the United States, and staff levels went from about 2,700 to 2,200, said Dwight Hamilton, lead author and editor of a recently released book on terrorism and Canadian intelligence.

The federal government boosted the CSIS budget by 30 percent a few months after the attacks, funding "a recruiting drive to expand on their linguistic and cultural skills," Mr. Thompson said. CSIS also integrated with other Canadian law-enforcement agencies to better track terrorism.

Even so, Mr. Hamilton said, "CSIS doesn't have the manpower to deal with the threat. They've been gutted. And just because [staff] numbers went up after 9/11 doesn't mean that all is well.

"The head of the standing [government] committee on national defense and security, Colin Kenny, has said that training an intelligence analyst takes about as long as training a neurosurgeon. You do the math."

Mr. Hooper, the CSIS deputy director, acknowledged to a parliamentary committee last month that most immigration applicants from Pakistan and Afghanistan are not adequately screened.

CSIS spokeswoman Barbara Campion said that everyone who applies for immigration or refugee status in Canada is screened but that security checks are completed on only the 10 percent of overseas applicants who are deemed worrisome by Citizenship and Immigration Canada.

Mr. Thompson said that as well as monitoring jihadist groups, CSIS is struggling to monitor threats from non-Muslim organizations in Canada, such as Sri Lanka's Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam and the Sikh group Babbar Khalsa.

CSIS said it plans to complete a review of "operational resources" this summer.

Canada Confronts Its Shadows Within (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, June 6, 2006

MISSISSAUGA, Canada — In a country that celebrates cultural diversity, a suspected terrorist plot has shattered the image that many Canadians have of themselves as more secure, more generous and more likable than their U.S. neighbors.

From Muslim shopkeepers in multicultural neighborhoods such as this one to intellectuals debating social policy in Toronto and Ottawa, Canadians have been forced into a disturbing confrontation with the idea that global terrorism may have found fertile soil within their own boundaries.

"I thought this was a very safe country. That's why we came here from Pakistan," said Anjun Ahmed, a 54-year-old convenience store owner who moved to this thriving Toronto suburb, the fastest-growing in Canada, nearly two years ago from Rawalpindi. "This is very bad. If they [the suspects] were really going to do these things, people will be afraid and won't come here."

The 17 men and youths arrested over the weekend for allegedly plotting to blow up Canadian national landmarks were to be arraigned today on charges including participation in a terrorist group. Three also face weapons-smuggling charges, six have been charged with intent to carry out a bombing on an undisclosed target, and nine stand accused of taking part in a terrorist training course, according to documents filed with the Ontario Court of Justice.

Like the homegrown British extremists who bombed London's transit system in July, Canada's alleged perpetrators of immigrant origin were mostly long-settled citizens whose families had fled poverty and oppression in Somalia, the Middle East, the Indian subcontinent and the Caribbean.

DOJ_NMG_0032008

Like the Al Qaeda and Taliban extremists who practiced bomb-making and firearms use at secret camps in Afghanistan before Sept. 11, the Canadian suspects allegedly trained at a clandestine base north of here near remote Lake Simcoe, covering their tracks by dismantling the facility after the sessions in November and December.

And like Timothy McVeigh, whose 1995 bombing in Oklahoma City killed 168 people, the Canadian suspects allegedly had amassed ammonium nitrate — three times as much as McVeigh used in the worst act of domestic terrorism on U.S. soil.

Though the men, means and methods prompted comparison to past attacks, Canadian analysts and observers were saddened and offended that the accused plotters would want to harm their nation.

"Terrorists always try to target peaceful places because it's easier to hit a place where people don't think such things can happen," said Mohsin Ali, a 20-year-old Ryerson University engineering student who came here with his family two years ago from Karachi, Pakistan.

"My children go to college and school here. They don't have problems," said shop owner Ahmed, who invested his life savings in the shop adjacent to the strip-mall mosque where most of the arrested terrorism suspects worshipped. "I'm disappointed."

The attacks have quickly led to acts of anti-Muslim retaliation.

Thirty windows were smashed by vandals early Sunday at the huge International Muslims Organization of Toronto mosque in the Rexdale neighborhood just north of here, an incident its Guyanese founder, Omar Farouk, said Muslims were "hoping and praying was an isolated incident."

"The Canadian people are very loving and kind — equally are the Muslims," said Farouk, whose mosque is attended by nearly 20,000 people and serves as a gathering place for interfaith community events.

The view of Canada as removed from the immigrant frictions and diplomatic strains suffered by its superpower neighbor may be outdated, said Audrey Macklin, a University of Toronto law professor who specializes in immigration, refugee and citizenship affairs.

"There is a desire in Canada to see ourselves as very different from the United States. Whatever we are, we are not the United States," she said, citing the nation's more liberal immigration policy and rejection of go-it-alone military actions. Canada has declined to be part of the U.S.-led forces involved in the war in Iraq.

"We're not a priority target the way the United States is, but that doesn't mean we are protected," she said, adding that Canadians "picture themselves as being thought of as nicer than the United States."

Yet even the best justice system in the world could not eradicate crime, and neither can all acts of extremism be prevented, she said, warning that "no country should be smug enough to think it's immune."

Toronto Mayor David Miller gave voice to his country's collective reluctant realization that vulnerability to extremist violence might be a price paid by an open society unwilling to rein in its rights and freedoms.

"We didn't, as Canadians, expect this, but obviously it is part of modern reality," he told CBC Radio.

David Rudd, president of the Canadian Institute of Strategic Studies, said Canada's liberal immigration policy and generous social spending were laudable. And he brooks no argument from those looking for justification in any disaffection among the alleged would-be bombers, only two of whom are older than 25.

"Certainly the political landscape of this country is very, very amenable to people from foreign countries and non-Anglo-Saxon cultures coming here and living in peace and getting ahead in their lives," said Rudd, applauding the government's emphasis on accepting the cultural individualities of newcomers rather than seeking homogenization.

Unlike the suburban ghettos that have sprung up around major European cities, Canada's nearly 6 million immigrants live scattered throughout the country of 32 million people. They reside primarily in leafy bedroom communities such as Mississauga, a largely immigrant venue but one where Jamaican jerk shops, Arab kebab stands, sushi bars and Indian restaurants stand side by side with burger stands and doughnut shops in suburbs and strip malls.

One school of thought gaining traction in explaining why Canada could become a terrorism target for Muslim extremists is its very liberal, consumer-oriented and socially permissive nature, Rudd said.

"To some people, that situation is offensive or degenerate, that women should be allowed to walk down the street wearing a halter top," he said.

Some who espouse radical or ultraconservative views on the practice of Islam come to Canada for its generous welfare and professional opportunities, often quietly harboring resentment of their environment but at times acting on what they see as blasphemous, he said.

Prime Minister Stephen Harper offered a similar explanation to Canadians the day after the country's largest anti-terrorism sweep since the aftermath of Sept. 11.

Canada's focus on Muslim extremism intensified after the 1999 arrest of Algerian national Ahmed Ressam as he attempted to cross from British Columbia into Washington state. Ressam was caught with a carload of explosives and convicted of planning to use them to bomb Los Angeles International Airport on New Year's Eve. He was identified as a member of a Montreal-based terrorist cell with links to Al Qaeda camps in Afghanistan.

Harper, speaking of the new suspected plot, said in a national address: "Their alleged target was Canada, Canadian institutions, the Canadian economy, the Canadian people.

"We are a target because of who we are and how we live, our society, our diversity and our values — values such as freedom, democracy and the rule of law," he said. "The values that make Canada great, values that Canadians cherish."

Padilla Lawyer Wants Key Evidence Tossed (AP)

By Curt Anderson

AP, June 5, 2006

A lawyer for alleged al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla is asking a judge to throw out key evidence, saying the warrant for his arrest was based on statements from one source who claims he was tortured and another who was heavily medicated.

The statements were cited in an FBI affidavit "that distorted the facts in an apparent disregard for the truth," attorney Andrew Patel said in court papers filed late last week.

Padilla was arrested in 2002 at Chicago's O'Hare Airport. Initially accused of plotting to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a major U.S. city, Padilla was designated an enemy combatant and held without charge by the military for 3 1/2 years.

President Bush dropped the combatant label in November and Padilla was indicted in Miami along with four others on charges of being part of a support cell for Islamic extremists. Padilla's trial is set for this fall.

The evidence being challenged includes a cell phone allegedly provided to Padilla by another al-Qaida operative, an address book containing names of his alleged al-Qaida recruiter and sponsor, and more than $10,000 in cash.

In court papers, Patel does not accuse the FBI or other U.S. interrogators of engaging in torture. But he argued that U.S. failure to detail the torture allegations before Padilla's arrest invalidate the evidence seized from him.

A spokesman for U.S. Attorney R. Alexander Acosta had no comment Monday.

According to Patel, the sources cited in the FBI affidavit were Binyam Ahmed Muhammad — being held at the Guantanamo Bay detention camp — and Abu Zubayda, a top al-Qaida leader held at an undisclosed location. They were arrested in Pakistan in 2002.

Patel said Muhammad has told his own lawyer that he was whipped, hung from the ceiling of his cell with leather straps and later taken to Morocco where he was tortured with a razor.

Patel said Zubayda was treated after his arrest for gunshot wounds, raising questions about "the effect the medications may have had on Abu Zubayda's ability to provide accurate information."

Maryland Teacher's Terror Trial Goes To Jury (WT/AP)

By Matthew Barakat, Associated Press

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

A third-grade teacher at a Muslim school in Maryland traveled to Pakistan shortly after the 2001 terrorist attacks, trained with a terrorist group there and later served as chauffeur for one of that group's leaders during his U.S. travels, federal prosecutors said yesterday.

Prosecutors and defense attorneys made their closing arguments yesterday in the trial of Ali Asad Chandia, 29, who is charged with providing material support to Lashkar-e-Taiba, a group that supports Muslim control of the disputed Kashmir territory on the India-Pakistan border. The jury began its deliberations yesterday afternoon.

The U.S. government declared Lashkar a terrorist group in December 2001.

Prosecutors have said Lashkar served as a potential gateway for Americans and others who wanted to join the Taliban in neighboring Afghanistan in its fight against U.S. troops in late 2001.

The charges against Mr. Chandia stem from a government investigation of what prosecutors called a "Virginia jihad network," a group of young Muslim men who used paint-ball games in 2000 and 2001 as paramilitary training for holy war around the globe.

Ten persons have been convicted in that investigation, including the group's spiritual leader, Ali al-Timimi, who was sentenced to life in prison for soliciting treason and urging group members to fight U.S. troops in Afghanistan.

Prosecutors do not say that Mr. Chandia intended to take up arms against U.S. troops, but they do say he received jihad training at a Lashkar camp in late 2001.

Then, after returning to the United States in 2002, they say he helped Lashkar by assisting one of its officers, Mohammed Ajmal Khan, in his U.S. travels.

DOJ_NMG_0032010

Specifically, Mr. Chandia served as a driver for Khan and picked him up at various airports. He also helped Khan obtain and ship equipment from the United States to Pakistan, including a remote-controlled aircraft and 50,000 paint balls, according to the government.

Prosecutor John Gibbs said the defense sought to portray Khan as an eccentric, largely innocuous character.

"He is not cute. He is a terrorist," Mr. Gibbs said of Khan, who was convicted in Great Britain of supporting Lashkar and sentenced earlier this year to nine years in prison.

Defense lawyer Marvin Miller said prosecutors had no evidence that Mr. Chandia attended a Lashkar camp, only testimony from an eyewitness who saw Mr. Chandia at a Lashkar office in Lahore.

Mr. Miller said Mr. Chandia traveled to Pakistan to help arrange his brother's wedding there in January 2002.

As for the assistance Mr. Chandia lent to Khan, Mr. Miller argued that Mr. Chandia didn't know of Khan's connections to Lashkar.

Mr. Chandia is on leave from a teaching job the al-Huda school in College Park.

Counterterror Exemption Proposed For Privacy Act (WT/UPI)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

A little-noticed proposal from the Senate intelligence committee would exempt federal agencies from important provisions of the Privacy Act in the name of the war on terrorism.

The committee's annual authorization bill, which was sent to the Senate last month after a unanimous vote, would initiate a three-year pilot program, during which U.S. intelligence agencies would be able to access personal information about Americans held by other federal departments or agencies if it is thought to be relevant to counterterrorism or counterproliferation.

In the wake of revelations about the administration's use of data mining and warrantless surveillance of telephone and Internet communications in pursuit of the nation's terrorist enemies, the provision could cause a furor.

"If this is enacted, the Privacy Act will look like Swiss cheese," American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) legislative counsel Tim Sparapani said.

Mr. Sparapani said he was not reassured by the role that the law envisages for the president's Privacy and Civil Liberties Oversight Board, which would monitor the program and report to Congress as the three-year sunset approached.

"The board is stacked four [Republicans] to one [Democrat]," he said.

"It is not truly independent" because it is inside the president's own office, which puts it "under the thumb of the president and his advisers."

The board's chairwoman, Texas lawyer Carol Dinkins, did not respond to a request for comment yesterday afternoon.

A Democratic committee staffer defended the proposal, saying the exemptions were "narrowly drawn to address the kinds of problems we found during our September 11 inquiry" when U.S. agencies failed to pool information about known al Qaeda militants, who were, thus, able to slip into the country.

At the moment, the 1974 Privacy Act broadly prohibits a federal government entity that has collected information about Americans from using it for any purpose other than that for which it was collected. Information typically cannot be passed on to other agencies or departments without the person's permission.

These restrictions "could prevent the sharing of intelligence information within the executive branch," said the committee report accompanying the intelligence authorization bill, designated S. 3237.

The report goes on to say that an "Information Sharing Working Group," made up of representatives from U.S. intelligence and law-enforcement agencies and from the Departments of Defense and Homeland Security, had recommended changes to the Privacy Act restrictions on personal-information sharing in 2004.

The committee included similar provisions in its authorization bill last year, but that legislation died after an anonymous hold -- apparently from at least one Republican senator angered by Democrat-authored provisions on detention and interrogation -- prevented it from reaching the Senate floor.

Though the Privacy Act created 12 exceptions to the restriction on data sharing -- including for information used "to support a civil or criminal law-enforcement activity under certain proscribed circumstances" -- the committee report says there is no such exemption for intelligence activities.

Section 310 of the committee's new bill creates one, exempting all U.S. intelligence agencies from data-sharing restrictions in cases in which the information "is relevant to a lawful and authorized foreign intelligence or counterintelligence activity." If the information does not "pertain to an identifiable individual," then the director of national intelligence or one his deputies has to approve the sharing.

DOJ_NMG_0032011

Under the provision, intelligence agencies also can ask for Privacy Act-covered records from nonintelligence agencies -- and be entitled to them -- if the information relates to international terrorism or proliferation.

No Defense For Degrading Prisoners (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 6, 2006

IN AN UNUSUAL MOMENT OF public introspection, President Bush told a recent news conference that "the biggest mistake that's happened so far, at least from our country's involvement in Iraq, is Abu Ghraib. We've been paying for that for a long period of time."

Apparently, planners in the Pentagon weren't listening to the president's remarks, or failed to understand their larger import: This country harms its own image — and puts its troops in harm's way — when it humiliates and degrades prisoners.

On Monday, The Times' Julian E. Barnes reported that the Defense Department, over the objection of the State Department, has decided to omit from a new Army Field Manual on interrogation a prohibition against "humiliating and degrading treatment" contained in Common Article 3 of the Geneva Convention.

Unfortunately, there is a precedent for this deletion. In a 2002 order, President Bush wrote that because Article 3 was designed to deal with conflicts that were not "international" in scope but rather civil conflicts, it didn't apply to Al Qaeda or Taliban detainees.

More recently, Pentagon officials — supported by Vice President Dick Cheney's office — apparently have come to believe that including the prohibition in the manual would cramp the style of interrogators and create an "unintentional sanctuary" for Al Qaeda fighters. For example, one official complained, adherence to Article 3 might make it difficult to "punch the buttons of a Muslim male" by questioning his manhood.

Even if this were true — and we doubt whether verbal insults constitute "humiliating and degrading treatment" — the alternative is worse. Omitting Article 3 from the interrogation manual not only would be handing the enemies of the United States a propaganda victory, but by giving interrogators an inch of discretion, it would be encouraging some of them to take a mile. Such slippage isn't just a matter of speculation. It's what happened at Abu Ghraib.

We have been here before. In 2002, Justice Department lawyers produced a now-infamous memo espousing a ridiculously narrow definition of torture, limiting it to the pain accompanying "death, organ failure or the permanent impairment of a significant body function." The administration repudiated the memo, just as it had second thoughts about a directive from Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld allowing interrogators to subject detainees to "mild, noninjurious physical conduct" to induce them to talk.

Any plan to omit Article 3 from the interrogation manual justifies the same sort of serious second thoughts. If Rumsfeld can't see that, his newly reflective boss should set him straight.

Degrading America's Image (NYT)

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

For more than seven decades, civilized nations have adhered to minimum standards of decent behavior toward prisoners of war — agreed to in the Geneva Conventions. They were respected by 12 presidents and generations of military leaders because they reflected this nation's principles and gave Americans some protection if they were captured in wartime.

It took the Bush administration to make the world doubt Washington's fidelity to the rules. And The Los Angeles Times, reporting yesterday on a dispute over updating the Army rulebook known as the Field Manual, reminded us that there is good reason to worry.

At issue is Directive 2310 on the treatment and questioning of prisoners, an annex to the Field Manual. It has long contained a reference to Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which covers all prisoners, whether they meet the common definition of prisoners of war or are the sort of prisoners the administration classifies as "unlawful enemy combatants," like suspected members of the Taliban or Al Qaeda.

Article 3 prohibits the use of torture and other overt acts of violence. But Mr. Bush's civilian lawyers removed it from the military rulebook over the objections of diplomats and military lawyers. Mr. Bush has said he does not condone torture, but he has also said he would decide for himself when to follow the ban on torture imposed by Congress last year. Removing the Geneva Conventions from Army regulations gives the world more cause for doubt.

Article 3 also prohibits "outrages on personal dignity, in particular, humiliating and degrading treatment." (Remember the hooded man, the pyramids of naked prisoners?) The Pentagon says the new rules require humane treatment, but that is not much comfort, since the Bush team has shown that it does not define humane treatment the way most people do.

There are other aspects of Article 3 that this administration probably finds inconvenient, like its requirement that governments holding prisoners subject them to actual courts "affording all the judicial guarantees which are recognized as indispensable by civilized peoples." The hearings at Guantánamo Bay hardly meet that description.

It defies belief that this administration is still clinging to its benighted policies on prisoners after the horrors of Abu Ghraib, the killings at American camps in Afghanistan and the world's fresh outrage over what appears to have been the massacre of Iraqi men, women and children in the village of Haditha.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Intel Chief Gives Vt. Commencement Talk (AP-Y2)

By David Gram

AP2, June 5, 2006

National Intelligence Director John Negroponte urged graduates of a private high school Monday to appreciate and take full advantage of the human ability to communicate.

In a brief speech, Negroponte said words had profoundly shaped human history, giving people "the ability to express feelings, to record events, to plan ahead, to resolve differences and to share a common identity."

"You have been empowered to express yourselves, to get to know one another, to define your aspirations and to understand and respect your differences," he said.

Negroponte, a former U.S. ambassador, is the first director of National Intelligence, a position designed to oversee the country's different intelligence agencies.

He made no reference to foreign policy or the controversy over the government's domestic eavesdropping program during his speech at St. Johnsbury Academy, where his son John was one of the graduates.

About 75 peace activists stood outside in the drizzle holding signs and giving speeches, alleging that Negroponte was a key player in abusive U.S. foreign policies from Central America in the 1980s to Iraq today.

"It's outrageous that he's being given a position of honor in our community," said Brian Tokar of East Montpelier.

Police arrested four protesters, two who were removed from the hall while heckling during Negroponte's speech and two who ventured onto what police said was the academy's private property.

After the second heckler was hustled out by security, Negroponte drew a laugh when he said, "I think you'll all be very grateful that I have a very short speech."

Groundbreaking For 9/11 Memorial At Pentagon Set (WP)

By Timothy Dwyer

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

The president of the Pentagon Memorial Fund announced yesterday that a groundbreaking ceremony will occur June 15, a huge milestone in the nearly five-year fundraising effort for the 9/11 monument.

About 150 family members and other guests, including Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld, are expected to attend the invitation-only ceremony, which will be held at the memorial site on the west lawn of the Pentagon, James J. Laychak said.

"It is one step toward completion of the memorial," said Laychak, who lost a brother in the attack on the Pentagon on Sept. 11, 2001. "It gets us closer to the vision that I have of all of us family members sitting in a quiet corner at the completed memorial watching everyone enjoying what we helped create."

Laychak said about $10.8 million has been raised for memorial construction. He said the goal is to raise $22 million for construction, which is expected to be completed in September 2008, as well as another $10 million that will be used to maintain the memorial.

The majority of the money to build the memorial has come from private donations, Laychak said. He said the memorial fund got a grant of nearly $1 million from the federal government recently and has asked for $100,000 from the state of Virginia, but that has yet to be approved.

Among those who will attend the groundbreaking are architects Julie Beckman and Keith Kaseman, who won a worldwide competition to design the memorial.

"It is a huge milestone, and I am very excited about it," Beckman said. "It is something that we have been waiting for, and it is timed to go along with real construction that is beginning on the site. We are just thrilled."

The memorial will have 184 cantilevered benches, one in memory of each victim of the terrorist attack on the Pentagon. Occupying 1.93 acres, the memorial will be 165 feet from where American Airlines Flight 77 hit the building.

After the groundbreaking, construction crews will begin removing underground utilities and work on the installation of a system that will supply water for reflecting pools beneath each of the 184 memorial benches.

Laychak said about $3.3 million has been spent for research and development on components and materials.

One challenge has been to come up with a mold for the memorial benches, which will be composed of one piece of super duplex stainless steel, the same material used in the reconstruction of the Statue of Liberty and in catapults on aircraft carriers because of its high resistance to corrosion.

"We have been continuing the prototyping process for the memorial unit, and that has been going very well," Beckman said. "We were back out at the foundry in St. Louis to see five more prototypes that they have been working on . . . to make sure that 184 of them can be made exactly the same."

About 80 paperbark maple trees will shade the memorial. "They were chosen because they have year-round interest," Beckman said. "They are late-turning maples. The leaves change color a little later than the rest of the maples. So when most of the trees in Arlington have lost their leaves, these will still be a brilliant red." She said the trees have cinnamon brown bark, which would contrast with a gray winter.

Kaseman and Beckman, now engaged, were young and unknown New York architects when their design won a competition that had more than 1,000 entries. They moved out of their closet-size studio apartment on the Upper West Side nearly three years ago to an apartment in Old Town Alexandria to work on the memorial.

"For Keith and I, it has been absolutely amazing to work on this with all the people who have been involved so far," Beckman said. "I know this place will help all of the people for whom the healing process is still going on."

Ground Zero (WSJ)

By Debra Burlingame

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

I am an ironworker. I held you in my hands.

I did not know who you were and now I am showered clean . . . yet I still feel dirty. I don't know why, but I feel ashamed. WHO WERE YOU?

-- Anonymous message, left at Ground Zero.

They came and would not leave, an army of ironworkers and heavy-equipment operators, stopping only when the scent-trained dogs barked out a signal. They cut and moved twisted steel and steaming concrete, clearing an astonishing 1.8 million tons in a continuous convoy of trucks and a 20,000-barge armada. The last steel beam, covered from top to bottom with handwritten prayers and messages of hope from those who worked the site, was hauled away in a solemn site-closing ceremony that left grown men weeping quietly. "The Pile" was cleared in eight-and-a-half months. Only then did they go home, different men. Who will tell their story?

The answer depends on whether we believe we have a stake in a future we will not live to see. Today, a handful of people are considering how the history of 9/11 will be preserved for future generations. Will it be scattered all over the globe, eroded by small museums, cannibalized by private collectors, or simply lost forever?

From the giant steel façades that broke but did not fall to the thousands of "Missing" flyers that speak of humanity as no granite monument can; from the harrowing digital footage to the oral histories that provide a mosaic of facts as detailed and compelling as a thousand handmade quilts; these are the pieces that make up our generation's "Day of Infamy." Preserving that history is both the mission and the moral imperative of the World Trade Center Memorial Museum -- if we build it.

The decision lies in one man's hands: New York Gov. George E. Pataki. It is that simple. Advisory councils, stakeholder meetings and a public comment period notwithstanding, if Gov. Pataki agrees with 87% of the respondents in last year's Zogby poll, stating that 9/11 was "the most historic event of their lifetime" that "changed the way Americans live and view the world," then he will step up and mark that history -- or answer to those same people. And he will have one tough time doing it. * * *

The American people, watching the horrific scenes in New York, Virginia and Pennsylvania, voiced nary a peep of dissent when the federal government handed over $21 billion in disaster relief -- $18 billion in rebuilding bonds and tax credits, and $2.8 billion in immediate cash grants -- to the state and city of New York. The desire to raise buildings and bring back neighborhoods and businesses far from their own communities is powerful proof of the generosity of a people whose hearts were broken but whose resolve was not.

The public has heard plenty about the "empty pit of Ground Zero," but most do not know that the $2.8 billion allocated to Lower Manhattan in cash grants has virtually all been spent. It is difficult to trace where all the money went while being routed through the Department of Housing and Urban Development and six different city and state entities. Now, after four-and-a-half years of press conferences, ribbon-cuttings and groundbreakings (the Freedom Tower has had two), at which the lost 343 firefighters were invoked and the memorial and museum was touted as the "centerpiece" around which hundreds of millions of dollars in spending projects would turn, Gov. Pataki and Mayor Michael Bloomberg have teamed up to tell the public that it's time to "rethink" the project where the history of those valiant firefighters will be secured. Not only does this undermine Daniel Libeskind's master plan, which always included a museum of "memory and hope," it also manifests a standard of fiscal responsibility that the governor and the mayor have refrained from imposing anywhere else at Ground Zero.

The Port Authority's massive new transportation hub, designed by superstar architect Santiago Calatrava, will cost an estimated $2.2 billion. Some $2 billion of that is federal money, which means that the entire country is supporting the "awe-inspiring" makeover of a terminal that will serve a mere 40,000 commuters (a number so embarrassing the Port Authority upped it to 80,000 by including round trips). The chief executive of a construction firm involved in the building illustrates the absurdity of what insiders call a "vanity project" by pointing out that $2.2 billion is enough to build a metropolitan airport.

The governor has also handed out hundreds of millions in relief money to corporate powerhouses, ostensibly to get them to relocate to Lower Manhattan or to prevent them from leaving. He signed off on $25 million worth of recovery funds for American Express, which expressly announced it hadn't intended to leave Lower Manhattan and posted doubled profits less than a year after 9/11. Goldman Sachs, which made $4.55 billion dollars in net profits in 2004, received a $2 billion "assistance" package consisting of triple-tax-free Liberty Bonds, tax credits and cash the following year.

Mr. Bloomberg talks about a "sensible" approach to Ground Zero rebuilding, but has declined to fully explain his allocation of $650 million dollars worth of Liberty Bonds to construct the Bank of America tower in midtown, an allocation that competes with downtown redevelopment; or why he awarded $114 million in Liberty Bonds to the Ratner office tower -- in Brooklyn.

The mayor has suggested locating the World Trade Center Museum in the controversial Freedom Tower, declaring it "a good use of that lobby." To put the story of that day in another commercial office tower is an insult to the memory of the 3,000 who died and to the thousands who barely escaped. Would the Holocaust Museum be treated as an afterthought and crammed into such a space? Moreover, why would any commercial tenant be attracted to a building that will be the destination of as many as 20,000 to 30,000 tourists per day?

The mayor's proposal was promptly embraced by New York's cultural elite -- the same folks who were despondent over the loss, last fall, of the International Freedom Center and its slavery exhibits. The New York Times editorial page went so far as to suggest that the 9/11 museum is not really necessary since "most of us remember that day very clearly." The same paper, in contrast, published six hyperventilating editorials last year, telling us that the Freedom Center must be built on sacred ground to provide the memorial with "historical context," albeit one that didn't include a word about terrorism.

Interestingly, the no-museum proponents have uniformly invoked the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington as an example of a simple and appropriate remembrance. While it eventually became accepted as a locus of healing, "The Wall" was controversial when it opened in 1982 in no small part because of its failure to tell the story of the war. Jan Scruggs, founder of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial Foundation, recognizes that when the contemporaries of that war are gone, the 58,000 names carved in granite will not resonate with future generations. To remedy this, he sought and won congressional approval to build a museum that will tell the story of the war and those who fought it.

Ironically, the designer of the Vietnam memorial, Maya Lin, was a member of the World Trade Center Memorial jury and the most vocal advocate of the design that was eventually chosen, Michael Arad's "Reflecting Absence." Like Ms. Lin's Wall, Mr. Arad's design, consisting of reflecting pools and waterfalls with a random listing of 3,000 victims' names, says nothing about how they died or the historic event it is memorializing. Without the museum there will be nothing on the plaza, not even the iconic artifacts, to tell future visitors what actually happened on 9/11.

But let us not get too carried away with comparisons to other memorials. The Vietnam War did not take place on that grassy mall in Washington. Ground Zero is an historic battleground; and of the 2,755 who died there, 1,157 were vaporized without a trace.

The American people intuitively understand what the New York intelligentsia does not. They already stream to Ground Zero in the tens of thousands, signing up for tours to stand and look at the iron fence of St. Paul's Church across the street, now stripped of the faded flags, the personal tokens of remembrance and the hand-lettered messages of sympathy that poured in from all over the world. They shell out countless thousands of dollars for picture books and postcards bearing the images of the twin towers from the ragtag vendors who line the site's perimeter.

It is this humble assortment of Ground Zero entrepreneurs who have shown City Hall's economic development experts that it is possible to blend commerce and commemoration. And the Memorial Museum will help restore a standard of dignity, which will be more about providing a lasting remembrance than making a quick buck. * * *

Yes, the $500 million price tag for the memorial and museum is steep, but the reality is that it was the terrorists who chose the most expensive building site in all the world for the location of their attack. That is where our people died and that is where we must build it -- especially as the cost of not doing so is even higher.

This is an investment in the future that will allow visitors from all over the world the opportunity to see the contrast between those who died to take the lives of strangers, and those who gave their lives to save them. The millions who will make a pilgrimage to Ground Zero will surely enjoy the fine boulevards and piers that their own generosity provided, but the experience they most anticipate is not a frozen latte in Hudson River Park. They want to confront the reality of the day that changed their lives, and the world they once knew.

The World Trade Center Memorial and Museum will commemorate, educate and inspire. It will convey to future generations that we as a people are more than sleek neighborhoods and buildings. That is something our enemies did not understand and should be reflected in everything we do on that much-hallowed ground.

Governor, we're ready.

Ms. Burlingame, a director of the World Trade Center Memorial Foundation, is the sister of Charles F. "Chic" Burlingame III, the pilot of AA flight 77, which was crashed into the Pentagon on Sept. 11, 2001.

Hurricane Mary Still Storms Over Katrina (HILL)

By Jonathan Allen

The Hill, June 6, 2006

In the nine months since Hurricane Katrina bore a hole through the Gulf Coast and triggered cataclysmic flooding in New Orleans, Sen. Mary Landrieu has been battling for more than just cash to rebuild.

"I'm still in a fight to explain," the Louisiana Democrat said during an interview in her seventh-floor Hart Building office suite.

In endless meetings with lawmakers, aides, interest groups and even singer Placido Domingo, she uses color-coded charts, sweeping gestures and Cajun charm to explain the difference between the hurricane and the flood, the biblical-scale damage to her home city, coastal restoration plans, why New Orleans should be rebuilt and why further assistance should not be routed through the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

"It's important for people to understand what really happened, who is responsible, why it happened, so that we can actually fix it," she said.

For Landrieu, villains are easy to identify: President Bush and top White House officials, the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) and House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.). Early on, Hastert suggested New Orleans should not be rebuilt.

"That kind of set us off in a defensive posture when we should have been in an offensive posture," Landrieu said.

Since then, the 50-year-old senator has been the one taking swings. Last year she said on national television that she would punch the president or anyone else who berated local officials. In April, she threatened to hold up Bush's executive-branch nominees until he delivered funding for the Gulf Coast.

But her pugnacity has not stopped her from forming alliances. In March she became the first Democrat in either chamber to support a Republican-written budget since 2004 after securing a promise for more levee money.

Landrieu, now in her second term, met with Senate Republican bulls Ted Stevens (Alaska) and Pete Domenici (N.M.) in the office of Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) to hammer out a deal for her vote.

She says top Senate appropriators Thad Cochran (R-Miss.) and Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) have come to Louisiana's rescue. She also notes the names of senators who dispatched aides to help her staff in Katrina's aftermath, and she singles out Education Secretary Margaret Spellings and Housing Secretary Alphonso Jackson for praise.

'AROUND THE WHITE HOUSE'

Landrieu has not let up a bit in her condemnations of the White House, but she is careful to draw a distinction between the president's inner circle and other parts of the administration, where she has found some of her staunchest allies.

"I just sort of went around the White House and just went directly to their Cabinet people, and some of the Cabinet people really understand what happened and they're really trying to help," Landrieu said. "Margaret Spellings was one of the first to grasp it."

Landrieu and Spellings have found common ground in their support for charter schools, facilitating a strong alliance. Spellings did "everything she could" to put kids in classrooms, a Landrieu aide said.

But other agencies remain in Landrieu's crosshairs, particularly FEMA, which she says should not be the vehicle for federal assistance because it is "dysfunctional."

Landrieu is among those who argue that aid should move directly through other departments and agencies — the Education Department, Housing and Urban Development, the Commerce Department and the Small Business Administration, to name a few — rather than FEMA, which has become a symbol of the federal government's difficulties in handling the problems of the Gulf Coast region.

DOJ_NMG_0032016

"They kept thinking FEMA could do it, FEMA could do it," Landrieu said. "But even on FEMA's best day they couldn't have done it, and FEMA didn't have too many good days."

A SINGULAR FOCUS

Landrieu has other responsibilities in the Senate; she is the ranking Democrat on the District of Columbia Appropriations Subcommittee and a member of the bipartisan Gang of 14 that has played a decisive role in the judicial confirmation process, and her brother just lost a hotly contested Democratic mayoral primary.

But the names of the hurricanes, Katrina and Rita, are seldom far from her lips.

When Placido Domingo visited Landrieu to discuss money for the arts, the opera star instead got a lesson on Louisiana's infrastructure.

"We had spent 30 minutes with this guy, and we had not talked about arts funding," a Landrieu aide said.

The next day, with the Senate out of session, Landrieu and Democratic Policy Committee Chairman Byron Dorgan (N.D.) spent more than an hour interviewing local business owners at a poorly attended hearing titled "An Oversight Hearing on Gulf Coast Reconstruction: Has the Federal Government Left Small Businesses Behind?"

Republican and Democratic aides say Landrieu has been somewhat less involved with issues unrelated to the hurricanes since they hit.

NO APOLOGIES

"If one person criticizes them or says one more thing, including the president of the United States, he will hear from me," Landrieu told ABC's George Stehanopoulos in September. "One more word about it after this show airs and I might likely have to punch him. Literally."

Landrieu maintains that radio talk-show host Rush Limbaugh and others took her line about punching the president out of context, but she says she stands by it.

"I don't regret it at all, and I'd say it again exactly that way," she said. "As a leader, I think you should defend your people, not gloss over their faults. But I'm not going to let anybody talk about the first responders of New Orleans."

The most recent twist in Louisiana's battle for federal aid is a threat by Gov. Kathleen Blanco to delay drilling leases if the federal government does not give the Pelican State a share of the revenue.

Landrieu, who has said she will block energy legislation that does not include a share of federal receipts for Louisiana, supports Blanco's approach but would prefer a legislative fix, according to spokesman Adam Sharp.

"The entire state leadership supports getting our fair share, and each of us does what is within our ability to drive that result," Sharp said in an e-mail.

Clamoring To Come Home To New Orleans Projects (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

NEW ORLEANS, June 5 — Hundreds of displaced residents of public housing have for several days been returning here for the first time since Hurricane Katrina.

They are armed with little more than cleaning supplies and frustration, in an effort to force the city to reopen their storm-damaged apartments.

The city, saying the projects are not ready, has refused.

Outside the largest complex, the St. Bernard Housing Development in the Seventh Ward, tenant groups have organized evacuees into a tent city called Survivors Village. At the C. J. Peete Development in Central City, older residents, mostly women, broke into their old apartments and carted away plastic bags of refuse and ruined furniture.

At the Florida housing complex in the Ninth Ward, residents slipped through fences topped with razor wire to reach their old units. They piled up heaps of debris that lined Bartholomew Street in the shadow of Interstate 10.

In bone-baking heat under a cloudless sky, evacuees traveling from Atlanta, Baton Rouge, Houston and elsewhere fumed at the city and federal housing officials who have opened fewer than 1,000 of more than 8,000 public housing units in a city suffering from a housing crisis and a shortage of workers.

The residents promised on Sunday to gut and rebuild their own units, and they said they planned to be back permanently — with or without the city's permission — as soon as their work was done.

"They're not giving us any help, and we're tired of waiting," a resident, Nickole Banks, said of the Housing Authority. "People want to come home."

Damage to the projects ranged from very little to severe. The Housing Authority says that as many as 90 percent of the apartments are unsafe and uninhabitable and that time-consuming environmental evaluations remain unfinished. To the residents, these are excuses. They fear that city officials are really trying to redevelop the projects to bring in other residents with more money.

That is a move that some city and federal officials say would be desirable. Private developers have openly discussed the possibility of rebuilding some projects to house a much wider range of tenants.

Because private homeowners are being encouraged to return to the same areas, the public housing question has become part of a larger debate about the future of the city's poor population. Does New Orleans intend to make itself a home for them again?

After the storm, many of the most important institutions and services for the poor broke down and were never repaired. Charity Hospital, a historic institution for the poor, remains closed.

The public defender system has been unable to provide lawyers to poor defendants, and public transportation is essentially broke and is providing far fewer rides.

"They're trying to steal New Orleans from us," Phyllis Jenkins, who has been living in Fort Worth, said Sunday outside what used to be her home in the sprawling St. Bernard development. "Well, I will not be displaced anymore. I'll take my home any way they give it to me. It's been 10 months. They've got to know we're serious. We're going to stand here until they let us in our homes."

Local officials have been clear that they do not want to return to the way things were before the storm, when 10 traditional public housing developments concentrated low-income residents in some of the worst conditions in the city, leading to intense crime and drug use.

"We don't need to recreate pockets of poverty," the president of the City Council, Oliver M. Thomas Jr., said. "They don't work. We want more mixed-income, working communities. I think that's really the only way."

Some officials have made remarkably unveiled comments suggesting that the storm did the city a favor in terms sweeping away the poor.

Representative Richard H. Baker, a Republican from Baton Rouge, said just after the hurricane: "We finally cleaned up public housing in New Orleans. We couldn't do it. But God did."

A spokesman for the Housing Authority, Adonis Exposé, said the authority was encouraging private and public partnerships to redevelop the projects, a move that began in limited form before the hurricane.

"We find it has worked out, and we're looking into doing it at a lot of other sites," Mr. Exposé said.

Before the storm, 2,000 public housing units had been demolished to make way for newer, better complexes. That stoked fears among residents of public housing that they were being scattered to nowhere in particular.

That turned out to be the case in the redevelopment of the St. Thomas Project, the largest and most controversial to date. It is now a mixed-income development called River Garden, with a small fraction of the original public housing tenants.

Residents who have been protesting fear more of the same could be in store for them. Some of the poor and their advocates see the lack of action as a delay tactic to diminish the chances that many would return.

The Federal Department of Housing and Urban Development, which took control of the bankrupt local housing authority years ago, says it is continuing to assess the storm damage to the buildings.

"I wish I could say everything's great, come on home," an assistant secretary, Orlando J. Cabrera, said in an interview. "But it's not great. We've got entire parts of the city that have very few services, that have questionable ability in terms of infrastructure. We have to ask the hard question: 'What would these folks do? Can we put people in there?' "

Mr. Cabrera said considerable federal money was available to allow private builders to redevelop public housing in such situations. The Housing Authority has begun to apply for those funds.

Developers have been seeking permission to rebuild the crown jewel of the projects, the Iberville Housing Development, on a coveted location next to the French Quarter. It is a gem of Depression-era buildings, a sturdy assemblage of small-scale town houses with wrought-iron balconies that overlook courtyards and oak trees. The project, barely damaged by the hurricane, continues to house hundreds of families.

Michael Valentino, the managing partner of a hotel group here, and some tenants have proposed knocking down walls to make the apartments bigger, adding public art and fountains, and bringing in some tenants who would pay market-rate rent.

So far, no deal has been made.

"The magic of Iberville is that the architecture is magnificent; it could be beautiful and vibrant again," Mr. Valentino said about the development, which replaced the Storyville red-light district in an early example of slum clearance. "It's a linchpin piece of the redevelopment of Canal Street and the Quarter."

Mr. Valentino and other developers have the support of some tenants like Kim Paul, president of the residents' council. But they have also drawn the ire of another group, Hands Off Iberville, made up of housing advocates and tenants.

Even though she wants to help remake Iberville into something it never was, Ms. Paul complained about how slowly housing officials were letting residents return to the development, the least damaged in the city. She is in the unusual position of standing up for tenants and developers at the same time.

"I can show you that the apartments don't have mold or mildew," she said Sunday as she joined the other protesters at St. Bernard who were eating jambalaya out of plastic cups. "Before we do anything, we're trying to get all the pre-Katrina residents home."

Passers-by on St. Bernard Avenue, a main thoroughfare, generally supported the peaceful protest outside the fenced-in project. A woman from the Uptown section, Cliffie Pettigrew, stopped her truck and said, "I don't know if you folks are supposed to be here or not, but I want to help because I remember how sad I was when I couldn't get home."

"What ya'll need?" she asked.

"Everything," they answered.

Hurricane Season Brings Urgency To Fixing FEMA (HILL)

By Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.)

The Hill (opinion), June 6, 2006

When Max Mayfield of the National Hurricane Center talks, the people in my district listen.

Mayfield has predicted another volatile year, with this hurricane season delivering up to eight to 10 hurricanes, according to the latest predictions of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

While we prepare for the season, which began Wednesday, structural problems remain that plague the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA), the federal agency that delivers aid in the wake of a hurricane and ensures localities are prepared with disaster plans.

There is no doubt in my mind that FEMA's response to the storms of the past two years was hampered greatly — and will continue to be hampered for the coming hurricane season — by the top-heavy government bureaucracy of the Department of Homeland Security.

FEMA does some of its most important work during the initial hours before a storm, when first responders prepare, federal authorities are placed at the ready and residents are given instructions. While local and state governments are the first line of response, much of the planning and work is done by FEMA, which is charged with coordinating federal efforts while complementing the local response. In fact, in years past,

FEMA's role was considered important enough to make its director, until recently, a Cabinet-level position.

But as the federal government reacted to Sept. 11 and viewed most federal services through the prism of terrorism, placing FEMA within the security clearinghouse of the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) seemed to be the right move. Unfortunately, Katrina, Wilma, Frances, Rita, Jeanne, Ivan and Charley have proved that wrong.

By folding FEMA into DHS, we have, in effect, tried fitting a square into a circle. FEMA is charged with responding to natural disasters and emergency situations, while its overseers are more focused, and rightly so, on terrorism.

By placing FEMA in the labyrinth of government agencies housed in DHS, we have put FEMA's priorities in direct competition for attention with our efforts to protect our cities from al Qaeda and to protect our borders. In the process, decisions that once were made quickly and efficiently at FEMA now have to go through a web of paperwork, authorizations and releases before they can be made — adding further risk to people who wait for relief.

We also have diminished FEMA's ability to act autonomously and take charge of a disaster. By making the agency just another department in a huge bureaucracy, we have neutered its ability to take the reins of federal response and handed them off to undersecretaries and assistant secretaries of the Department of Homeland Security.

From our own experience in Florida, we know the importance of strong leadership in dealing with hurricanes. Before and after Hurricanes Charley, Frances, Ivan and Jeanne hit Florida two years ago, Gov. Jeb Bush was in constant contact with local authorities and was swift in his decisionmaking. Law enforcement and first responders were kept informed and knew their roles.

Unfortunately, there was no Jeb Bush in Louisiana, and there were no Rudy Giulianis in New Orleans.

Instead, the buck was passed from local to state and then to federal authorities, many times with the assumption that FEMA had the experience to know what to do. But the sluggish bureaucracy at DHS produced no leaders and left people across the country to wonder who was in charge.

Last year I introduced legislation to sever FEMA from the DHS bureaucracy, returning it to an independent agency. My goal is to allow FEMA to break free from the Washington-style adherence to paperwork and memos in order to make it the nimble, quick-response team that it wants to be.

DOJ_NMG_0032019

Saddled with the bureaucracy of DHS, FEMA's priorities have gotten lost, and we need to place them back at the forefront. I have been encouraged by the support of the idea by Subcommittee Chairman Bill Shuster (R-Pa.), and I have been working to convince others of its merit.

I first called for this before 2004's hurricane season wreaked havoc on our state, but nearly two years of recovery efforts that have been delayed and a frustrating effort to find accountability at FEMA — culminating with its slowed response to Katrina — made me realize we cannot wait.

Unfortunately, I fear these frustrations will only grow for the people of the Gulf Coast area making the transition into the long-term recovery process as the tasks of FEMA remain a source of competing interests within DHS.

Blame for the slow response to Katrina does not rest solely at one level of government. Local officials failed. State officials, especially the governor, failed. The federal government failed. In Congress, we must take these lessons to heart and recognize that change has to happen — and we have to make it happen now, not later.

Foley represents Florida's 16th District, which includes Port St. Lucie and Port Charlotte.

A Foxx In The Luxury World (HILL)

By Jeff Dufour

The Hill, June 6, 2006

One of the most egregious examples of abuse that came to light last year during the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina was displaced people and other victims spending their government-issued debit cards on Louis Vuitton purses and other luxury goods.

And Rep. Virginia Foxx, the grandmotherly freshman Republican from North Carolina, has had enough. Foxx has introduced an amendment, known as the "Louis Vuitton Amendment," to the homeland-security appropriations bill that would specifically restrict that type of misuse of funds.

It reads, quite simply, "None of the funds made available to the Federal Emergency Management Agency in this act may be used to purchase a Louis Vuitton handbag."

Foxx spokeswoman Amy Auth explained that the language is designed to "highlight the abuse that occurred with the debit cards last year so that it doesn't happen again."

A spokeswoman for Louis Vuitton did not return phone calls. Perhaps she's offended that anyone would pay for one of their bags with a debit card. How déclassé!

Image of Bob Casey as Kevin Smith persists

The National Republican Senatorial Committee last week went after Pennsylvania Senate candidate Bob Casey (D) for failing to appear at the annual convention of a group of activist gay Democrats in Pittsburgh.

Howard Dean, Democratic Party chairman, appeared at the Stonewall National Convention on Saturday.

"As the Senate prepares to vote on the Federal Marriage Amendment, Silent Bob is ducking an appearance before a gay-rights group," NRSC spokesman Dan Ronayne said in a statement. "The fact that Casey Jr. is having Howard Dean stand in for him speaks volumes about his political courage. When given a chance to stand up for something, Casey Jr. comes up empty again."

It's by no means the first time that Republicans have tagged Casey, who's challenging Sen. Rick Santorum (R), with the "Silent Bob" moniker, reminiscent of the recurring character Kevin Smith plays in his films.

The name began to stick during the confirmation hearings for Justice Samuel Alito, when Republicans pressed Casey to say whether he supported the judge.

After Casey won the Democratic primary, even NRSC Chairwoman Elizabeth Dole (R-N.C.) got in on the act, saying, "Now that the general election is under way, maybe it's time for 'Silent Bob' to articulate his positions."

Casey spokesman Larry Smar said the nickname is childish.

"Santorum's allies are resorting to childish name calling because they have no accomplishments to talk about and rather focus on divisive issues."

Obama turns tables on Colbert

After Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) gave the keynote address at the 2004 Democratic National Convention and won election to the Senate, he was asked to give the next year's commencement address at tiny Knox College in Galesburg, Ill.

This year the college invited Comedy Central's mock newsman Stephen Colbert. So Obama decided to have a little bit of fun with him.

In a statement released late last week, Obama told Colbert, "I'd like to welcome you to our state. As you know, I was invited to speak at Knox after my keynote address at the 2004 Democratic National Convention and subsequent election to the United States Senate. Your convention speech must also have gone really well to have been invited. It's weird that I didn't read about it somewhere.

DOJ_NMG_0032020

"Before you deliver your remarks in front of literally millions fewer people than you would at say, a nationally televised political convention, I'd like to offer you a few words of advice. First, I know you're fond of your Peabody Awards, whatever those are, but I'd recommend not bringing them. The students at Knox are down to earth and not impressed by material possessions like my Grammy Award for best spoken-word album."

At the close of the release, Obama's staff assures readers that it was intended "completely tongue-in-cheek. … Colbert has had so much fun with members of Congress on his show that we decided it was our turn."

By most accounts, Colbert's speech went over well. His advice for graduates? Get a TV show. "It pays well," he said. "The hours are great, and you have fans. Eventually, some nice people will give you an honorary degree for doing jack squat."

Colbert also used his speech to come out against slavery. "I just hope the mainstream media gives me credit for the stand I've taken today," he said.

Beer, wine take center stage tonight

It's going to be a boozy night on the House floor, with two resolutions celebrating the nectar of the gods.

First, Rep. Sherwood Boehlert (R-N.Y.) brings forth a resolution commending American craft brewers.

A bit late for American Craft Beer Week, which ended May 21, the bill nevertheless recognizes that "American craft brewers promote the nation's spirit of independence through a renaissance in hand-crafted beers … for the enjoyment of the citizenry." Indeed.

Boehlert represents the Matt Brewing Co. in Utica, N.Y., which brews Saranac beers.

Then it's on to H. Con. Res. 399 by Rep. Mike Thompson (D-Calif.) recognizing the 30th anniversary of the victory of United States winemakers at the 1976 Paris wine tasting. That event, known as the "Tasting Heard Round the World," put American wine on the map, as California red and white wines bested the best French wines in a blind test by wine experts.

It should be noted that the anniversary tastings, held in Napa Valley and France on May 24, yielded the same result. So take that, Monsieur Chirac.

Coble wakes up to 'Idol'-atry

In surely the most controversial elimination of the season, Chris Daughtry of McLeansville, N.C., was voted off "American Idol" in the third-to-last round. Now his congressman, Rep. Howard Coble (R-N.C.), apparently goaded by his staff and constituents, is finally crying foul over the results.

"Most people know that my musical tastes run more towards bluegrass," said Coble, "but we were proud of Chris for finishing so strong on 'American Idol.' I was told by many people, including some of my own staff, that he should have won the doggone thing."

Late last month, Coble placed a statement in the Congressional Record in which he argued that "with no disrespect intended toward this year's winner, Taylor Hicks, most people think this year's American Idol should have been Chris Daughtry. … While I will not call for Congress to investigate this Idol election process, those of us who reside in the 6th District of North Carolina will always be convinced that our guy really won — sort of like fans of Al Gore in 2000."

Then this past Saturday, at a rally and mini-performance before 1,200 supporters Daughtry received a copy of the statement.

Coble isn't a total "Idol" neophyte — he noted that Fantasia Barrino, the winner of the show's third season, is also a native of the 6th District of North Carolina.

Daughtry recently turned down an offer to become lead singer of the band Fuel.

Issa: No love lost for Gonzalez

"We have the power to impeach the attorney general," Rep. Darrell Issa (R-Calif.) said last week as the House Judiciary Committee held a hearing on the FBI's search of Rep. William Jefferson's (D-La.) Rayburn office.

A member of Congress musing on the impeachment of a Cabinet member of his own party would be inflammatory enough, but Issa wasn't done.

When asked by a radio reporter for Capitol News Connection what he made of Alberto Gonzales's threat to resign over the Jefferson imbroglio, Issa was nothing if not direct. "Don't let the door hit you in the ass," he said.

Hard Lesson Learned At Red Cross (USAT)

By Bill Nichols

USA Today, June 6, 2006

PRENTISS, Miss. — In the torrid temperatures that mark the start of the steamy Mississippi summer, the biggest safety threat to the parched landscape of Jefferson Davis County at the moment is fire.

DOJ_NMG_0032021

But on a recent morning under a cloudless blue sky, several dozen people gather to hear Charlie Conerly, the county emergency management coordinator, talk about hurricanes and how this county needs the Red Cross to help it prepare for a new season of storms.

"Were any of you ready when Katrina came?" Conerly asks the room in general. No hands go up. "That's what I thought," he says. "That's why we're here."

The efforts in Prentiss to be better prepared as hurricane season gets underway present a telling microcosm of lessons learned by the national Red Cross after its much-criticized performance in the onslaught of Hurricane Katrina last year.

The charity was stung by complaints, including in a congressional report, of supply shortages, poorly run shelters, inadequate phone and computer systems and a lack of outreach to rural areas. But interim President and CEO Jack McGuire says the American Red Cross now has far-reaching reforms in place.

McGuire says the Red Cross will have more resources, a streamlined process to get aid to victims, a vastly expanded communications network and a new effort to reach out to Prentiss and communities like it. Prentiss has no Red Cross chapter and waited days for help when hundreds of evacuees arrived after Katrina.

He acknowledges that the response to Katrina sullied the image of the Red Cross. "Our surveys indicate that our image is not as good as we were before Katrina and not as bad as we were in January," McGuire says.

"We would prefer to be back to where we were pre-Katrina, but we have to earn that. We'll earn that by showing what happens in the next hurricane season."

At the South Central Mississippi Red Cross chapter, which is headquartered in nearby Hattiesburg, Executive Director Janice Vannatta is working long hours to translate McGuire's rhetoric into results.

A "spontaneous volunteer" during Katrina who has since been hired to run the chapter, Vannatta attended the preparations meeting in Prentiss and hopes to have at least two Red Cross shelters ready in coming weeks. Prentiss had no shelters when Katrina hit.

During Katrina, conditions in Prentiss "were horrible," says Spencena Hinton, the new Red Cross liaison with county and city officials in Prentiss. Hinton says Jefferson Davis County was swarming with evacuees from the Gulf Coast while it tried to deal with serious damage from the storm.

Charles Reid, president of the county Board of Supervisors, says a common complaint was that once the Red Cross got teams to the county, its aid programs had few controls.

"People got money who didn't need it," Reid says.

Vannatta, whose staff of five covers nine counties, listens to the complaints while keeping a nervous eye on the calendar.

As hurricane season begins, 40,000 Federal Emergency Management Agency trailers remain on the Mississippi Gulf Coast. Vannatta's fear: Even a mild storm will force people living in those trailers to evacuate. And key roads north from Mobile, Ala., New Orleans and the Mississippi Gulf coast all lead straight through Hattiesburg.

Some of Vannatta's efforts to be ready for this storm season:

·More shelters. Vannatta hopes to have 20 shelters ready, up from eight last year.

She's also following Washington's lead in trying to partner with churches, schools and community organizations to open shelters that can give residents of poorer and more remote areas faster help.

·Pre-positioned supplies. The South Central Mississippi chapter gave out 553,000 snacks or meals last year. Vannatta is lining up vendors to get more supplies earlier.

·Communications. The chapter plans to use handheld radios so shelters can communicate with one another and headquarters. Virtually all communication was cut off during Katrina.

·Volunteers. The chapter has more than doubled its volunteer base since Katrina. More than 100 volunteers were trained in a single event on April 1.

·Preparations. Vannatta has sent basic information home with schoolchildren to emphasize the message that residents need to be ready to survive on their own for 72 hours after any disaster.

And there's a special outreach program to the thousands of new Hispanic residents in Hattiesburg — most of them storm-repair workers — says the Rev. Tommy Conway of St. Thomas Catholic Church.

For the first time, hurricane warnings on local TV will be in both English and Spanish, Conway says.

In Prentiss, Conerly and Vannatta promise residents that as hurricane season begins, this year things will be better.

"We're going to make this easier than it was last time," Conerly says. "But it's not going to be perfect. We're human beings."

GAO Urges Better Tsunami Warnings (WP)

By Matthew Daly

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0032022

The federal and state governments need to improve warning systems before a deadly tsunami strikes the West Coast, a new study says.

Modern technology is able to detect the formation of a tsunami fairly quickly, but the United States lacks a robust warning system and detailed knowledge on the impact a tidal wave could have on coastal areas, the Government Accountability Office says.

In a report issued yesterday, the GAO, the investigative arm of Congress, warns that false alarms may have lulled West Coast residents into an inaccurate sense of security. Sixteen tsunami warnings issued since 1982 were not followed by destructive waves on U.S. shores, the report says, "potentially causing citizens to ignore future warnings."

The report urges that the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration develop "loss estimation" software for tsunamis similar to those available for hurricanes or floods so officials can predict how severe a potential storm would be.

The stakes are high, the report notes. While the United States has not been hit by a severe tsunami in more than four decades, experts say a destructive Pacific-wide tsunami is all but inevitable.

The report was issued 18 months after the 2004 South Asian tsunami, which killed more than 216,000 people in 17 countries. Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), who requested the report, said it indicates that California and other states are at risk of a catastrophic tsunami, "and we are ill-equipped to deal with the threat."

The United States needs a warning system that can protect its most vulnerable communities, as well as software to determine where a tsunami is most likely to hit and do the most damage, Feinstein said.

"We've seen the danger. Now is the time to respond," she said.

Rep. David Wu (D-Ore.) said the GAO report confirms his belief that programs focused on local warning systems and educating the public are key to protecting against a tsunami.

"We cannot prevent earthquakes and tsunamis, but we can prepare for them and ensure the citizens of our coastal communities are safe and secure," Wu said.

"After witnessing the devastation following the Indonesian tsunami, there is no excuse for the federal government to be this far behind on coastal preparedness and making sure Americans have enough time to get to safety," Sen. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) said. She called for the House to approve a Senate-backed bill aimed at improving tsunami detection and warning systems, providing tsunami preparedness tools, and developing "inundation maps" for affected areas.

Congress appropriated more than $17.2 million last year to enhance tsunami warnings and protection, including repair of malfunctioning tsunami-detection buoys.

GAO Deems U.S. Unprepared For Tsunami Disaster (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

Tsunami warning systems for West Coast states are ineffective and several local agencies are not prepared for such a disaster, the Government Accountability Office said in a report released yesterday.

Although the National Weather Service issues timely warnings, alert systems cannot transmit to some coastal areas, the report said.

"This shortcoming was highlighted in June 2005, when an actual tsunami warning for the west coast was issued but signal problems prevented the warning from reaching portions of the coasts of Washington and Oregon," the report said.

In addition, the report said, all 16 warnings issued since 1982 have been false, which has created an apathetic public.

Parts of Northern California, Washington, Oregon, Alaska, Hawaii and the territories of the U.S. Virgin Islands and Puerto Rico "face the greatest tsunami hazard," while the Gulf Coast is "relatively low-hazard," the report said.

The GAO recommends updated maps and more community participation in the National Weather Service's TsunamiReady program. Participation is low "because of community perceptions of a low tsunami threat and perceived high cost versus benefit."

The Indian Ocean tsunami of December 2004 killed nearly 250,000 people in 13 countries. The disaster raised concerns about U.S. vulnerability and the ability of communities to detect and warn of an approaching killer wave.

The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA), which oversees the National Weather Service, has agreed to GAO recommendations such as reducing the number of false alarms, periodic testing of the warning system, encouraging high-risk communities to participate in TsunamiReady, and developing mapping software with the Federal Emergency Management Agency and other government organizations.

Homeland Security Department officials, however, say FEMA does not have the "funding or the staff resources" to assist NOAA.

The West Coast has suffered the most destruction from tsunamis because of Pacific earthquakes in the South America and Aleutian regions. In 1960, an earthquake in Chile generated a tsunami that caused more than $1 million in damage in California. A 1964 earthquake in Alaska created a tsunami that killed 12 in the San Francisco Bay area and caused $15 million in destruction. Within two minutes of that earthquake, more than 100 Alaskans were killed.

Distant earthquakes have created tsunamis that have hit Oregon and Washington, but it is the 750-mile-long Cascadia subduction zone 50 to 100 miles off the coast of these states that has scientists worried.

"Geologic and other records from a Cascadia earthquake in 1700 suggest that the fault could generate a tsunami wave of up to 30 feet that would likely reach the Oregon coast in 15 to 30 minutes, raising concerns of a catastrophic future event," the report said.

WAR NEWS:

U.S. Commander To Review Haditha Report (AP)

By Frederic J. Frommer

AP, June 5, 2006

The No. 2 American general in Iraq will soon review a preliminary criminal report into the alleged massacre by Marines of Iraqi citizens in Haditha, a congressman just back from Iraq said Monday.

Rep. John Kline (news, bio, voting record), R-Minn., one of four House members who traveled to Iraq over the weekend, said the lawmakers discussed the investigations with Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the second-ranking U.S. general in Iraq. Kline said it was unclear when the report would be released.

"General Chiarelli expressed some concern in that he did not want to sign off an investigation until he felt like he had all of the information that he needed" from the Naval Criminal Investigative Service, said Kline, a former Marine. The investigative service is probing whether crimes were committed in the killing of two dozen Iraqis last November.

A senior defense official told the Associated Press last month that evidence points to unprovoked killings by the Marines involved. A separate probe is examining whether there has been a coverup of the incident by the U.S. military.

The four House members who visited Iraq took issue with comments made by Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who complained that coalition forces have shown "no respect for citizens, smashing civilian cars and killing on a suspicion or a hunch."

"The prime minister has a platform and a pulpit now that he may not have had in the past," said Rep. Mike Conaway, R-Texas. Conaway said with that platform comes "responsibility to be very careful and to choose your words very carefully."

Kline said his group was told that U.S. military officials and embassy staff had told al-Maliki that his comments were not helpful.

Kline also said Iraqi generals told the U.S. lawmakers that they were frustrated about the slow pace in filling the new Iraqi government's security posts, saying it was hindering the training of the Iraqi military.

"The generals were very candid with us," he said. "There's no question that they understand that until you get a functioning ministry of defense, until you get a functioning Pentagon — Iraqi Pentagon — they're not going to be able to reach their full potential."

On Sunday, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice expressed confidence that Iraqi leaders will be able to fill key security posts in the next few days while downplaying recent sectarian violence.

Rice, who appeared on three television news shows, said of the vacant security posts, "Of course, they need to get this settled, but they will get it settled. When they get it right, and they will get it right, everybody will forget how long it took them."

An Iraqi parliament session was postponed earlier Sunday after al-Maliki again failed to reach consensus on candidates to head ministries that run Iraq's military and police.

Also Sunday, the top U.S. military officer pledged a thorough investigation in the alleged massacre at Haditha, acknowledging that the charges have raised concerns among Iraqi officials and in the United States.

Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said it is not clear exactly what happened last November when as many as two dozen Iraqis were killed during a U.S. attack in Haditha. Still, he said it was important not to rush to judgment.

"You don't want to have the emotions of the day weigh into the process," Pace told The Associated Press in an interview Sunday. "We need to stick with our judicial process. We want to be sure that it moves forward without any influence."

Rice appeared on "Fox News Sunday," CBS's "Face the Nation" and CNN's "Late Edition."

For U.S. Troops, It's Hard To Know Who Is Friend And Who Is Foe (KRT)

By Tom Lasseter

Knight Ridder, June 5, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0032024

MUSAYYIB, Iraq - Air Force Staff Sgt. Justin Cremer listened carefully as Army Capt. Irvin Oliver described the upcoming mission. They'd raid a compound of houses the next morning; a map was sketched on the ground in chalk lines of yellow, blue and white.

Oliver looked at the soldiers bunched around him and reminded them that aerial photographs had showed at least 17 people in the compound the night before, and that they were looking for just one - an insurgent cell leader suspected of orchestrating roadside bombs that'd killed American soldiers.

Be careful, Oliver told his men, not to get shot. And be careful, the company commander said, not to shoot any unarmed civilians.

Despite those warnings, last Thursday's mission would serve as a reminder that counterinsurgency is among the most complex forms of warfare, and sometimes the wrong people are killed.

While outrage gathers over the reported killings of 24 civilians by U.S. Marines in the western Iraqi town of Haditha, U.S. military units such as Oliver's Delta Company quietly go about the daily task of patrolling a very complicated battlefield.

As part of the 2nd Brigade Combat Team of the U.S. Army's 4th Infantry Division, Oliver's soldiers are responsible for an area south of Baghdad where there are Sunni Muslim insurgents who kill U.S. soldiers, Shiite militiamen who kill Sunni families, Sunni insurgents who kill Shiite Muslim families, and an assortment of smugglers and criminals.

Most Iraqis are caught in between, just trying to make it to the next day.

Cremer's job on this mission was to make sure that Oliver, 31, from Sierra Vista, Ariz., and his men had the clearest possible picture of the line between friend and foe. He is, in military jargon, a Joint Terminal Attack controller - the front line of the U.S. Air Force. Cremer (pronounce CRAY-mer) rides into missions with Army soldiers and, by watching real-time video streamed down from F-15 and F-16 fighter jets, looks for insurgents on the run and signs of civilians caught in the crossfire.

The 29-year-old from Modesto, Calif., can call for a barrage of 500-pound bombs, and he can call for illumination rockets to be sure innocents aren't killed.

It's often a gray line, said Staff Sgt. Francis Lott, who works with Cremer.

"They (the jets) look for anything suspicious, but everything's suspicious around here," said Lott, 25, of Clarkesville, Tenn. "It's a big game of hide and seek. You're fighting people where you can't tell who's who. You can't tell the good guys from the bad guys in Iraq."

The convoy rolled out of its forward operating base just after 1 a.m., a line of tanks, Bradley Fighting Vehicles and Humvees.

As the tires and tracks crunched across the ground, dirt flew in the night air, making it hard, for a moment, to see the headlights. The air was cooler than the afternoon had been - around 110 degrees - but it was still hot.

Cremer was talking with a pair of F-16 pilots and a surveillance plane higher up. He cradled a receiver in each ear, going over the final details of the mission.

As they got closer to Musayyib, a small group of Humvees, including Cremer's, peeled off and rode into town. They were going to pick up a truckload of Iraqi police who hadn't been told about the operation in advance because of fears of insurgent sympathizers in the police force.

Insurgents have left their mark in the town: A suicide bomber blew himself up next to a fuel tanker last July, killing almost 100 people in a shower of fire and shrapnel.

Less than five minutes after arriving at the police station, Cremer got a call on his radio: "Be advised, the lights just went off in that area."

The pilot, watching the insurgent leader's compound, had seen every light in the group of houses get turned off.

Cremer shook his head. "These (expletive) - someone made a phone call," he said, motioning toward the police station.

The convoy left, a pickup truck of police now with it.

A few minutes later, the tanks blocked the road in and out of the compound. A sniper team set up in the distance. The Bradleys began to rumble toward the houses.

The buildings, separated by a couple of courtyards, were in a thick grove of palm trees, where a series of dirt roads ran parallel to canals fed from the Euphrates River. The dirt roads would make it easy for insurgents to dig a hole and plant a roadside bomb. The palm trees would provide better cover for insurgents trying to escape.

The Bradleys stopped and soldiers began to pour out.

The light of Cremer's computer flickered in the darkness, and he stared at the video feed, in which dark spots - soldiers - circled and entered the buildings.

It looked, he said, "like a video game."

The radio crackled with a report of one shot fired, then a second, third and finally a fourth. Soldiers called in as they cleared rooms of the seven houses. They'd come in expecting about 17 people; there were 27.

DOJ_NMG_0032025

Time passed. Cremer kept watching the screen. The radio squawked: Two men and a woman were dead. The details were vague. A soldier had seen the woman and said he thought she had a rocket-propelled grenade launcher on her shoulder.

A sergeant's voice boomed on the radio: "I need to know what the (expletive) that rocket (expletive) ended up being."

Cremer called in for illumination rockets, and the white balls bounced in the air, turning night to day. The soldiers didn't find a rocket-propelled grenade or its launcher. They scoured the compound and found only two AK-47 assault rifles, common in Iraq.

The insurgent leader wasn't there. The soldiers detained a man who intelligence reports suggested was an associate.

Cremer and the rest of the convoy didn't get back to the base until after 5 a.m. They ate breakfast, did some paperwork and then passed out in their bunks.

At the mess hall later that day, Oliver said he would have to return to the compound to give the family compensation payments for the woman and probably for the two men as well, depending on whether intelligence officers determined they were insurgents.

Oliver wasn't looking forward to the trip.

Cremer's boss, Capt. Jason Earley, said there would be plenty more missions to come - bringing the chance to stop insurgents who've killed and maimed innocents, but also bringing the risk of killing the innocents themselves.

"We're trying to give these people freedom, which I think is an incredibly noble thing," said Earley, 32, of New Buffalo, Mich. But, he added, "it's complicated."

Photographs Show a War Beyond Investigations

The Iraq war is the first major conflict fought in what might be called the age of the new Panopticon. The English philosopher Jeremy Bentham coined the term in the late 18th century to describe a prison in which the guard tower was in the center of concentric rings of cells, allowing authorities to exercise an "invisible omniscience." Although the word emerged in the context of prison reform, it has become more suggestive over the years, capturing something essential about power and authority, from Big Brother's pervasive surveillance to the more benign notion that government is always "looking into" things. But the new Panopticon is a digital phenomenon, a world of instant cameras, cellphone snapshots, e-mailed photographs, a world that produces a nonstop, immediate and ubiquitous visual record of itself -- and it is breaking the government's monopoly on omniscience.

Again and again throughout this war, amateur photographs have exposed the flaws of the military's carefully constructed image of discipline. Photographs made Abu Ghraib a symbol of shame throughout the world. And photographs and video images are again undermining the military's cherished reputation for calm under fire and heroic self-restraint.

The most horrifying images are not published or shown on TV, though they're easy to find on the Web. But the ones we are confronted with are bad enough: A small child, a victim of a devastating and controversial U.S. airstrike in Ishaqi, is dressed in baby-blue, his eyes are closed, and his tiny, gently clenched hand rests by his side. He might be asleep, except that the photograph, which ran in Newsweek, shows a mangled, bloody arm next to him. The unidentified, shredded limb (does it belong to yet another child?) reaching into the center of the image might well stand for all the rest of these photographs that prick the conscience: They seem to come from the margins of our attention, they reach in and put their bloody imprint on a war that we wish had more innocence and calm to it.

The military has concluded that there was no U.S. wrongdoing in the March 15 Ishaqi attack that left the child dead.

They are not so certain about two other incidents, the killing of a disabled Iraqi man in Hamdaniyah on April 26 and the deaths of 24 Iraqis in Haditha on Nov. 19. Both are under investigation, and photographs and video from both have begun to circulate. In the Hamdaniyah case, we know there are graphic images of a man wrapped in plastic sheeting -- a see-through shroud that has become a grisly visual marker of the ongoing conflict. Neighbors and family say the man, who has four bullet holes in his face, was dragged from his house and shot by U.S. soldiers. Eight American servicemen are under investigation.

In Haditha, the range of images is wider: bodies wrapped in rugs; bodies bundled in white cloth and tied into neat, ghostly packages; and bloody, bloated faces emerging from stiff folds of transparent plastic, rather like Rodin's deathly Balzac looks out from his small cave of draping metal.

Hands and feet of the living -- bystanders, onlookers, witnesses to the silence of the dead -- often frame the images. These strange, anonymous additions to the picture -- disembodied appendages -- suggest humanity at a standstill. They suggest an impotence among Iraqi civilians that is heartbreaking.

The U.S. military is still looking into the Haditha killings. It's also looking into the possibility of a military coverup, which kept the killings under wraps for half a year.

DOJ_NMG_0032026

Photographs are immediate. Investigations are by necessity methodical and often slow. These two different senses of time -- the immediate and the methodical -- are now in troubling conflict. A dead child cries out for immediate response; the military investigates. We see photographs of men doubled over with grief, tear-stained faces, mouths contorted in pain, and the pang is instant; the military investigates. A boy standing next to the bodies of his family or friends looks up at his elders with a blank stare on his face, an image that puts death and childhood in excruciating proximity; the military investigates.

Photographs may play an important role in some of these investigations. But it is the degree to which the photographs exist in a world of their own, apart from the military's cautiously worded statements, that is increasingly perplexing. Throughout the war, the notion of two realities has dogged the warmakers. Is the president living in a world of good news and progress and missions accomplished, while our soldiers and the Iraqi population live in a world of chaos and death and uncertainty? Are the media presenting a world of antiseptic images, bloodless and vague, mere suggestions of a carnage they know all too well but dare not make explicit to the public?

Investigations are meant to create closure. But photographs, which can circulate forever, keep death and destruction open. Investigations are also meant to assure us that the war waged in our name is being fought with some measure of precision and dignity, but as photographs (and incidents) accumulate, and as investigations linger and overlap one another, they begin to lose their moral force. Investigation, a word meant to reassure us that the government is always "looking into" itself, is itself now subject to the blur that makes the nightly news coverage of Iraq seem like a tape loop.

And the only image that fades, as the war grinds on, is the one with which we prepared for battle: the fantasy, so beloved of Americans, of a clean, surgical, decent war.

Marines In Iraq: The Warriors' Way (LAT)

By David J. Danelo

The Los Angeles Times, June 6, 2006

ON APRIL 6, 2004, Cpl. Jason Howell, a Marine squad leader who had arrived in Iraq three weeks before, was enduring his baptism of fire in what later became known as the "first battle of Fallouja." Howell, who had not eaten in 18 hours or slept in 36, was running on nothing but adrenaline. His dehydrated spittle, caked around the side of his mouth, was dirty white. Kneeling on a roof, he saw a flash of movement. An Iraqi child put his face out the window.

Exhausted, Howell found himself unable to process the Arabic word he had learned for "stop." Without thinking, he screamed. The child pulled the curtains as Howell automatically raised his weapon to shoot. Then Howell blinked. An instant later, clarity returned to his thoughts. The corporal, who was in his first of what would become many days of combat, had almost shot an innocent.

"I don't know exactly why I didn't pull the trigger," said Howell, who now serves with the L.A. County Sheriff's Department. "It all happened so fast. It was a combination of training, instinct and luck."

As the furor grows over allegations that Marines killed 24 Iraqi civilians last November — including women and children — the origins of Howell's discipline are worth examining.

The Corps is the smallest of the United States' military services, and it also has the highest enlisted-to-officer ratio (about 10 to 1). Because of this, a much higher level of responsibility is placed on corporals and sergeants, or noncommissioned officers. In each Marine infantry battalion, which is the primary combat element, an average of 60 noncommissioned officers lead squads or a unit of similar size. As squad leaders, they assume responsibility for the lives — and split-second decisions — of about a dozen men.

Marines are legendary for their monastic devotion to the warrior ideal. The mottos inked on their bodies — Death Before Dishonor, Make Peace or Die, Always Faithful — function as physical scriptures for their choice of religion, like scapulars, phylacteries or "What Would Jesus Do?" bracelets. The ancient Spartans, who sacrificed at the battle of Thermopylae to defend the Greeks from the Persian onslaught, are venerated as saints within the Corps. The Spartan Way is a stoic faith.

SINCE THE FALL of 2001, 26 active duty and nine Marine Reserve infantry battalions have rotated into and out of Afghanistan and Iraq as units for seven-month tours of duty. As new recruits join a battalion, seasoned noncommissioned officers either gain rank toward senior billets or leave the Corps for civilian life. Although the exact numbers remain classified information, unit casualty reports suggest that about 50 separate rotations of Marine infantry battalions have been tested in combat over the last four years.

Using those statistics as a bare minimum, at least 3,000 corporals and sergeants have served combat tours as infantry squad leaders. Not to mention hundreds more who cut their teeth as combat replacements, convoy security escorts, translators, intelligence collectors or instructors for the new Iraqi army. When the histories are written, we will learn that the exact number of young Marines thrust into positions of leadership — amid an international media spotlight — is actually much higher.

Several Marines have already been convicted in the court of public opinion in the Haditha case. As military investigators evaluate these allegations, those on the sidelines should avoid castigation of an entire system because of the errors of a few. Consider the rush to judgment of 2nd Lt. Ilario G. Pantano, who was charged with murder at an April 2004 checkpoint shooting, or the nameless Marine in a Fallouja mosque who was seen on video killing an insurgent thought to have been booby-trapped. Both were eventually exonerated of all charges.

Responsible critics of the Iraq war say that we misappropriated U.S. military resources in making an unnecessary choice to topple Saddam Hussein's regime, a choice that has plunged young soldiers and Marines into the amorality of a protracted counterinsurgency. But placing too close an association on the Haditha massacre with the war's politics ignores the thousands of troops who have navigated the chaos and still made the right decisions.

Accuracy in the application of deadly force is the foundational creed for any who protect and defend their society. Discerning combatant from innocent is the greatest challenge for all who have engaged in this kind of war. Like spiritual perfection, the warrior ideal is often an impossible thing to fully achieve. But as we condemn the handful who have backslid in their pursuit of the Spartan Way, we should not forget to esteem the thousands who, like Cpl. Jason Howell, have kept their honor clean amid Iraq's insanity.

Uniformed Gunmen Kidnap 50 In Baghdad (USAT/AP)

By The Associated Press

USA Today, June 6, 2006

BAGHDAD — Gunmen wearing police uniforms kidnapped at least 50 people Monday during a brazen daylight raid on bus stations in central Baghdad.

Lt. Col. Falah al-Mohamedawi, an Interior Ministry spokesman, said the gunmen arrived at midmorning in the Salihiya business district, where several transportation companies are based and where buses pick up passengers bound mostly for Jordan, Syria and Lebanon.

Witnesses said the attackers blocked roads leading into the area before grabbing people seemingly at random. The gunmen beat the captives before putting bags over their heads and herding them into more than a dozen vehicles.

“They took all the workers from the companies and nearby shops,” said Haidar Mohammed Eleibi, who works for Swan Transportation. He said his brother and a cousin were among those taken, along with merchants, travelers, passersby and even street vendors selling tea and sandwiches.

“They did not give any reason for it,” he said. “Police came afterward and did nothing.”

Another transportation worker, Amjad Hameed, said that as the attackers began seizing people, “we asked them why, but nobody replied.”

The Shiite Muslim-dominated Interior Ministry, which oversees the police, has been accused of backing militias in sectarian violence. It denied that its officers were behind Monday's attack. Most of the workers in the area that was raided are Shiites.

Al-Mohamedawi said at least 50 people were abducted.

In other Iraq news:

·Mustafa Salman, a 30-year-old Iraqi, was sentenced to life in prison for his role in the kidnapping and killing of aid worker Margaret Hassan, Iraq's criminal court said. Two other defendants were acquitted.

Hassan, 59, a citizen of Ireland, Britain and Iraq, had headed CARE International's operations in Iraq since 1991. She was abducted in October 2004 and killed a month later. Her body has not been found.

·In southern Iraq, a bomb went off near an Italian patrol Monday night, killing one Italian soldier and wounding four, Adm. Gianpaolo Di Paolo announced in Rome.

·The chief judge in the trial of Saddam Hussein said Monday that four defense witnesses have been jailed on suspicion of perjury. That drew accusations from defense lawyers that the court was trying to intimidate witnesses.

Three of the witnesses testified last week that some of the 148 Shiites that Saddam and his seven co-defendants are accused of killing are still alive, defense lawyer Najib al-Nueimi told the Associated Press. The fourth told the court that chief prosecutor Jaafar al-Moussawi tried to bribe him to provide false testimony against Saddam.

In Brazen Roundup, 56 Vanish From Baghdad (WP)

By Nelson Hernandez And Salih Saif Aldin

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0032028

BAGHDAD, June 5 -- "Turn back," a friend told Haji Abu Shamaa as he walked Monday morning toward his money-changing shop in the Karkh neighborhood of central Baghdad, a mile north of the heavily guarded Green Zone. "The Interior Ministry police are rounding up people."

But Shamaa walked on, right into a swift, coordinated operation unfolding within sight of Iraq's Ministry of Justice. Gunmen in police uniforms and ski masks had cordoned off the street and were swiftly shoving captives, four or five at a time, into a dozen waiting pickup trucks. Fifteen minutes later, the trucks were gone, and so were 56 people.

The roundup displayed all the signs of an unrelenting kidnapping epidemic in Baghdad. Since the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, more than 400 foreigners have been abducted in Iraq, but thousands more Iraqis have been snatched from the streets, often by people wearing knockoff police uniforms that are easily purchased at local markets.

Many people, like Shamaa's friend, believe the kidnappers are actually police. Usually the hostages are held for ransom. Sometimes they are killed because of their faith or ethnicity.

The fate of the 56 people was unknown Monday night. But the scale and audacity of the operation were unusual even by the capital's lawless standards.

The gunmen seized workers from several bus companies that offer transport to Syria and Jordan, witnesses and police said. Others of those taken were passengers aboard the buses: Syrian businessmen going home, a handful of Palestinians, Iraqis. Many Iraqis are leaving their own country precisely because it is the sort of place where a trip to the bus stop can end with being led away at gunpoint.

Shamaa said he was intent on returning to his office, to rejoin his son, Alaa, and thought the police wouldn't arrest him -- he hadn't done anything wrong, he reasoned. Then he saw a dozen pickup trucks, two of them with machine guns mounted in their beds, and none with any license plates.

A man in a camouflage police uniform and a ski mask -- an article commonly worn by police in Baghdad-- stopped Shamaa, saying he would shoot him if he didn't turn back.

"I haven't done anything," Shamaa recounted explaining to him. "I just want to go to the bank to get some money, and I'll be gone."

The man let him pass. Shamaa went into the bank, and watched the scene unfolding through the window. He said he saw gunmen entering the Mohammed Ugaili Transportation Co. across the street. He saw the owner, Jasim Ugaili, and his son being forced into one of the pickup trucks with the butts of rifles. Shamaa saw his own son, Alaa, with them, his hands tied behind his back.

Shamaa rushed outside to save his son. Another man with a rifle blocked his way.

"What, do you want to join him?" the man threatened. Shamaa turned back. And the trucks drove off.

Police Col. Adel Younis said guards at the Ministry of Justice shot at the kidnappers, but couldn't stop them. Another witness, Hussein Ali, said he had seen a police car drive up to the scene, only to be driven off by gunfire and shouted warnings from the kidnappers that they were from the Interior Ministry's intelligence section.

Younis said the incident is under investigation. A police major who came on the scene after the attack said the men were not with the Interior Ministry, a witness said.

Raids like this one only increase popular mistrust of the police. Sunni Arabs often accuse the Interior Ministry police, dominated by Shiites, of conducting a terror campaign against them, or at least looking the other way as Shiite militias associated with political parties do so. But police say the attacks are carried out by criminals wearing police uniforms. At the same time, they counter that Iraq's major insurgent organizations are led by Sunnis and that a tough response is required.

Monday's kidnappings did not appear to be motivated by sectarian rivalry, a witness said. "Among the passengers were Syrian businessmen, about five or six of them," Hasan Falah said. "There were also some passengers from Diwaniyah" -- a predominantly Shiite city south of Baghdad-- "and other parts of Iraq. There was no question of Shiite or Sunni because it was a whole mixture."

That suggested that the people were simply taken for ransom, a lucrative business that has grown rapidly since U.S. forces overthrew Saddam Hussein's government in 2003.

A group of Shiite students in a neighborhood of southern Baghdad, kidnapped in another roundup on Monday, did not have the option of paying their way out.

In Abu Dashir, a Shiite neighborhood south of Dora, the volatile southern section of Baghdad, gunmen posing as drivers lined up a set of minibuses as if to offer rides to central Baghdad, a police officer said. Fifteen students from Abu Dashir got aboard.

The drivers and their accomplices killed them -- where the murders happened is unclear -- and threw their bodies off the side of the Dora highway.

Abduction statistics are unreliable because many families do not report crimes, fearing the police as much as they do the kidnapping gangs.

But every so often, kidnappers are brought to justice. On Monday, an Iraqi court sentenced an Iraqi man to life imprisonment in connection with the killing of Margaret Hassan, an Iraqi-British aid worker kidnapped in 2004. It is believed to be Iraq's first trial of a suspect accused of the abduction or murder of a foreign-born civilian since the U.S.-led invasion.

Hassan, originally from Ireland, married an Iraqi engineer and lived in Iraq for more than three decades before becoming an Iraqi citizen. At the time of her kidnapping in October 2004, she headed Iraqi operations for the CARE International charity. She was abducted on her way to work in Baghdad. She was presumed murdered about a month later, after her captors released video messages of her appealing for the withdrawal of British forces from Iraq. Her body has not been found.

Also in Baghdad on Monday, the defense team in the trial of Saddam Hussein protested the arrest of four of its witnesses. Defense attorneys charged that some of them were beaten by Iraqi guards.

The chief judge said they were jailed on suspicion of perjury last week after testifying that they had seen the chief prosecutor offering money and unspecified fake documents in exchange for testimony. One of the witnesses also claimed that some of the 148 Shiites from the town of Dujail who were allegedly killed on Hussein's orders were still alive.

As Iraq Violence Worsens, Security Remains Elusive (LAT)

By Megan K. Stack And Saif Rasheed

The Los Angeles Times, June 6, 2006

BAGHDAD — Clad in camouflage uniforms, the gunmen came peeling through the thick morning heat in police trucks. They stopped at a downtown strip of travel companies where Iraqis gather each morning to board buses bound for the safer lands of Syria and Jordan.

The gunmen leaped to the ground, witnesses said, and they worked fast. They seized more than 50 bystanders, pulling men away from their families and hauling drivers from behind the wheels of the buses. They handcuffed the men, blindfolded them and stuffed them into the backs of the trucks like human loot. They covered some of their captives with sheets.

And then they were gone, slamming doors and speeding off into the brilliant morning sunlight. It was only 9 o'clock in a city where security has come unraveled, just another mundane scene that splintered suddenly into violence.

"Those are criminals going after the ransom," said Saad Tawil, a 42-year-old manager of one of the travel companies clustered on the street in downtown Baghdad. "They will see who is important or rich, and who is not, after interrogating them."

But other mass kidnappings that have struck the capital this year remain unsolved. In some cases, the victims have never turned up, living or dead.

The mass kidnapping came one day after Prime Minister Nouri Maliki was forced to concede that Iraq's warring factions were too mutually distrustful to agree on who should run the security services. Having suspended indefinitely a parliament vote on those key ministries, Maliki has left the army and police leadership dangling in a vacuum at a time when bloodshed in Baghdad, and across Iraq, has spiraled upward.

In Baghdad, leaving home to work, shop or visit family has become an increasingly dangerous proposition. Violence rears up without warning; residents navigate a citywide obstacle course of roadside bombs, shootouts and security checkpoints.

The city just had its most murderous month since U.S.-led forces invaded the country in 2003, new Iraqi government documents indicate. More people were shot, stabbed or otherwise violently killed in May than in any other month since the invasion, according to Health Ministry statistics. The figure does not include slain soldiers or civilians killed in bombings, on whom autopsies are not usually performed.

Last month alone, 1,398 bodies were brought to Baghdad's central morgue, the ministry said. All over the city and out into the provinces, corpses surface on a daily basis in garbage dumps, in abandoned cars or along roadsides. They often bear marks of bondage and torture.

The attacks are frequently characterized by their brazen nature. Gunmen climbed onto a Baghdad bus Monday and killed at least two Shiite students, an Interior Ministry source said.

Over the weekend, masked gunmen set up a roadblock north of Baghdad, stopped a passing bus and ordered the men to disembark. Dividing the Sunnis from the Shiites, they told the Shiites they were "traitors" who would be killed on religious principle, a witness told the Associated Press.

The assailants shot their victims execution-style. When they were done, 24 passengers were dead. Most of them were teenage university students and elderly men.

Although much of Iraq's bloodshed is carried out for sectarian reasons, there are plenty of criminals simply angling for cash in a lawless land. Kidnapping fellow Iraqis has bloomed into a popular moneymaking scheme.

DOJ_NMG_0032030

Monday's mass kidnapping took place in a bustling, shabby commercial district in downtown Baghdad. The site is relatively fortified: It stands just a stone's throw from the Justice Ministry, amid a network of Iraqi police checkpoints.

The gunmen's vehicles roared to a stop on a road lined with the offices of travel agencies and bus line operators. Salihiya is a neighborhood of transit and escape, the last stop many Iraqis make in their flight from a war-ravaged homeland.

The buses leave Baghdad in the morning — the crushing heat of day is deemed preferable to the perils of riding through the desert at night. The roads to the border run through Sunni-dominated Al Anbar province. Buses are periodically stopped and looted, their passengers killed. For many Iraqis, boarding the bus is yet another gamble — they've grown used to weighing out a certain amount of risk in their daily lives.

Some of the Iraqis who bought tickets Monday didn't get out soon enough. Along with passengers — who presumably carried money and could afford to leave the country — office workers from the transit companies and bus drivers, some of them Syrian, were also grabbed by the assailants. At least one boy who eked out tips for toting suitcases was snatched up and carted off, witnesses said.

Transit worker Hamza Mohammed, 34, said he took off running when the gunmen arrived. They fired at him but missed, he said.

"They shouted at me and they tried to take me," he said between puffs of cigarette smoke and telephone calls from Iraqis eager to book a seat on a future bus. "But I fled."

Witnesses said the kidnappers were outfitted in the uniforms and vehicles used by some of the special forces of the Iraqi police, overseen by the long-troubled Interior Ministry. Police units under the ministry have been accused of working as Shiite death squads on a campaign to eliminate Sunni Arab men. Police have also been accused of kidnapping civilians for ransom.

On Monday afternoon, a special forces commander issued a statement denouncing the kidnapping and insisting his men were innocent. But in a city where the highway patrol is accused of forming death squads and paramilitary fighters are believed to have infiltrated state security organs, witnesses were not convinced.

"I accuse the police," said a travel office owner who would give only his last name, Ghanem. "The cars were definitely police cars."

Minor Figure In Iraqi Kidnapping Gets A Life Sentence (NYT)

By Sabrina Tavernise

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq, June 5 — A judge imposed a life sentence on Monday on a man who apparently played a minor role in the kidnapping of Margaret Hassan, a British-Iraqi aid worker whose disappearance and death showed that no one was immune from insurgent viciousness.

The verdict, the first in a kidnapping of a foreigner in Iraq, brought an inconclusive end to the case of Ms. Hassan, 59, who was abducted on her way to work in Baghdad in October 2004. Two other men were acquitted and a sheik suspected of having played an important role in the kidnapping has eluded arrest.

The kidnapping of Ms. Hassan, the director of CARE International in Iraq who had dedicated her life to helping the country's poor, stunned Iraqis and opened a more dangerous era for foreign nationals working here. In one enduring image from a grainy video broadcast on television, she was seen crumpled and pleading. Her body was never found.

Judge Saab Khorshid of the Central Criminal Court sentenced Mustafa Muhammad Salman al-Jibouri, a man associated with a Sunni mosque in central Baghdad, to life in prison, a British Embassy official said. The charge, according to an Iraqi lawyer who watched the trial, was aiding and abetting: Mr. Jibouri held Ms. Hassan's purse after she was abducted, though he said he did not know whose it was at first.

The spasm of violence in the capital continued Monday, with armed men dressed as police commandos seizing 24 people in Salheya, a bustling commercial district in the heart of the city that is dotted with bus companies that take travelers to Syria and Jordan. Families of those who were seized, including bus owners, riders and a kebob seller, formed an impromptu demonstration and demanded their release.

"What happened today is a catastrophe, something unnatural," said one of the relatives on the Iraqi evening news here.

Security in the capital has deteriorated precipitously in recent months. Increasingly brazen assassinations torment neighborhoods and no longer seem to follow any obvious patterns. In May, the Baghdad morgue recorded the highest number of bodies received since the beginning of the war: 1,375, approximately double the toll of May 2005.

The surge in killings comes as Iraqi political leaders remained deadlocked for a seventh week over the most important positions in the Iraqi cabinet, the ministers of defense and interior. The stalemate has left Iraq rudderless when it most needs a full government.

"It's a real problem," said Mowaffak al-Rubaie, the national security adviser, who said a new security plan for Baghdad cannot begin until the ministers are in place.

The trial in Ms. Hassan's killing, which was completed in only two and a half hours, went virtually unnoticed by Iraqi television outlets, and raised more questions than it answered. The testimony connected Ms. Hassan's kidnapping to a mosque in Jadriya, a leafy neighborhood of university professors in central Baghdad, and the sheik who presided there, identified by defendants as Hussein Ahmed Salman al-Zobai.

The sheik had given Mr. Jibouri, a resident of Madaen, an angry Sunni Arab town south of Baghdad, Ms. Hassan's purse and identification cards in a plastic bag for safekeeping, according to Shawkat al-Samarrai, an Iraqi lawyer who watched the trial.

Mr. Jibouri, who denied he played a part in the kidnapping, said he looked inside the purse two months later and discovered it belonged to Ms. Hassan. The sheik, who had moved to Jamiya in western Baghdad, an area dominated by insurgents, said he would come to collect it, but never did, Mr. Samarrai said.

Two other men, Mohsin Ahmed and Qasim Muhammad, identified by The Associated Press as a guard and a worshiper from the mosque that figured in the case, were acquitted. It was not clear from the testimony what happened to the sheik, but some participants in the trial said that he had fled, according to Mr. Samarrai. Court officials were not available for comment on Monday afternoon.

In a frustrating tale of missed opportunities and painful waiting, Ms. Hassan's husband, Tahseen Hassan, took the stand on Monday. In a calm voice, he spoke of the ordeal of losing his wife, beginning from the morning of her disappearance on Oct. 19, 2004.

She left the house at 7:30 a.m., he said, according to Mr. Samarrai, riding with her driver and bodyguard in her Toyota Camry to her office in Quthat, a neighborhood on the edge of Jadriya. Two hours later, her secretary called Mr. Hassan and told him his wife was missing. The driver, an Iraqi, and the guard, an Egyptian, had been badly beaten.

In the days after his wife was abducted, Mr. Hassan received several telephone calls — her relatives said on Monday that four were made from her cellphone — from people he did not know, asking for the numbers of the British Embassy in Baghdad, and of Ms. Hassan's office.

Shortly after that, a caller who identified himself as Abu Mustafa reassured him that his wife was doing well, and proposed a meeting in the Shiite neighborhood of Kadhimiya. Mr. Hassan said he went there with the Iraqi police, but that the caller never showed up. Abu Mustafa later called back, according to Mr. Samarrai, and asked Mr. Hassan why he had come with the police.

In a statement released in England on Sunday, Ms. Hassan's family accused the British government of contributing to her death by refusing to negotiate with her kidnappers.

"The hostage-takers demanded to speak to a member of the British Embassy, but Tahseen had been told by the British that they would not speak to the kidnappers," said Ms. Hassan's siblings — Deirdre, Geraldine, Kathryn and Michael Fitzsimmons. "We believe that the refusal by the British government to open a dialogue with the kidnappers cost our sister her life."

In an interview with the BBC on Monday, Deirdre Fitzsimmons said that the last phone calls were made on Nov. 7, and that Mr. Hassan was essentially left on his own by an unhelpful British government.

"I don't think he knew what to do," she said. "He did the best he could. After all, this was a man in a house on his own, his wife had been taken hostage, he had seen terrible videos of her. He was really left on his own with this advice."

A spokeswoman for the British Embassy in Baghdad said: "Our thoughts are with her family."

Typical of the breakdown in the capital, confusion prevailed late into the evening in Salheya, where the 24 people were taken Monday. The head of the commandos said his forces had not been in the area, but an official in the Interior Ministry said that a special police unit, possibly from the Ministry of Transportation, might have conducted the raid.

One witness, who runs the Tiger Bus Company, said the armed men blindfolded the people they were leading away and fastened their hands with plastic ties.

"I knew that if they will take me, that means I am dead," said the man who asked that his name not be used out of safety concerns. "We knew this was the end. We ran out the back."

In other violence, Iraqi television reported that one Italian soldier had been killed and three others wounded by a bomb in southern Iraq. Two students were killed in the southern neighborhood of Dawra, part of a spate of recent killings of students, an Interior Ministry official said.

Iraqis Believe Violence Will Abate, New Report Says (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0032032

Attacks and casualty levels against civilians and military personnel in Iraq have risen "substantially" since the December elections, but Iraqis have confidence the new Baghdad government will improve the situation, according to the Defense Department's quarterly report to Congress.

"The formation of the new, permanent Iraqi government that addresses key sectarian and political concerns could help reverse the attack trend," states the report, which measured progress in Iraq through May.

Although the report states that since the bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra, attacks have increased against rival sectarian groups and populations, it says that al-Qaeda "has been unsuccessful in driving Iraq to civil war [although] Sunni and Shia Arab reprisals elevated the level of violence throughout this period."

Anthony H. Cordesman, who holds the Arleigh Burke chair in strategy at Washington's Center for Strategic and International Studies and has closely studied the Iraq insurgency, yesterday criticized the new Pentagon report as presenting "a fundamentally false picture of the political situation in Iraq, and of the difficulties ahead." He said it "does not prepare the Congress or the American people for the years of effort that will be needed even under 'best case' conditions and the risk of far more serious forms of civil conflict."

Saying "only the U.S. government has the resources and access to information that provide a comprehensive overview of the situation," Cordesman added, "The American people and the U.S. Congress need an honest portrayal of what is happening, not lies by omission and 'spin.' "

For example, he notes the poll of Iraqis' confidence in their new government's ability to improve the situation is described as a "nationwide survey" with no explanation of who was polled and how. He also points out that despite the increase in sectarian killings and the failure to form a government after the elections, the number of Iraqis with doubts hardly changed.

Cordesman said the report "highlights real problems with crime and militias and the importance of sectarian, tribal and ethnic violence," but he took issue with the Pentagon assertion that 90 percent of the suicide bombings in Iraq are carried out by al-Qaeda terrorists, saying, "This may be what some want to believe, but there is no validation."

Afghanistan Under Siege (WT)

By Tulin Dalogl

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan. -- The pictures of the anti-U.S. riots last week in Kabul show the immense contradictions of Afghanistan. Monday's riot, triggered by a traffic accident involving an American military truck, was the worst since the fall of the Taliban. The next day, however, was absolutely calm, illustrating how impossible it is to predict anything that will happen in Afghanistan. Hikmet Cetin, NATO's senior civilian representative, says the riots did not accurately express either the level of anti-American sentiment or the people's attitude toward foreign influences.

"There were different elements in that demonstration," Mr. Cetin said in an interview. "They were angry against their government, too." He said it is clear to him that the Taliban knows it is militarily overmatched by the NATO forces preparing to take control in Afghanistan.

"The Taliban [leaders] understand they cannot fight with our military face to face, so they started to use roadside bombs, IEDs and suicide bombers," Mr. Cetin said. "They are trying to give the impression that there are two powers in this country: the government and the Taliban. They are sending [a] message [to NATO]: don't come, we will kill you."

A native of Turkey, the only Muslim country in NATO, his service in Afghanistan is crucial. Afghans remember the days of Mustafa Kemal Ataturk, the founder of modern-day Turkey, and Emanullah Han, and how Ataturk helped them build numerous Afghan state institutions. Dr. Rifki Kamil Urga, who Ataturk sent to Afghanistan, built the first medical school.

Mr. Cetin's personality is also crucial. He's a Muslim representing NATO, but to preserve relations he needs to appeal to the Afghan people. He's not only an official; he is also very popular even among ordinary Afghanis. On days of upheaval like Monday, people ask him what to do, and they learn from him the lessons of how to govern their country.

What's more, when a former warlord told Mr. Cetin that his community needed a mosque, he replied, "No, you need schools." He is exactly right to try to show Afghanis what their priorities should be as they learn how to navigate governing and their established religious institutions. Alas, the literacy rate in this country is less than 40 percent -- needless to say that the female literacy rate is around 14 percent.

The day after the riot, Mr. Cetin hosted a dinner at his residence for more than a dozen members of the Afghan Parliament. "The day two Canadians were killed in Kandahar, [Canada's] Parliament decided to extend its stay for another two years," he told the assembled group of parliamentarians on Tuesday. He noted that Canadian, Dutch and British forces will be doubling the number of troops in the Taliban's stronghold in the south. The move will change the rules of engagement for NATO forces. And it also proves, Mr. Cetin says, "[w]hen NATO commits itself, it acts decisively."

Mr. Cetin says he is sure that NATO will defeat the Taliban. But he believes it requires more than military effort. The world should help Afghanistan to stand on its own as a sovereign, independent country, he says.

Some at the dinner raised some thought-provoking points. M. Daoud Sultanzoy, the head of a parliamentary committee on the economy, said that because the West had defeated the Soviet Union, Western powers should be well-versed in valuable psychological warfare tactics, and he questioned why that knowledge is not being employed against the Taliban. Obviously, the answer is not an easy one until security conditions have been improved and economy driven infrastructure and industries start to show a presence in the country.

"Any country could have problems. Any country may lack some institutions. And they may take steps to correct it," Mr. Cetin told me during the interview. "But in Afghanistan, in the beginning of 2001, there were no state institutions. There was no government, no governance, no military, no police, no public administration." Because that infrastructure is only beginning to be conceived, much less implemented, "NATO can not fail in Afghanistan," he said. "That will be the end of NATO. Then we can't succeed anywhere." He also reminded the group of what NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said: "If we don't go to Afghanistan, Afghanistan will come to us -- as a terror, as a drug trafficker."

Even with the monumental challenges, everyone accepts that Afghanistan has changed remarkably for the good since 2001. "It reminds me the place where I grow up," said Mr. Cetin, referring to his birthplace of Lice, Turkey -- an area where the Kurdish citizens make up the majority and little infrastructure or mechanisms for governing exist.

He acknowledges that putting together the institutions of government and statehood, along with educating the people, will take a long time. But he refused to compare Afghanistan and Iraq. "There is no deep ethnic and religous division in Afghanistan like there is in Iraq," he said.

Many Afghans Lost To Hazards Of Childbirth (WP)

By Pamela Constable

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

SHEIKHABAD, Afghanistan -- According to Afghan tradition, children are the fruit of heaven. The more each couple produces, the greater the blessing; hence the country has one of the world's highest birthrates. If an infant dies, village tradition says, another will come along soon. If a mother dies giving birth, it is the will of God.

But according to international studies, Afghanistan is also one of the most dangerous places in the world to be born or to deliver a child. In a recent report, the U.S. charity Save the Children found that Afghanistan has the world's second-highest rate of newborn deaths, 60 per 1,000 births, just below Liberia. It also found that one in six Afghan mothers -- 20,000 a year -- die during or after childbirth.

Safia, an illiterate villager of about 30, has survived several pregnancies, but just barely. Last month, she arrived at physician Roshanak Wardak's clinic in this town 50 miles west of the capital carrying a 3-week-old baby.

The child was thin and weak, because Safia could neither produce milk nor afford to buy formula.

Her previous child, a boy, had nearly died at birth. Safia was in labor for two days and nights, she said, with no way to travel from her village. By the time she finally reached a hospital two hours away, she had to have an emergency Caesarean section, and both she and the baby were hospitalized for a week.

"My husband was away working. I couldn't reach him, and no one else would help me," she said. "I was having terrible pains, but the baby would not come. Later the doctors told me it was because I worked so hard during my pregnancy, lifting water buckets and other heavy things. They told me not to have any more children for three years, but now I have this new one."

Although Afghanistan has had a stable, Western-backed government since late 2001 and foreign donors have since spent tens of millions of dollars to improve health care, conditions still conspire to sabotage the chances of healthy and normal births.

"It's really as bad as it can get and still sustain a population," said Linda Bartlett, a physician and maternal and child health officer for UNICEF in Kabul, the capital.

Many parts of Afghanistan are harsh and remote, with bad roads, few clinics and little ability to attract skilled health workers. Village girls are often married by 15 and urged to produce a child each year. About 85 percent of Afghan infants are born at home, without even a trained midwife in attendance.

If complications arise, families may not recognize the danger signals and end up wasting precious time deciding what to do. The mother, in protracted labor or losing blood, may have to be carried or put on a donkey for several hours to reach a road leading to a hospital. By then, it may be too late to save her or the child.

"The worst problem is lack of skilled staff. In some provinces, there are no female health workers at all," said Nadra Hayat, director of maternal and infant health at the Public Health Ministry in Kabul. Delivering babies is traditionally done in Afghanistan by women, and many families do not want male doctors to treat their wives or daughters.

Even when foreign donors offered to increase the government's monthly salary for doctors from $40 to $1,000 for those willing to work in arid, isolated southern provinces, Hayat said, "the living conditions were so bad that no one wanted to go."

According to Bartlett, health care has improved significantly in some provinces, with new clinics built and staffed in large towns. The problem, she said, is at two extremes: remote regions where medical help is dangerously scarce, and urban areas where hospitals can barely keep up with the population boom.

In Kabul, the main maternity hospital, Malalai, is hard-pressed to keep pace with the crush of deliveries resulting from a wave of returning refugees that has tripled the city's population since the U.S.-led invasion in late 2001. The staff delivers 80 to 100 babies every 24 hours, and most new mothers are discharged the same day to keep enough beds open.

Doctors and nurse-midwives said that since the end of Taliban rule and the influx of foreign aid, the hospital has made major improvements. Infection rates have fallen sharply, and new diagnostic equipment has been donated. In the past 15 months, fewer than 10 patients have died.

"Some things are much better. We used to do 10 deliveries with one pair of gloves," said Safia, a nurse-midwife who has worked there for 35 years.

Still, conditions are far from ideal. Basic supplies often run out. Patients may be asked to privately purchase such items as intravenous drips. When patients arrive with severe bleeding, doctors often take up a collection to buy plasma from other hospitals.

With doctors in short supply, Afghan and foreign aid agencies have focused on increasing the quantity and quality of midwives. Until recently, many were unskilled women who did little more than cut the umbilical cord. If the mother started hemorrhaging or the birth was obstructed -- the two leading causes of maternal mortality here -- there was little they could do.

In the past three years, a U.S.-funded program has trained hundreds of community midwives, and a national midwives association has been formed. The number of trained midwives has increased from about 500 to 1,500, and many are working in remote regions with high rates of infant and maternal deaths.

"It is a real revolution," said Pashtun Afzer, the association's president. "These women are so committed. They want to be competent. They know the danger signs and the causes of bleeding. Some rural people were afraid to go to strange clinics, but these are women from their own areas, so the people trust them."

Bibi Ashrafi, a midwife in her fifties, has delivered more than 1,000 babies in Wardak province. She said most village families still prefer home births because they don't want to expose their wives or daughters to unfamiliar doctors.

"I only carry a bag with a scalpel, soap, gloves and clean cloths," she said. "I am very careful. I wash my hands eight times before and after the birth, I sterilize my scissors, and I make sure the placenta is not left inside. If the mother is doing well, I feed her a soup of sugar and oil and flour, and then I leave."

In the past, Ashrafi said, many women died giving birth, and their families would say it was "God's decision that her time had come." But three years ago a clinic opened in the area and she received some training. Now, when a mother is bleeding heavily after the birth, she has a place to send them.

"It's great we have a clinic now, but the problem is with the people," she said. "They are so concerned about privacy that they don't call me until a woman has been bleeding for three days. I tell them to space out the births, but they want to have as many children as possible. I tell them that is bad for the mother's health, but they don't want to change."

A few miles away, outside Wardak's clinic in Sheikhabad, several dozen women huddled on the ground, their swollen bellies hidden under billowing burqas . All were illiterate. Many had histories of multiple miscarriages, problem deliveries or babies born early and weak.

Wardak said she opened her clinic after the winter of 1996, when 40 women died giving birth in the district. Even now, she said, many pregnant women live so far up in the barren brown hills that they can barely get to her door, let alone endure another two-hour ride to the hospital in Kabul if they have labor complications.

"Some villages are eight or nine hours away, and the cars charge extra because the roads are so bad," she said. "I haven't lost a patient in nine years, but we have women traveling from one district to another with labor pains, trying to find help. Sometimes, on the way, the babies die inside them."

Senators Seek Better Defense Imagery (WP)

By Walter Pincus

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

The Senate Select Committee on Intelligence wants to expand the mission of the nation's imagery intelligence agency so that it can provide U.S. forces on the ground with laptop computers that display still pictures and video of what may lie over the next hill.

DOJ_NMG_0032035

"New products including full-motion video and ground-based photography should be included with available positional data [such as maps] in National Geospatial-Intelligence libraries for retrieval on Defense Department and intelligence community networks," the Senate panel said in its report on the fiscal 2007 intelligence authorization bill.

"The committee wants troops to be able to dial up what the route ahead will look like and where potential ambush points may be," said John Pike of GlobalSecurity.org, an expert in satellite- and ground-based intelligence. He said digital still photos taken by military attachÃ©s and Special Forces teams that have slipped in and out of potential target countries such as Iran and North Korea as well as video footage taken by unmanned aerial vehicles (UAVs) have been collected for years, but have not been integrated into the main data libraries maintained by the National Geospatial-Intelligence Agency (NGA).

"The NGA's current library of geospatial products reflects its heritage -- predominantly overhead imagery and mapping products," the committee wrote in its report. "While the NGA is beginning to incorporate more airborne and commercial imagery, its products are nearly devoid of FMV [full-motion video] and ground-based photography," it added.

The panel's solution is to give the director of national intelligence authority to direct the NGA to "analyze, disseminate and incorporate" into its national system "likenesses, videos, or presentations produced by ground-based platforms including handheld or clandestine photography taken by or on behalf of human intelligence collection organizations."

The new visual materials would be available along with traditional mapping data for retrieval by mission planners and troops in the field. "The route to and from a facility or photographs of what a facility would look like to a foot soldier -- rather than from an aircraft -- would be of immense value to our military personnel and intelligence officers," the report said.

Sensitive to the unique roles played by human collectors, including Special Forces teams and clandestine CIA operatives, the report made clear that the NGA's new mission would not give the agency authority to "manage or direct" the collection or set the technical requirements for "handheld or clandestine photography." The human collection agencies would also control the classification of their photography as well as how and to whom it is distributed.

Instead, the panel encouraged the NGA, whose database includes the exact location of where images are taken and the timing, to work with the other collection agencies so their data can easily be retrievable from the National Geospatial data libraries.

Pike said, however, that technical difficulties exist in finding ways to integrate the new collection into the NGA data libraries. "Lots of still-camera imagery does not have time and place stamped into it as do the satellites," he said. He also noted that full-motion videos, where a UAV can be traveling 100 mph, creates a problem in stamping locations so viewers know the start and finish of the target.

An NGA spokesman said the agency does not comment on pending legislation such as the Senate intelligence committee's version of the authorization bill. But the NGA has been making changes in its databases over the past few years. More commercial imagery has been purchased and some video from UAVs such at the Predator and Global Hawk have gone into the system.

Last December, Director of National Intelligence John D. Negroponte gave the NGA responsibility for overhead, non-imagery infrared and space-borne collectors of measurement and signature intelligence, which involves sensors that, among other things, gather signs of chemical, electronic, nuclear or other radiations emitters.

The NGA also has linked elements of its group with the National Security Agency, whose satellites and ground-based facilities collect electronic messages. Negroponte recently praised this step as "linking our nation's 'eyes and ears.' "

In a presentation last September, retired Lt. Gen. James R. Clapper Jr., the head of the NGA, described his view of "geointellingence" as seeking to answer such questions as "Where am I? Where are the friendlies? Where are the enemies? Where are the noncombatants? Where are the obstacles, natural and manmade, and how do I navigate among them? And what is the environment?"

Clapper, who became director of the NGA in 2001 when it was still the National Imagery and Mapping Agency, plans to retire this month.

Ex-Ashcroft Aide Blasts AG Gonzales (LAW)

It's not often you see one of former Attorney General John Ashcroft's aides publicly criticize the current Justice Department. But that's exactly what former Ashcroft spokesman Mark Corallo did last week when he submitted an affidavit bashing the DOJ for issuing subpoenas to two San Francisco Chronicle reporters who wrote articles about the BALCO steroid investigation based on leaked grand jury testimony.

In supporting the reporters' motion to quash, Corallo accused Justice's leadership of violating long-standing departmental policies that discourage subpoenaing reporters except in certain circumstances "where immediate action is required to avoid the loss of life or the compromise of a security interest."

"I just saw an egregious abuse of power," says Corallo. "There seems to be this attitude at [the DOJ] that just because the law says we can, we will."

Corallo, who now runs his own public relations company, has some clients who likely didn't mind him taking a swat at his old employer. He's been retained by Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, the securities class action firm indicted by the Justice Department last month. He's also served as spokesman for Karl Rove, the presidential aide under scrutiny by DOJ Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald in the investigation into the leak of CIA agent Valerie Plame's identity. That case, of course, may hinge on the degree to which reporters are compelled to cooperate with prosecutors and defense lawyers.

Corallo, however, says his client list didn't affect his decision to jump into the BALCO matter. "None of my clients had any idea that I was doing this," he says. Regardless, his move will likely burn bridges with some fellow Republicans at the DOJ.

His affidavit offers implicit criticism of not only Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, but to others with authority over the decision, including Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, Criminal Division chief Alice Fisher, and Public Affairs Director Tasia Scolinos. Firing back, DOJ spokesman Brian Roehrkasse says Corallo "may not have been aware of all of the facts" of the BALCO case.

Pentagon IG Nominee Goes To Senate (AP)

AP, June 5, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) - Assistant U.S. Attorney David Laufman is President Bush's pick to be the Pentagon's chief overseer of internal investigations.

The White House on Monday sent the Senate Laufman's nomination for inspector general at the Defense Department.

If confirmed, Laufman would replace Joseph E. Schmitz, who resigned last September to become chief operating officer for the Prince Group, a division of Blackwater USA, which provides security services to troops in Iraq and around the globe.

The inspector general is the principal adviser to the secretary of defense for matters relating to the prevention of fraud, waste and abuse in the Defense Department.

Laufman, who received a bachelor's degree from the University of Pennsylvania and a law degree from Georgetown University, is assistant U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia.

Before that, he was chief of staff for the office of the deputy attorney general at the Justice Department. Earlier in his career, he was investigative counsel for the House Ethics Committee.

Does DOJ's Privacy Advocate Have Enough Tools For The Job? (LAW)

By Jason Mclure, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 6, 2006

From spying on domestic-based international phone calls without a court warrant to reportedly obtaining the phone records of tens of millions of customers of AT&T, BellSouth and Verizon, the federal government appears to have made safeguarding Americans' privacy a low priority.

So it may come as a surprise to learn that the Justice Department -- the agency responsible for defending such programs -- has a top official charged with making sure the agency doesn't violate Americans' rights while pursuing terrorists. Jane Horvath became the department's first full-time chief privacy and civil liberties officer in February.

But her powers are limited and, in the view of a number of privacy advocacy groups, negligible. Unlike privacy officers in Europe and Canada, she has no power to subpoena federal law enforcement officials with knowledge of alleged privacy or civil liberties violations. Nor can she report independently to Congress.

"I tend to think it is window dressing," says David Sobel, general counsel of the Electronic Privacy Information Center. "The creation of a position like this within DOJ is a matter of [the department] paying lip service to the very real privacy problems that arise from their activities."

And, in fact, Horvath herself says she has no intention of taking a confrontational approach or acting independently of Justice's leadership in defending privacy rights at an agency that has vigorously defended the National Security Agency's domestic spying and whose own investigators are increasingly circumventing federal courts to collect personal information on American citizens.

In an interview with Legal Times, Horvath says she sees herself as an adviser who can work behind the scenes to ensure privacy concerns are heard by top officials. "People have to see you as someone helping to structure a program to be effective," she says. "Me, by myself, screaming and yelling, I'll get nowhere."

Horvath's job was created in January under a provision of a Justice appropriations bill to help counterbalance sweeping new investigative and data-collection powers granted to the FBI and federal prosecutors since the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks. The position was modeled on the Department of Homeland Security's privacy officer, a four-year-old post that privacy advocates have also criticized as being insufficiently independent.

"A privacy officer fundamentally is operating with values inconsistent to the department. ... It takes a unique and combative personality to do well in a job like that," says James Harper, a privacy law expert at the Cato Institute. "In the end, I think it will be the role of the chief privacy officer to apologize for their agencies, rather than act as a privacy advocate internally."

GRAPPLING WITH BIG BROTHER

Horvath disagrees and says she and her four-lawyer office will be able to effectively steer policy at the 110,000-employee Justice Department. "I don't view myself as an apologist," she says. Nor does she want the authority to subpoena witnesses or compel testimony from Justice officials, as some Democrats on Capitol Hill have proposed. Such powers would isolate her from DOJ decision makers, Horvath says, adding that any investigative responsibilities are best left to the department's inspector general.

"I think it would be such a mistake," she says. "If you give me subpoena power, you're going to pigeonhole me off into another room."

Horvath, 42, comes to the job from the consulting firm Privacy Laws & Business, a U.K.-based company that advises U.S. companies on complying with Europe's more stringent privacy laws. From 1995 to 2001 she worked as an assistant general counsel at AOL and wrote the company's first privacy policy.

At Justice, Horvath will be close to the center of the department's power structure. She works under Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty, the No. 2 official who handles the department's day-to-day management, and her ability to overcome institutional resistance will be dependent on her ability to invoke his authority. "Jane plays a significant role in ensuring that the department's policies and initiatives are fully compliant with privacy and civil liberties," McNulty said in a statement.

"Just by virtue of being in [McNulty's] office, she'll have the ability to put issues on the agenda that she thinks are important," says one former high-ranking Justice official. "She'll have the ability to pick up the phone and get people in the attorney general's office."

Working under her are three privacy attorneys transferred from Justice's Office of Information and Privacy, a departmental subunit that handles mainly Freedom of Information Act requests. She also expects to hire a deputy soon.

Whether Horvath and her small staff will be able to actually shape policy is a different matter. With no independence from Justice leadership, her authority is limited to the power of persuasion, says Peter Swire, a former privacy counselor in the Clinton administration. "It's a tough job because you're pushing against the wind most of the time," he says.

Horvath says she can best defend privacy rights by vetting new programs for privacy issues before they are implemented. She points to the Defense Department's Total Information Awareness program as an example of a government data-gathering program that would have benefited from the advice of an in-house privacy adviser. Among other goals, that program, undertaken soon after the Sept. 11 attacks, sought to develop technology that would allow computers to identify and track people remotely. But its disclosure led to a public firestorm, and in 2003 it was abandoned.

"No one thought how the advocacy community or the American people would view it," Horvath says. "It's much better for me to be in at the inception of these programs."

Though Horvath says she hopes to focus on influencing new initiatives, there are plenty of existing Justice policies that raise privacy concerns. One area that has drawn Horvath's attention is the FBI's expanded use of National Security Letters. NSLs allow the FBI to secretly gather personal information from banks and telephone companies without having to first obtain court approval. After fighting to keep statistics of their use secret, in late April, the Justice Department reported to Congress that it issued 9,200 such letters in 2005. "It's a program that got to the top of my list," Horvath says. "The department as a whole needs to look at whether there were relevant law enforcement uses for those."

She also expresses an understanding of the privacy concerns raised by the Justice Department's attempts to gather Internet search data from Google and other search engines in its efforts to combat online pornography. "It's the slippery slope," Horvath says, noting that she's expressing a personal, rather than an official, opinion. "Google takes data and they save their data. Once they start producing data for the government, at what point does it stop?"

But Horvath is undisturbed by the growth in DNA profiles retained by state and federal law enforcement in a computer network known as the Combined DNA Index System (CODIS). That database, which initially was used to store genetic information of convicted felons, has been expanded to include thousands of arrestees who have not been convicted of a crime.

"If people have a problem with what CODIS is taking in, they need to talk to Congress," she says. "The FBI is not going outside of the law to take DNA."

On perhaps the most controversial privacy and civil liberties issue handled by the Justice Department -- its vigorous defense of the NSA's warrantless surveillance program -- Horvath says she has no role to play and has not been briefed on the matter. "That's [DOJ's] litigation posture," she says. "It's done by NSA. It's not my area."

LOBBYING, NOT ENFORCING

Horvath's job description says she's responsible for coordinating the work of Justice related to the protection of privacy and civil liberties. Fred Cate, a professor at the Indiana University-Bloomington School of Law, says the fact that Horvath hasn't been consulted on the NSA issue reveals much about the limits of her authority. "The attorney general has to sign off on every other agency's surveillance programs," says Cate. "How effective can the chief privacy officer be if she's not involved in advice [Justice] gives to other agencies?"

And without the power to compel testimony from Justice officials, it's unclear how often she'll be consulted by DOJ's leadership or what real power she'll be able to wield should she see privacy concerns being ignored. "At best it's internal lobbying," says Barry Steinhardt, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's technology and liberty program.

Horvath says that so far she hasn't felt left out of the loop. She says she meets with McNulty twice a week in the deputy attorney general's staff meetings and has already been able to influence two significant policy decisions, though she declines to name them. "I've been able to have my voice heard a great deal," she says. "I see changes that I suggest integrated."

But even those privacy advocates who say the Justice Department would be better off with a European-style privacy watchdog express optimism that her appointment is a step in the right direction. "Somebody with limited powers is far better than none," says Robert Ellis Smith, a Rhode Island lawyer who publishes a journal on privacy law. "What's important is to have somebody who is a focal point."

Serving as a sounding board for public dissent will be an important part of Horvath's job. As the attacks of Sept. 11 recede, the public is growing increasingly wary of government monitoring. An ABC News-Washington Post poll in January found that 30 percent of Americans felt the government was unjustly violating privacy rights in investigating terrorism. Though that number remains relatively small, it's a significant rise over the 17 percent who felt that way in September 2003.

Horvath has met with critics of the DOJ's privacy and civil rights policies, including the ACLU and the Center for Democracy and Technology, and spoke at a meeting of privacy groups hosted by the Electronic Privacy Information Center (EPIC) in May.

"The department has a real credibility problem in terms of assuring the public that laws designed to protect privacy are being scrupulously observed," says EPIC general counsel Sobel. "It's clear the security and intelligence interests overpower the privacy interests."

That critique isn't unfamiliar to the new chief privacy officer.

"I think that a great part of my role is to re-establish trust," Horvath says. "Trust is a huge thing for the FBI and Department of Justice. ... They can't do their jobs if they don't have it."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Bawag To Pay $675M To Settle Refco Charges (AP)

AP, June 6, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) — Austria's Bawag PSK bank will pay at least $675 million to avoid prosecution and to settle bankruptcy claims after admitting its role in the collapse of commodities brokerage Refco Inc., U.S. authorities announced Monday.

The bank, together with the Austrian Trade Unions Association, which owns Bawag, will forfeit $337.5 million to the United States to be distributed to victims of the fraud at Refco, according to prosecutors and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

In return, U.S. authorities have agreed not to prosecute Bawag, U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia said.

The government will distribute half of the $337.5 million in forfeited funds to the Refco bankruptcy estate and half to other victims of the Refco fraud, he said.

In a statement, the bank said it will initially pay $158 million, with $150 million being divided equally between the Refco creditors and the U.S. Department of Justice and another $8 million being paid to a class-action settlement fund.

The bank said the Justice Department will distribute its money to the Refco estates and the securities claimants, among others.

As much as a year later, the bank will pay the remainder, to be split equally between the Justice Department and Refco creditors, the bank said.

DOJ_NMG_0032039

The non-prosecution deal included a statement from Bawag, in which the bank acknowledged it assisted former Refco Chief Executive Phillip R. Bennett in hiding hundreds of millions of dollars of Refco losses from Refco investors and creditors.

According to the statement, certain former senior officers of the bank including the then-chairman and a member of the managing board who became chairman in 2003 knew that Bennett wanted to manipulate certain intercompany balances.

The statement said the bank from 2000 through February 2005 made short-term loans of hundreds of millions of dollars to Refco so Refco "could manipulate certain intercompany accounts in order deceptively to 'improve' Refco's balance sheet."

The New York-based Refco was one of the world's biggest commodities brokerages, employing some 2,400 employees in 14 countries. Bawag, Austria's fourth-largest bank, bought a 10 percent interest in Refco in 1999. It has 1.3 million private customers and 60,000 commercial customers.

The losses were revealed only two weeks after Refco went public in 2005, and led to the company filing for bankruptcy protection. Bennett has been indicted on eight felony counts and is under house arrest in New York, awaiting trial.

The Refco Unsecured Creditor's Committee had demanded $1.7 billion in damages from Bawag, claiming the Austrian bank aided Bennett.

Bawag had consistently denied any wrongdoing in its dealings with Refco, but Bawag Chief Executive Ewald Nowotny has said a settlement was needed to secure the bank's future.

Bawag also acknowledged in its statement that it sought and received assistance from Bennett at Refco in concealing Bawag's own investment losses on its balance sheet, prosecutors said.

Garcia said in a statement that the government agreed to the non-prosecution deal because Bawag had cooperated fully with his office's investigation and because the company had agreed to pay substantial restitution.

He also noted that Bawag's depositors and innocent employees would be harmed by a criminal prosecution.

He said new management at Bawag since January has taken steps to investigate its involvement with the Refco fraud and disclosed to the public in Austria the deficiencies in its own balance sheet, which the prior management had been hiding for years.

Garcia said the non-prosecution agreement showed that his office would vigorously pursue those who defraud American investors, "even those who act entirely from abroad."

In a statement, Nowotny called the settlement "a good deal because it draws a line under the past. The way is now open for a positive future development of Bawag PSK."

The company said the agreement calls for the dropping of pending and potential actions by Refco, the creditor's committee and a class-action lawsuit by Refco security holders.

The company said it has settled its SEC case, agreeing to not violate securities laws in the future.

The bank said it also agrees to drop its own claims against Refco and the Refco creditors, but not its claims against Bennett, who has been indicted under eight felony counts and is being held under house arrest pending trial.

Stuart M. Grant, a lawyer for institutional investors who are lead plaintiffs in a securities class action stemming from the Refco collapse, said in a statement he was pleased with the speedy settlement.

"This is a positive first step in providing compensation to investors who were scammed by Refco's management and directors, along with its financial advisors, auditor and other professionals," he said.

Austrian Bank Pays $675M In Refco Probe (USAT)

By Greg Farrell

USA Today, June 6, 2006

NEW YORK — More than six months after the former CEO of a financial services firm was indicted on charges of fraud, a government investigation into the matter seems to have gathered momentum.

The U.S. Attorney's office here announced Monday that an Austrian bank would pay at least $675 million to settle claims that it helped Refco and its former CEO, Phillip Bennett, hide more than $1 billion in debt from investors and creditors in the past five years.

The settlement was part of a non-prosecution agreement between federal prosecutors and the Bank fur Arbeit und Wirtschaft (Bawag), headquartered in Vienna. In a statement, Michael Garcia, the U.S. Attorney in Manhattan, said the bank merited the non-prosecution agreement because new management, installed in January after the scandal, was cooperating fully with the criminal investigation.

Although no mention was made of the bank's previous management, prosecutors and regulators from the Securities and Exchange Commission are continuing their investigation.

The deal lifts a cloud of uncertainty from the bank, while resolving most of the financial claims that have been lodged against it for its role in propping up Refco, now in Chapter 11. “We're pleased to have resolved all these matters,” said Andrew

Levander of the Dechert law firm, which represents Bawag. “We believe this generally resolves all potential claims against Bawag.”

More than half of the $675 million settlement will go to Refco's creditors. About $84 million will be paid to Thomas Lee Partners, which bought a substantial stake in the firm in 2004, and another $100 million to shareholders who invested in Refco after its 2005 IPO.

According to court documents, Phillip Bennett, the former CEO of Refco, helped the company disguise hundreds of millions of dollars in client losses in the late 1990s by shifting those losses off the books to entities he controlled. The SEC accused Bawag of helping Bennett hide the losses from investors and creditors.

By disguising the losses, Refco was able to go public last August. But seven weeks after the IPO, Refco's management disclosed the losses, causing the stock price to plummet and eventually result in a bankruptcy filing. Bennett was indicted in November, the same month Bawag ousted its CEO, Johann Zwettler.

Sean Coffey, a class-action lawyer with Bernstein Litowitz Berger & Grossmann, said Bawag will pay $8 million to investors who lost money in the IPO, and guarantee to fund $100 million more if that money can't be recovered from a special restitution fund.

Coffey, who represented investors hurt by WorldCom's meltdown in 2002, says Refco's other banks should have known about the hidden losses. “It's not as big a case as WorldCom, but in may ways, it's more egregious than WorldCom,” he said. “It was just seven weeks from IPO to DOA.”

Will Enron Probe Spawn Further Criminal Cases? (WSJ)

By John R. Emshwiller

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

The giant federal investigation of Enron Corp. has produced criminal charges against 32 people, and it is continuing. But will it ever spit out charges against anyone else?

That question hangs over the four-year-old probe in the wake of its greatest victory: the convictions last month of former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay and former President Jeffrey Skilling on conspiracy and fraud charges. The four-month trial of those two men was viewed as a culmination of the federal criminal probe that began in the wake Enron's collapse into bankruptcy in December 2001.

Theoretically, the federal Enron Task Force still has lots of potential targets for criminal charges. Some even came up by name during the Lay/Skilling trial. Court filings in that case said about 100 individuals have been identified as co-conspirators of the two men. Of those criminally charged, 16 have pleaded guilty, eight have been convicted at trial, two have been acquitted and the rest are awaiting trial.

Among the senior executives whose names have come up during the criminal proceedings is Jeff McMahon, who served various senior Enron positions; David Duncan, one of the company's outside auditors and the only man in the Enron saga to have pleaded guilty to a crime and then reversed himself; and Greg Whalley, who took over as Enron's president when Mr. Skilling unexpectedly quit in August 2001.

Attorneys for Messrs. McMahon and Duncan declined to comment. Mr. Whalley and his attorney couldn't be reached.

Some observers believe that with its biggest case now completed, the Task Force is unlikely to file new cases. Instead, it probably will wind down its efforts and focus on cleaning up the already filed charges. "Enron Beach is closed, and not just for the summer," says Jacob Frenkel, a former federal prosecutor now in private practice in Rockville, Md.

However, others say the government could feel obligated to bring additional cases even after nabbing the two top figures at the company. As a prosecutor, "you want to make sure that the people most culpable are held to account," says Jonathan Halpern, a former federal prosecutor now in private practice in New York.

Another possibility is that any future cases will be handled as civil matters by the Securities and Exchange Commission, which could seek large monetary penalties from individuals.

"Lots of people would like to see the SEC take a pretty aggressive tack on the remaining players," says John Hemann, a former member of the Enron Task Force who is now in private practice in San Francisco.

A Justice Department spokesman declined to comment on any possible future Enron-related criminal charges being filed. An SEC spokesman also declined to comment on possible additional civil actions related to the fallen energy giant. Already, the SEC has filed numerous civil cases in the Enron scandal, including still-pending actions against Messrs. Lay and Skilling.

The failure to file further criminal charges could intensify debate over an issue previously raised by defense attorneys for Messrs. Skilling and Lay. They contended the Task Force used the threat of further indictments to intimidate witnesses, adding that scores of former Enron executives had been unwilling to talk with them. In a court filing last fall, attorneys for Messrs. Skilling and Lay contended that the Task Force had "engendered, fostered and exploited an atmosphere of fear" among potential witnesses.

The defense noted that the last new individual indicted was Mr. Lay in July 2004. The latest new plea bargain came from a former Enron executive last July.

Prosecutors have consistently and vehemently denied misusing their power in the Enron investigation. Judge Sim Lake, who presided over the trial of Messrs. Lay and Skilling, largely turned down defense efforts to win relief in connection with the alleged prosecutorial misconduct. However, if the Task Force doesn't bring any further criminal cases, defense attorneys for Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay could raise this issue again on appeal. "Our view has long been that the only purpose for the Enron grand jury is to keep witnesses with exculpatory evidence far from the witness stand," says Daniel Petrocelli, Mr. Skilling's lead attorney.

Whatever the possible complications on the appellate front, no further prosecutions would be welcome news for individuals who seemingly have been in the government's crosshairs. Among them is Mr. McMahon, whose Enron jobs included corporate treasurer. As part of a 2004 plea bargain with the Task Force, former assistant treasurer Timothy DeSpain said he had made false representations to credit-rating companies about Enron's financial condition and had been "directed by my superiors...to manipulate fraudulently Enron's credit rating." At the court hearing on his plea, Mr. DeSpain identified Mr. McMahon as one of his superiors.

Mr. Whalley, the former Enron president, saw his name surface at the trial of Messrs. Lay and Skilling. Enron's former chief financial officer, Andrew Fastow, testified Mr. Whalley told him that he cut short a 2001 trip to meet with securities analysts because "I'd have to lie too much" about Enron's financial condition. Another former Enron executive and government witness, David Delainey, testified Mr. Whalley attended a top-level company meeting in March 2001 where finishing touches were put on a plan to hide large losses incurred by the retail energy unit.

Then there is Mr. Duncan, the former head of the Enron audit team at the accounting firm of Arthur Andersen LLP. He became the Task Force's first known cooperating witness when he pleaded guilty in April 2002 to obstructing the federal Enron investigation by destroying company-related documents. He was a government witness when the Task Force won a felony conviction against Andersen related to the document destruction -- a conviction that helped put the venerable accounting firm out of business.

After the Supreme Court last year overturned the Andersen conviction because of improper jury instructions, Mr. Duncan successfully moved to have his plea vacated. He remains subject to new criminal charges, if any more are ever forthcoming from the Task Force.

For Law Firm, Serial Plaintiff Had Golden Touch (NYT)

By Julie Creswell And Jonathan D. Glater

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

When it came to investing, Howard J. Vogel seemed to possess a perverse kind of Midas touch.

In early October 1997, he bought 50 shares of Oxford Health Plans. Three weeks later, the stock nose-dived, and Mr. Vogel lost about $3,000 of his investment. Still, Mr. Vogel reaped $1.1 million.

How was that possible?

Mr. Vogel was a plaintiff in a shareholder lawsuit filed by the New York securities litigation powerhouse Milberg Weiss Bershad Hynes & Lerach against Oxford Health. In 2003, the company, along with other parties that were sued, paid $300 million to settle.

Most of the investors received pennies on the dollar for their losses. But Mr. Vogel, then a real estate mortgage broker in Englewood, N.J., was not just a hapless investor who bought the wrong stock at the wrong time.

Mr. Vogel now says, according to a plea agreement with federal prosecutors, that he and members of his family were actually linchpins in a long-running arrangement that helped Milberg Weiss snare the lucrative lead counsel position in the Oxford Health and many other securities lawsuits, reaping hundreds of millions of dollars in legal fees.

Mr. Vogel, who has since moved to Florida, is a central figure in the government's case against Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, as the law firm is now called. Last month, a federal grand jury in Los Angeles indicted the firm and two of its name partners on several criminal charges, including racketeering conspiracy and money laundering. The firm is accused of making $11.3 million in illegal secret payments to Mr. Vogel and two others who served as plaintiffs in more than 150 lawsuits.

The firm contends it has done nothing improper and has vowed to fight the charges against it. But Milberg Weiss is struggling to keep its lawyers and clients from walking away. Several lawyers have left the firm and a number of institutional investors, including the New York state employee pension fund, have removed it as counsel in high-profile lawsuits.

DOJ_NMG_0032042

The Oxford Health lawsuit was widely watched at the time, and it takes on new significance in light of Mr. Vogel's admissions and prosecutors' charges.

It provides a window into how, even after Congress passed legislation in 1995 aimed at undermining Milberg Weiss's dominance, the firm worked feverishly to find ways to maneuver around the new landscape.

Yesterday, William W. Taylor, a lawyer at Zuckerman Spaeder who represents Milberg Weiss, said in response to questions: "On behalf of the firm, the Oxford case was handled in the highest traditions of Milberg's practice. The result obtained was exemplary and the firm is proud of the result in that case as it is in all of its cases."

The 1995 law, the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act, or P.S.L.R.A., was intended to make it harder for plaintiffs' lawyers to file lawsuits after merely finding a single investor who held the stock of the company to be sued. Under the law, courts were required to select the investor with the largest loss as lead plaintiff, whose lawyer then coordinated the lawsuit.

The law was meant to rein in lawyers who simply eyeballed companies that were in trouble and ran to the courthouse with a plaintiff in tow at the first hiccup in the share price.

In many ways, the law seems to have had the intended effect. Since the legislation was enacted, institutional investors like big state pension funds have led the charge in numerous shareholder lawsuits, like those involving Enron and WorldCom.

Still, the majority of federal securities lawsuits settled last year — 62 percent — had individuals as lead plaintiffs, according to NERA Economic Consulting in White Plains.

Indeed, in the cases cited by federal prosecutors in the indictment of Milberg Weiss, the law firm's frequent clients were individual investors, including Mr. Vogel; his wife, Eugenia Gladstone Vogel; and his stepson, Emile Gladstone. Mr. Vogel's lawyer would not comment for this article.

Yet while Mr. Vogel and his family were frequently named as plaintiffs, they were not always successful in winning lead-plaintiff status. That would not mean that the case was a total loss for Milberg Weiss, but its share of any settlement would almost certainly be smaller.

That is because the lead counsel in a lawsuit typically has considerable influence over how the fees will be awarded to other law firms after a settlement is reached, according to plaintiffs' lawyers.

"What typically happens in a securities litigation is you have one case filed and then you have three or four copycat" complaints, said John H. Henn, a defense lawyer at Foley Hoag in Boston. "Then they agree among themselves about on who would make the best lead plaintiff."

Or they have knock-down-drag-out courtroom brawls.

The decision over lead plaintiff in the Oxford Health case dragged on for nearly four years, took many bizarre twists along the way and featured a revolving cast of plaintiffs.

In the fall of 1997, malfunctions in Oxford Health's computer system led to unexpected losses and a steep drop in its stock price, which wiped out nearly $3 billion of the company's market value. In the days after the announcement, more than 50 class-action lawsuits were filed against the company, claiming that Oxford officials had known of the computer problems and their effects, but had misled investors by failing to disclose what they knew.

"The advantage to having a client and being on file with a class action is that you could then send out mailings or press releases, trying to find other plaintiffs who had bigger losses," said a plaintiffs' lawyer who did not want to be identified because he works in the field. "Even if you had a small client, it was at least a foot in the door that allowed you to get the process rolling."

Oxford Health was a big, juicy target for plaintiffs' lawyers.

A lawyer who tried to get his clients named lead plaintiffs in the Oxford case, Lee Squitieri, said: "It looked like a good case right out of the box. This was not what we called a 'prediction case' where the wrongdoing consisted of a prediction that turned out to be untrue. This was a better case. It involved concealing material information. That's a good case."

Milberg Weiss's biggest rival for lead plaintiff was the Colorado Public Employees' Retirement Association, which claimed it had lost more than $20 million when Oxford Health's stock fell. The mutual fund company PBHG, managed by Pilgrim Baxter & Associates, also wanted to be the lead plaintiff, contending that six of its funds had lost $4.3 million. It later dropped all but one of the funds from its claim, saying that the remaining one lost $65,000.

Undaunted by groups that, arguably, better met the requirements under the new law, Milberg Weiss aggregated a group of 35 individuals who it said had lost a total of $10 million.

Milberg Weiss's initial plaintiff in the case was Mr. Vogel. What was unknown at the time was that Mr. Vogel had acquired shares of the stock on the belief that it was on the verge of a collapse.

In late April, Mr. Vogel pleaded guilty to a single count of perjury — falsely stating in a court filing that he had not received payment other than his share of the settlement proceeds. In exchange for his cooperation, Mr. Vogel was not charged with being part of the conspiracy that Milberg Weiss is accused of. In addition, prosecutors agreed to recommend leniency in sentencing.

DOJ_NMG_0032043

According to Mr. Vogel's plea agreement, he contacted "Partner E" — identified by lawyers involved in the case as Robert Sugarman, a former Milberg Weiss lawyer — and "discussed a potential securities fraud class-action lawsuit" against Oxford Health. Mr. Sugarman is said to be cooperating with federal prosecutors. Mr. Sugarman's lawyer declined to comment.

Dating back to 1991, Mr. Vogel had been a lead plaintiff in numerous lawsuits filed by Milberg Weiss for which he illegally received a cut of the law firm's fees — as much as 14 percent, according to court filings.

But in the case of Oxford, Mr. Vogel was told by Mr. Sugarman that his payment would be less than his usual percentage because the lawsuit was so large and "Milberg Weiss would have other payment obligations in the case," the indictment said.

In 1998, the lawyer representing the Colorado pension fund, Jay W. Eisenhofer, challenged whether Mr. Vogel's losses were substantial enough to meet the law's new requirements.

Patricia M. Hynes, a Milberg Weiss lawyer who was not named in the indictment and has not been accused of any wrongdoing, responded in a June 1998 hearing that among the 35 plaintiffs representing the "Vogel group" were three individuals who had lost $2 million to $3.4 million each.

Swayed by Ms. Hynes's argument, the judge overseeing the case, Charles L. Brieant of the Federal District Court in Manhattan, decided to proceed with three co-lead plaintiffs — the Colorado retirement fund, the PBHG mutual funds and the "Vogel Plaintiff Group," which now did not include Mr. Vogel because his losses were too small. Instead, it consisted of Gary Weber, Daniel Hurley and Michael Sabbia. Milberg Weiss was named co-lead counsel, along with Grant & Eisenhofer, which represented the Colorado fund, and Chitwood & Harley, which represented PBHG.

The size of the losses by the individual investors became a focal point after lawyers with Sullivan & Cromwell, which represented Oxford Health, began to dig into the trading records of the Milberg Weiss plaintiffs.

Milberg Weiss had already revised Mr. Hurley's losses, dropping them from $3.4 million to less than $1 million after realizing an error had been made in going through his trading records.

But the lawyers for Oxford argued that more than 4,000 transactions in Oxford options that they had each engaged in during the 13 months of the time period of the lawsuit had been omitted.

By their accounting, Mr. Hurley had actually made $700,747 in profits from his combined trading in stock and options, while Mr. Sabbia's loss totaled $315,000. That was a far cry from the $2 million loss that Ms. Hynes told the court in 1998 Mr. Sabbia had suffered.

Ms. Hynes claimed the Sullivan & Cromwell lawyers had used "discredited experts, flawed methodologies and erroneous 'alternative' calculations of plaintiffs' losses." By her firm's calculations, even taking the options trading activity into account, Mr. Sabbia still lost more than $1 million and Mr. Hurley more than $500,000. Those were "substantial losses by any measure," she stated in a 2000 memo to the court.

When contacted, Mr. Sabbia and Mr. Hurley said this was the first time they had been plaintiffs in lawsuits and both men said they did not receive any money from Milberg Weiss for their roles in the lawsuit. Mr. Sabbia added that he had no idea there was even any dispute surrounding the size of his loss in Oxford Health. "I lost tons," he said.

Judge Brieant rejected the defense lawyers' objections, ruling that the two Milberg Weiss clients had indeed suffered losses and could continue as lead plaintiffs.

There were problems with another Milberg Weiss plaintiff, Mr. Weber, who withdrew from the case in late 1999, weeks after he was deposed by lawyers for Oxford. A court document in the case that was recently unsealed is a letter to the judge from a Sullivan & Cromwell lawyer who said Mr. Weber "chose to lie" about his education, criminal record, history as a defendant in a civil case and his trading in Oxford securities. The National Law Journal reported on the letter in early 2000. A call to Mr. Weber's office was not returned.

Despite these setbacks, Milberg Weiss and the other lead plaintiffs' law firms reached the $300 million settlement in June 2003. Milberg Weiss's share of the legal fees totaled about $40 million, according to the Justice Department's indictment.

A few months later, Mr. Vogel contacted another Milberg Weiss lawyer, Steven G. Schulman, about his payments for Oxford and other cases, the indictment said. Mr. Schulman and another Milberg Weiss partner, David J. Bershad, were also indicted by the federal grand jury in Los Angeles last month and have taken leaves of absences from the firm. Mr. Bershad's lawyer said his client "vigorously" denied the charges. A call to Mr. Schulman's lawyer was not returned.

Investors Who Fought Arbitrator's Ties Win A Big Ruling Against Prudential (WSJ)

By Susanne Craig

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

An arbitrator once accused of being in Wall Street's pocket was part of a panel that unexpectedly returned a $14.5 million penalty against a major Wall Street firm.

DOJ_NMG_0032044

In late May, a New York Stock Exchange arbitration panel unanimously ordered Prudential Securities Inc. to pay $11.8 million plus back interest to Charanjit and Harpreet Sahni, a Roslyn Heights, N.Y., couple who alleged that Prudential mismanaged some of their money. From 2000 to 2004, the couple's Prudential account dwindled to less than $1 million from $23 million. Wachovia Corp. acquired a 62% stake in Prudential Securities in July 2003 from Prudential Financial Inc., which retained a 38% stake.

A Prudential spokesman said of the ruling: "We don't believe this decision conforms with the law, and we are considering taking steps to have the decision vacated."

The case is significant not only for its size -- it is the third-largest award ever handed down by an NYSE panel -- but also because the couple's lawyer worked to have one of the three arbitrators who heard the case, a former Merrill Lynch & Co. employee named Robin Henry, removed from the panel.

In a lawsuit filed in a New York state court against the NYSE, attorney Tom Ajamie alleged that Ms. Henry, 76 years old, failed to disclose some of her ties to Wall Street that should have disqualified her. Among them: While the case was being heard, she was chairman of a charity that received donations from a number of big Wall Street firms.

Ms. Henry did disclose she worked at Merrill Lynch in the 1980s. She was a vice-president-level executive at the Wall Street brokerage house, according to her arbitrator profile, although her exact job description is unknown. In the lawsuit, Mr. Ajamie also alleged Ms. Henry often fell asleep during the arbitration proceedings and coached witnesses.

"Given the issues I faced with the arbitration process, I am shocked by the outcome," said Mr. Ajamie, of Houston. Ms. Henry didn't return calls for comment. The NYSE declined to comment.

Mr. Ajamie's legal challenge drew attention because investors have been complaining for years that the arbitration system is stacked in favor of Wall Street. The debate intensified amid a flood of new arbitration claims following the bursting of the Internet bubble in 2000.

Most investors who have a complaint against a Wall Street firm like Prudential end up in securities arbitration because firms almost always require clients to agree to this before they open an account. Panels typically have three arbitrators, two of whom don't come from Wall Street and are supposed to represent the public. Ms. Henry filled one of these slots in the case she heard. (The third arbitrator on these panels must come from Wall Street, an effort to ensure knowledge of the inner workings of the brokerage industry.)

Despite the fact that two slots are reserved for public arbitrators, plaintiff lawyers often complain they are biased. For instance, if an arbitrator previously worked as a Wall Street broker, the National Association of Securities Dealers generally classifies the person as public if he or she held the brokerage job for fewer than 20 years and has been out of the business for at least five years. The NYSE has its own rules, including some similar to the NASD's that leave the door open for former Wall Streeters like Ms. Henry to be classified as public. This issue was the subject of a page-one article in The Wall Street Journal in 2005.

In recent years, the Public Investors Arbitration Bar Association, an industry group for plaintiff lawyers, has called for the NASD, the forum where more than 90% of arbitrations are heard, and the NYSE to impose tighter rules on public arbitrators and abolish the industry-arbitrator slot, allowing investors to decide whether they want someone from Wall Street on their panel. This most recent award shows that even an arbitrator with past ties to Wall Street can deliver a big award, possibly undercutting the PIABA's efforts to tighten the rules.

"Regardless of this award, it is critical that the public arbitrator be truly public to ensure the integrity of the system," said PIABA President Robert Banks. "Furthermore, in this case there were questions about her lack of disclosure that still need to be addressed by NYSE."

Mr. Ajamie, who in 2001 won the largest award ever handed down by an NYSE arbitration panel, said that, despite his victory, the system is still in need of repair. "Just because one investor wins in a rare instance does not make the system honest or fair," he said.

Mr. Ajamie said the Sahnis had a discretionary account at Prudential, allowing the broker to trade in the account without having to get consent to trade. The broker, Mr. Ajamie said, increased the couple's exposure to technology companies just as the Internet sector was turning sour in 2000 and failed to diversify the portfolio.

Prudential, in its response to Mr. Ajamie's claim, said the Sahnis were sophisticated investors who knew the risks associated with their investments.

The award, although large, is half of what was sought. "After sifting all the evidence, the panel concluded that the responsibility for the investment losses should appropriately be shared," the panel wrote. The panel, in its page-long decision, concluded that Mr. Sahni and his broker were in effect "partners" in trading the account and "relied on each other constantly." The panel concluded that "Prudential as the ultimate party responsible" should pay approximately half the losses in the account.

DOJ_NMG_0032045

Should Prudential appeal the award, it faces an uphill battle. Courts can vacate an award only on a handful of grounds: for bias, fraud or if they find there was "manifest disregard" of the law in the arbitration process.

Justice In The Dock (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

As a federal prosecutor, Andrew Weissman helped to put Arthur Andersen out of business. Now in private practice, he still defends the Andersen indictment, but he also says the Justice Department's guidelines on corporate indictments "give the government an inordinate amount of power" and need some reining in.

We're glad to hear it. And a step toward doing exactly that may soon come in the courtroom of Lewis A. Kaplan, the federal judge hearing the case against 16 defendants in the KPMG tax-fraud case. He is expected to rule on whether Justice overstepped its bounds in pursuing that case. If he rules against the government, it may lead to an overdue rethinking of how far prosecutors can go in demanding cooperation from companies under investigation.

At issue is the 2002 Thompson memo, written by then-Deputy Attorney General Larry Thompson. The memo lays out standards for when a company should be considered cooperative. They include whether the firm has waived attorney-client privilege to give prosecutors access to confidential documents, or stopped paying the legal fees of "culpable" individuals.

In the KPMG case, Justice denies improperly pressuring the accounting firm to stop paying defense fees. And officially, KPMG has agreed. But KPMG is under a deferred prosecution agreement in the case for the next year and a half, meaning any action it takes that the Justice Department considers "uncooperative" could lead to a renewed indictment threat.

KPMG's general counsel, Joseph Loonan, testified last month that "wanting to have the government believe we were cooperating with them was one of the reasons that we wrote the letter" that informed one of the defendants, Jeffrey Stein, that the company would no longer be paying his legal bills. So even if the prosecution never made cutting off the defendants an explicit condition of avoiding indictment, KPMG clearly knew what was in the Thompson memo and acted accordingly. An internal memo from Justice and meeting notes from an IRS agent also make clear that the question of legal fees was on prosecutors' minds when weighing a KPMG indictment.

According to USA Today, Judge Kaplan was blunt about the matter, asking at a hearing, "Isn't it just perfectly obvious . . . that it is the position of the United States Department of Justice that a company facing possible prosecution hurts its case for a favorable outcome" by supporting the defense of its former employees. Obvious, indeed.

Earlier this year, a federal judge in New Hampshire also questioned the application of the Thompson memo against Enterasys Networks, a Massachusetts-based technology company that agreed to restore legal support for its former employees facing trial. But the KPMG case is much larger, and Judge Kaplan can lay down an important and necessary marker for corporate fraud cases going forward. Whether he imposes any sanction on the government, and of what sort, will show if Justice can get away with acting unjustly.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby's Lawyers Look To Documents For Defense (LAW)

By Sarah Kelley, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 5, 2006

Scooter Libby's lawyers are leaving clues to their strategy for his upcoming perjury trial.

I. Lewis “Scooter” Libby Jr. never meant to lie to the FBI or to a federal grand jury. Instead, his lawyers blame “confusion” or a “faulty memory” for his failure to disclose conversations he had with reporters about CIA operative Valerie Plame.

In other words, he simply forgot.

Given the hectic nature of his job as Vice President Dick Cheney’s chief of staff, Libby’s lawyers say, it’s understandable that their client might have failed to remember “snippets of conversation” he felt were unimportant.

And even if he did talk to reporters about Plame, the defense argues, he had no motive to lie about it later because he didn’t know her status was classified and therefore was unaware he had done anything wrong.

Then again, they contend, it might just be that the reporters who claim they talked to Libby about Plame are themselves confused.

Little by little, Libby’s lawyers have revealed aspects of their defense in court filings and at pretrial hearings. They’ve indicated what players likely will be called as witnesses, and they’ve made requests for thousands of documents — actions that shed light on likely trial strategies.

DOJ_NMG_0032046

"It looks like the defense is going in a few directions, one of which is that Valerie Plame was so unimportant that even if Libby was mistaken, he didn't intend to lie," says Peter Henning, a former lawyer with the Justice Department's Criminal Division and now a law professor at Wayne State University in Michigan. "It looks like they may also raise some challenges as to what was actually said in these fairly short conversations with reporters."

Libby is accused of lying to a grand jury and to FBI agents investigating claims that someone in the White House leaked Plame's identity to the media in the summer of 2003 to retaliate against her husband, Joseph Wilson, an outspoken critic of the Iraq war. When questioned about his knowledge of the leak, Libby allegedly lied about how and when he learned of Plame's CIA status, and with whom he discussed the classified information.

So far, the investigation launched by Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald in the fall of 2003 has nabbed only Libby, who was indicted in October 2005 and immediately resigned from the White House. He faces felony charges of perjury, obstruction, and making false statements. His trial is set for January 2007 in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia.

While Libby's lawyers have hinted at various defenses they are likely to raise at trial, the crux of their case is clear: Any discussions their client might have had about Plame were so unimportant that he easily could have forgotten them.

Perjury cases are particularly tough for prosecutors because they must prove a defendant blatantly lied — misleading statements are not grounds for a perjury conviction — and because they must prove intent, Henning says. That's why perjury cases are relatively rare, he adds.

Although the faulty-memory claim is sometimes successful, it could be a particularly difficult sell for Libby's lawyers to make in this case, says Solomon Wisenberg, a criminal-defense lawyer with Wisenberg & Wisenberg in the District.

"It looks like Fitzgerald will be able to present evidence . . . that this was such an important matter to the White House, and specifically to Libby, that professions of forgetfulness are not reasonable," says Wisenberg, who served as deputy independent counsel during the Whitewater and Monica Lewinsky investigations and conducted the grand jury questioning of then-President Bill Clinton.

The prosecution is expected to call a number of former and current government officials — including Cheney and former White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer — who allegedly had conversations with Libby about Plame's CIA status in the weeks before her identity was published in an article by syndicated columnist Robert Novak.

Other witnesses likely to be called by the prosecution include former New York Times reporter Judith Miller and Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper — both of whom say they were told of Plame's CIA status by Libby — as well as NBC journalist Tim Russert. Libby testified before the grand jury that it was Russert who first told him Plame worked for the CIA. Russert denies that claim.

Although it's common for perjury defendants to blame a faulty memory for any misstatements, that strategy is far from a sure thing. It's especially risky in a major political-corruption case, where there are dozens of witnesses ready to counter that claim.

During the Watergate scandal, President Richard Nixon advised aides to say "I don't remember" when they testified before the Senate Watergate Committee. Subsequently, John Mitchell, Nixon's attorney general, H.R. Haldeman, his chief of staff, and John Erlichman, a policy adviser, all were convicted of perjury.

In Libby's case, Wisenberg says, "It will be a really significant victory if they can pull it off."

Even Libby's defense team — led by two prominent white collar defense lawyers — acknowledges they face a difficult fight.

"I've got a tough haul in front of this jury," attorney Theodore Wells Jr. proclaimed during a May 5 motion hearing in which he sought discovery to help build Libby's defense. Libby hired Wells, a partner with Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton & Garrison, along with William Jeffress Jr., a partner with Baker Botts, to represent him shortly after he was indicted. The pair has since launched an aggressive campaign to portray Libby as a dedicated public servant who, during his tenure at the White House, was consumed with issues of national importance. Wells did not respond to a request for comment, and Jeffress declined to comment, saying, "The judge has indicated that he would prefer that counsel not discuss the case with reporters and we have decided we should honor that request."

As Cheney's chief of staff, Libby often was focused on homeland security and the war in Iraq, frequently working 14 hours a day and reading up to 200 pages of material daily, according to his grand jury testimony.

To corroborate the defense that Libby was too busy to remember any "peripheral" conversations, his attorneys have sought a trove of government documents, including hundreds of White House briefings, intended to convey the workload Libby confronted.

But Fitzgerald claims this and other requests for vast amounts of paperwork, much of which is classified, are an attempt to derail the case through "graymail." The term "graymail" refers to a tactic used by government officials facing criminal charges who attempt to halt their prosecution by exposing national-security secrets.

It could prove to be a successful strategy in this case, some observers say, noting that if Libby is denied access to discovery and convicted, there could be grounds for appeal.

"It's definitely a pretrial strategy, and it's a good strategy that might work," Wisenberg says.

One potential defense that is rather unorthodox is the Libby team's suggestion that some of the government's witnesses are unreliable. Specifically, the defense argues reporters Cooper and Miller might be confused about what actually was said during their conversations with Libby.

The defense subpoenaed reporters' notes and drafts of stories related to the CIA leak, hoping to find inconsistencies between what reporters wrote and what they told the grand jury. After reviewing the documents last month, Judge Reggie Walton ordered Time to turn over an unpublished draft that Cooper wrote about his testimony. The draft differs slightly from other versions of the story.

Walton indicated he might eventually order The New York Times to turn over Miller's notes if what she says at trial differs from what is written. The judge, however, rejected the defense's request to subpoena additional materials from NBC.

In addition to questioning the reporters' reliability, the defense claims some former and current government officials likely to be called as witnesses by the prosecution might be biased as a result of "fierce bureaucratic infighting" among officials at the White House, State Department, and CIA.

One such witness, according to the defense, is Mark Grossman, former undersecretary at the Department of State. The defense points out that in recent months there has been media speculation that Grossman's former boss at the State Department, Richard Armitage, might have been the source who leaked Plame's identity to Novak. That would mean the department — not Libby — is responsible for the leak.

"Grossman's testimony may be colored by either his personal relationship with Mr. Armitage or his concern for the institutional interests of the State Department," the defense writes in court papers.

Libby's lawyers have requested any documents from the files of Grossman and other likely government witnesses that pertain to the CIA leak investigation or to Wilson's claims that the administration exaggerated intelligence to justify going to war.

During the May 5 motion hearing, Wells argued it was necessary for the defense to show Wilson made false statements. "The wife's role becomes minor when you see what was really going on," Wells said at the hearing.

But Walton wasn't convinced: "I'm just not going to let this case end up being a judicial resolution on the legitimacy of the war." On June 2, Walton issued an opinion largely denying the defense's discovery request for documents pertaining to Wilson.

Cheney made me do it

On July 6, 2003, Wilson published an op-ed in The New York Times debunking reports that Iraq had attempted to buy uranium from Niger and accusing the administration of twisting prewar intelligence.

The editorial, entitled "What I Didn't Find in Niger," sparked a political firestorm, prompting Cheney's office to refute Wilson's claims and attack his credibility. But Libby's lawyers maintain their client was focused on correcting the public record, not on Plame.

To challenge that assertion, Fitzgerald plans to call Cheney to testify. If the vice president is called, experts say it's unlikely he would be able to dodge providing testimony by citing executive privilege.

Fitzgerald also intends to introduce as evidence a copy of the Wilson op-ed bearing handwritten notes by Cheney. Those notes, according to Fitzgerald, reflect the "contemporaneous reaction" of the vice president and his chief of staff. One notation questions whether Wilson's wife sent him to Niger, suggesting her CIA status was an issue.

"The government will argue the vice president's involvement would have made the whole matter so salient to Libby that anything he said to investigators would have been incredibly thought out, not haphazard and forgetful," says Dan Richman, a law professor at Fordham University and a former federal prosecutor in the Southern District of New York.

But Richman says it's possible Libby's lawyers might use Cheney's testimony to their own advantage.

"I think there will be an effort by Libby to portray himself as a sacrificial lamb of higher-ups — that he was sort of put in a bad place and forced to protect others," he says. "If done right, it could lead jurors to have some sympathy for him."

Fitzgerald, Scooter And Us (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

"One of the mysteries of the recent yellowcake uranium flap is why the White House has been so defensive about an intelligence judgment that we don't yet know is false, and that the British still insist is true. Our puzzlement is even greater now that we've learned what last October's national intelligence estimate really said."

Those words appeared in this column on July 17, 2003 under the headline "Yellowcake Remix." Three years later they show we were right about Joe Wilson and his false allegation that President Bush lied in that year's State of Union address about Iraq seeking nuclear materials in Africa.

So imagine our surprise when Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald declared his intention last month to use that editorial as part of his perjury and obstruction case against former Vice Presidential aide Scooter Libby, who had also questioned Mr. Wilson's claims. It suggests that his case is a lot weaker than his media spin.

Mr. Libby wasn't a source for our editorial, which quoted from the October 2002 National Intelligence Estimate concerning the Africa-uranium issue. But Mr. Fitzgerald alleges in a court filing that Mr. Libby played a role in us getting the information, which in turn shows that "notwithstanding other pressing government business, [Libby] was heavily focused on shaping media coverage of the controversy concerning Iraqi efforts to obtain uranium from Niger."

The prosecutor comes close here to suggesting that senior government officials have no right to fight back against critics who make false allegations. To the extent our editorial is germane to this trial, in fact, it's because it puts Mr. Libby's actions into a broadly defensible context that Mr. Fitzgerald refuses to acknowledge. * * *

In the summer of 2003, Washington was abuzz with the allegations of Mr. Wilson, a former ambassador who had been to Africa on a fact-finding mission for the CIA. Mr. Wilson served as the then-anonymous source for several articles alleging deliberate inaccuracies in the Bush Administration's case for war with Iraq, before making the case himself in a July 6, 2003, New York Times op-ed. Mr. Wilson asserted that the now famous 16 words -- "The British Government has learned that Saddam Hussein recently sought significant quantities of uranium from Africa" -- were false. And, he wrote, Mr. Bush would have known they were false because he knew Mr. Wilson had already debunked the story.

Those allegations were serious indeed, and the White House had every right -- even a duty -- to answer them. Mr. Libby appears to have played a significant role in this effort, but that can hardly be considered a crime. Enter our July 17 editorial, which pointed out that far from debunking the Niger-uranium story, the information presented by the intelligence community to President Bush tended to support it.

Quoth the NIE: "Iraq also began vigorously trying to procure uranium ore and yellowcake"; and "A foreign government service reported that as of early 2001 Niger planned to send several tons of 'pure uranium' (probably yellowcake) to Iraq. . . . We do not know the status of this arrangement." We ran the editorial to give readers a more complete understanding of the yellowcake debate, and of Mr. Wilson's claims, than they were getting in other media accounts.

A year later the 16 words were declared to be "well-founded" by Britain's high-level Butler inquiry, as well as by a bipartisan report from the U.S. Senate Intelligence Committee. To the extent Mr. Libby helped the actual contents of the 2002 NIE find their way into the public debate -- as opposed to Mr. Wilson's fantasy version -- he performed a public service.

Regarding our editorial, Mr. Fitzgerald does at least note that he "will not contend that the defendant's actions in this regard were criminal or otherwise unauthorized." But he also seems to imply that those actions suggest a pattern of malfeasance and a motive for the perjury and obstruction he alleges. Yet Mr. Fitzgerald has not indicted Mr. Libby, or anyone else, for leaking the CIA identity of Mr. Wilson's wife, Valerie Plame -- which was his original mandate from the Justice Department. His actual charge of obstruction comes down to the fact that Mr. Libby and several reporters have different recollections of their conversations.

All of this matters because it suggests that Mr. Fitzgerald is scrambling even now to explain why a seasoned attorney such as Mr. Libby would lie to a grand jury. The prosecutor's original indictment doesn't mention a motive. And his mention of our editorial suggests he's now trying to invent a motive out of Mr. Libby's attempt to defend the White House from Mr. Wilson's manifestly false allegations at the onset of a Presidential election campaign. (Mr. Wilson joined the Kerry campaign until he was dropped after the official probes destroyed his credibility.)

There is all the difference in the world between seeking to respond to the substance of Mr. Wilson's charges, as Mr. Libby did, and taking revenge on him by blowing his wife's cover, which was the motive originally hypothesized by Bush critics for the Plame exposure. The more of Mr. Fitzgerald's case that becomes public, the more it looks like he has made the terrible mistake for a prosecutor of taking Joe Wilson's side in what was essentially a political fight.

7 Charged With Hollywood-linked Drug, Money Laundering Scheme (AP)

By Gary Gentile, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 6, 2006

LOS ANGELES (AP) Seven people, including two affiliated with Limelight Films Inc., a film and TV distribution company, have been charged as part of a two-year investigation into allegations of drug trafficking, money laundering and arms dealing.

Bruno D'Esclavelles, 45, chief executive of Limelight, and Alexander de Basseville, 35, who is affiliated with Limelight's parent, the Swiss firm ADB Swiss S.A., were arrested in Alexandria, Va., and charged with conspiracy to distribute the drug Ecstasy.

Federal officials say de Basseville met several times over two years with undercover agents posing as international drug traffickers.

De Basseville offered to launder drug money, supply weapons and broker drug deals for the agents, according to a press release from the U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia and a separate release from the Drug Enforcement Administration.

Calls to the U.S. attorney's office were not returned Monday.

Authorities say that on two occasions, de Basseville and D'Esclavelles took cash, which they were told came from drug sales, and laundered it through Limelight Films.

In February, de Basseville and D'Esclavelles allegedly arranged for an associate, Thomas Frischknecht of the Netherlands, to sell 10,000 Ecstasy pills to undercover agents. The pills were shipped to the agent in Virginia, authorities said.

Authorities say de Basseville and D'Esclavelles later agreed to sell an additional 500,000 pills.

Other meetings between the agents and the defendants took place in Geneva, Miami, Amsterdam and Los Angeles, authorities charge.

Frischknecht, 26, of Switzerland was arrested in Amsterdam and charged with conspiracy to import Ecstasy.

Authorities also charged Fabian Pruvot, 37, David Liberman, 32, Andrew Prikazhikov, 31, and Brian Delansky, 33, all of Los Angeles.

Prikazhikov and Delansky were charged with conspiracy to posses firearms in furtherance of drug trafficking.

Pruvot and Liberman were charged with conspiracy to launder money.

John Zwerling, an attorney representing D'Esclavelles, said his client denied the charges.

``This was a production that was conceived of, scripted and directed by agents of the United States government," Zwerling said. ``There is zero indication that my client had ever done anything illegal in his life."

A call to an attorney representing de Basseville was not immediately returned Monday.

De Basseville is engaged to Kiera Chaplin, the 23-year-old granddaughter of actor Charlie Chaplin and the great-granddaughter of playwright Eugene O'Neill, according to her manager Mitch Zamarin. Chaplin, who is listed on the Limelight Web site as the company's chairman, was not charged.

Pruvot, Liberman, Prikazhikov and Delansky could not be reached for comment.

DEA Busts Hollywood Ecstasy Ring (ABC)

By Jason Ryan

ABC News, June 6, 2006

A man engaged to Charlie Chaplin's granddaughter was arrested in a drug sting targeting a group that trafficked the drug ecstasy from Europe to Los Angeles and used a Hollywood movie studio to launder money, according to the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

DEA officials say Alexandre De Basseville, who is engaged to Chaplin's granddaughter Kiera Chaplin, and Bruno D'Esclaelles, the CEO of Limelight Films, met on several occasions with undercover federal agents during the past two years and attempted to set up deals to bring 500,000 ecstasy pills into the United States.

De Basseville also allegedly discussed the possibility of weapons trafficking with undercover agents, but no weapons were ever exchanged in the deals.

The DEA says members of the drug ring took what they believed were drug proceeds and laundered the money using their Los Angeles business, Limelight Films. Chaplin is the chairwoman of the company, but she is not believed to be involved in the investigation, according to a federal law enforcement official.

De Basseville is an executive board member of ADB Swiss S.A., a Swiss-based financial services company that owns Limelight Films, Inc. Four other top executives at Limelight, including Chief Financial Officer David Liberman, were arrested in connection with the case.

Calls made by ABC News to Limelight's offices in Los Angeles were not returned Monday evening after the DEA announcement.

The Limelight Web site says of Chaplin: "As the granddaughter of Charlie Chaplin, her vision was to bring back her grandfather's legacy to the United States and develop new opportunities in the film arena."

Swiss national Thomas Frischknecht, who allegedly supplied De Basseville and D'Esclaelles with access to the ecstasy pills, was also arrested in the Netherlands. In February 2006, Frischknecht sent a package with 10,000 ecstasy pills into the U.S., but the pills were actually received by an undercover federal agent working on the case, according to the DEA.

After the shipment, Frischknecht, De Basseville and D'Esclaelles agreed to sell another 500,000 ecstasy pills to the agent posing as a drug trafficker. But all three were arrested before the second shipment was made.

Amid Government Data Gathering, Businesses Mull Their Options (INFOWEEK)

By Larry Greenemeier, InformationWeek

Information Week, June 6, 2006

A Justice Department proposal that ISPs retain records for two years is just the latest in a growing list of data collection initiatives by federal agencies.

To protect the public from terrorism and other hazards, the U.S. government mines its vast databases for signs of trouble. Increasingly, the feds are requesting--even demanding--that businesses share their data, too. But such cooperation isn't cheap or easy, and several industries are pushing back to protect their customers' privacy.

Not long after forcing Internet companies to submit search terms, search result URLs, and other information as part of its enforcement of the Child Online Protection Act, the Justice Department is going a step further. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is now asking the likes of Google, AOL, and Verizon to keep subscriber information and other customer data for at least two years, just in case the government needs it for criminal investigations. Currently, Internet companies are under no obligation to save that data at all.

People want the government to have the data needed to fight crime and terrorism; it's the potential misuse of personally identifiable data--names, addresses, Social Security numbers, Web search histories--that is deeply worrisome.

Just last week, the European Court of Justice ruled that an airline passenger data-sharing agreement between the European Commission and the Department of Homeland Security's Customs and Border Protection division violates European privacy law. The arrangement was crafted in 2004 to keep out terrorists. The two sides have four months to rethink the terms of how data gets shared, at the risk of disrupting trans-Atlantic travel if they don't (see story, "Illegal EU Data-Sharing Deal With The U.S. Shows Transparency Not Always Enough").

These are only the latest examples of federal harvesting of company data. The National Security Agency is reportedly building a massive database of phone call records provided by AT&T and other telecom companies. Trucking companies share electronic manifests as their rigs cross into the United States, an information exchange that will become mandatory later this year. Financial firms report suspicious transactions. Subpoenas are used to get data from individual companies.

The feds have been mostly successful in getting businesses to cooperate. Following the 9/11 terrorist attacks, the government looked to transportation companies, especially airlines, to hand over information that can be used to match passengers and transportation workers with names on terrorist watch lists. However, while they initially complied with Homeland Security projects such as the Computer Assisted Passenger Pre-Screening System and Secure Flight, some airlines have said they're uneasy with the government's ability to safeguard their data from loss or misuse.

Privacy advocates worry about the volume of data being collected (millions of records and many terabytes of data), the length of time it's stored, and the level of detail. Under the existing agreement, participating European airlines provide Customs and Border Protection with up to 34 bits of information on each passenger, ranging from name and method of payment to meal requests. Homeland Security can keep the data up to 3-1/2 years. Those terms are now subject to renegotiation before the Sept. 30 deadline set by the EC court.

Yet even as one data-sharing arrangement comes under scrutiny, another arises. The U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention has requested that international airlines store passenger emergency contact information for six months in the event of a bird flu outbreak. "This requires still more manpower and more costs," says David Henderson, manager of information for the Association of European Airlines.

Subpoena Power

Government requests for data come in the form of a subpoena or a "national security letter." A subpoena must be approved by a judge and can be fought in court if it's too vague or burdensome to a business, as Google did earlier this year. A national security letter is a special type of subpoena issued by the FBI without the need for a judge's signature, entitling the FBI to bank, insurance, phone, ISP, and credit report records (but not medical records). Unlike a subpoena, a company receiving a national security letter cannot discuss the fact that it has received one.

The FBI appears to be liberal in its use of national security letters. The Washington Post reported last year that the government issues 30,000 such letters annually. A Justice Department spokesman said that's inaccurate but declined to provide a better estimate. The Justice Department doesn't track the number of subpoenas issued by its own agencies or by the 94 U.S. attorneys' offices.

Nor does Justice monitor the costs those subpoenas impose on recipients, which can be considerable. At AOL, a dozen employees handle about 12,000 law enforcement requests a year, a spokesman says. About one in five of those requests results in some form of information sharing.

Meantime, the ground rules are changing. Presaging the U.S. push for mandated electronic archives from ISPs, the European Parliament and Council in December approved rules that require telecom companies to retain phone and Internet records for two years for anti-terror investigations. Microsoft, in a statement, says it's reviewing its internal data-retention policies "in light of European Union data-retention regulations."

Businesses sometimes resist government requests for archived data and other information. Google did and, following a court ruling, ended up providing less data than the Justice Department originally requested. "What the ruling means is that neither the government nor anyone else has carte blanche when demanding data from Internet companies," Google associate general counsel Nicole Wong writes on the company blog.

Brett Glass, owner of Lariat.net, a small ISP in Laramie, Wyo., says his company has never been asked for customer data and would put up a fight if it were. "If the federal government--be it Congress, the FCC, or an executive branch agency--were to mandate that we supply it, we'd consider filing suit or joining a suit to void such a request," he says. "We owe it to our users."

For companies that do share data, there can be technical challenges, especially if they don't have a central data warehouse, consultant Richard Winter says. Government agencies might seek records scattered across IT systems that are difficult to pull together. Many companies have a hard enough time sifting disparate data for their own use, Winters notes.

Data sharing is a touchy subject. EarthLink, Microsoft, and Visa declined to discuss it. Google admits to receiving government subpoenas, but it won't say how many.

Disarray And Distrust

Homeland Security's agreement with the EC is spelled out far better than its Secure Flight program. The Transportation Security Administration admitted in October that Secure Flight's plan to integrate real-time transactional data, such as passengers with boarding passes, with other information, such as terrorist watch lists, would be difficult to implement without major upgrades to airline IT systems.

Some airlines have been publicly chastised for not doing more to protect customer privacy. JetBlue drew criticism when it was revealed in 2003 that it allowed Acxiom, acting as a contractor, to transfer 5 million records for more than 1.5 million passengers to Torch Concepts, which was developing a data mining tool to analyze the characteristics of people seeking access to military installations. JetBlue had agreed to participate after a written request from the TSA. JetBlue CEO David Neeleman later acknowledged that the data transfer was a violation of his company's privacy policy.

With safety at issue, the airline industry understands the need to participate in government-mandated data sharing. But industry officials in the States and Europe are urging the U.S. government to better organize its efforts. Airlines don't want to be subject to both the TSA Secure Flight program and Customs and Border Protection's Advanced Passenger Information program, which requires that passenger information be communicated to the government within 15 minutes of a flight's departure to the United States.

"Both should be designed to function through coordinated information feeds and avoid unnecessary duplication of communications, programming, and information requirements," James May, CEO of the Air Transport Association, and Ulrich Schulte-Strathaus, secretary general of the Association of European Airlines, wrote in an October letter to Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff. May and Schulte-Strathaus requested that Secure Flight and Advanced Passenger Information supersede the government's no-fly lists and that the amount of redundant data required from the airlines be reduced.

Financial services companies are likewise no strangers to handing data to the government, and the hunt for terrorist financing has only added to the burden. Suspicious Activity Report filings to the Treasury Department's Financial Crimes Enforcement Network have increased every year since they were first required in 1996, with 919,000 such reports sent last year alone.

Banks have expressed anxiety over Suspicious Activity Reports, especially in light of the Patriot Act, which punishes noncompliant companies with fines of up to $1 million a day or, in the extreme, by taking away bank charters. "It's definitely changed the compliance environment for banks since 9/11," says Kelly Etherington, corporate compliance manager for Zions Bancorp, which operates more than 450 branches and offices. Like other banks, Zions has always reported suspicious activity, but it finds law enforcement requests are up in the last few years.

Suspicious Activity Reports "create a very significant burden" on financial services companies without any clear benefits to them, says John Carlson, a director with BITS, a consortium of the 100 largest U.S. financial services companies. Given the industry's heavy regulations and what Carlson calls its culture of protecting customer privacy, he says financial services companies generally wouldn't provide data to a government agency unless required to by law or a court-issued document.

Biggest Fears

What might government agencies do with all the business and Internet data they're collecting? Some skeptics worry about a single massive database where all kinds of information gets crunched together, providing a complete picture of Joe Citizen. That seems a remote possibility, though researchers at the Defense Advanced Research Projects Agency did work on a system several years ago that would have mined data in that way to identify terrorists. That program, dubbed Total Information Awareness, was scrapped more than two years ago under public pressure.

A different but related concern is that data collected for one purpose could get used for another. USA Today last week reported that the FBI plans to use its database of DNA evidence, collected from convicted criminals and some others upon arrest, to help identify thousands of dead people whose identities aren't known.

There's also the concern that once the feds gets their hands on data, they can't be trusted to secure it. Look no further than last month's news of a stolen laptop and external hard drive containing data on 26.5 million military veterans and family members. The Veterans Affairs Department has been fingered for its lack of security before, but it's not the only agency with low marks. Security becomes even more of an issue as more data accumulates and gets retained longer.

Encryption is one solution, but encrypted data can't be searched easily and is thus less useful to the government. Nothing, it seems, about data sharing between businesses and government is destined to be easy.

Dems Hold Steering Meeting As Jefferson Dilemma Looms (HILL)

By Josephine Hearn

The Hill, June 6, 2006

With emotions still raw over House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) recent request that Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) relinquish his seat on the Ways and Means Committee while he faces a government bribery investigation, House Democrats are convening a meeting this evening of their Steering and Policy Committee.

The committee is charged with determining panel memberships, among other matters..

It was unclear at press time whether the steering committee, which is stocked with Pelosi loyalists, would discuss Jefferson's situation or vote to take him off the tax-writing panel.

A notice on the meeting stated that the gathering would address Democratic messaging efforts.

But it could be an indication that Pelosi is seeking to overcome the first hurdle in the process of formally ejecting Jefferson from the panel. The matter could then proceed to a potentially contentious vote in the House Democratic Caucus followed by a vote on the House floor.

Rep. Mel Watt (D-N.C.), chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus and one of Jefferson's most vocal defenders, said through an aide last night that he had not been made aware of the meeting. Watt does not sit on the Steering and Policy Committee.

Democrats To Discuss Jefferson (RC)

By Steve Kornacki

Roll Call, June 6, 2006

Rep. William Jefferson's (La.) tenuous standing as a member of the Ways and Means Committee will be discussed when the Democratic Steering and Policy Committee convenes a members-only session, tentatively set for late Tuesday afternoon.

The committee does not hold regularly scheduled meetings, but on Monday, members were told to be present Tuesday for what was billed as an important event: a discussion of the party's message and agenda.

But the timing — it was only a few session days ago that Jefferson ignored a demand from House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) that he leave Ways and Means immediately — promptly ignited specualtion that Pelosi is planning to ask the Steering and Policy Committee to recommend to the full Democratic Caucus that Jefferson be stripped of his assignment on the exclusive panel.

"If that's what they're going to do, they probably won't say it until everyone's there," a Democratic aide noted.

A senior Democratic aide, however, said that Pelosi is expected to broach the Jefferson subject but said that she is likely to tread carefully, perhaps only sampling opinion instead of calling for specific actions.

"I don't even know that she's in a position to do anything about it," the aide said.

(With Members trickling back to Washington, D.C., after the Memorial Day recess, there was talk late Monday that the Steering and Policy meeting might be moved to Wednesday morning. A final decision is expected Tuesday morning.)

Other aides also expressed doubt that Pelosi would ask for an actual vote on Jefferson's status at the meeting, but in showing a desire to press ahead on the matter, she is testing, at least potentially, her relationship with the Congressional Black Caucus.

The 59-year-old Jefferson, an eight-term House veteran, has not been charged with any crime. But, while maintaining his innocence, even the Congressman has acknowledged that an indictment on bribery charges is likely, and soon.

Pelosi requested his resignation from the panel "in the interest of upholding the high ethical standard of the House Democratic Caucus," a move that figured to score points with a general public not known for its willingness to give ethically suspect politicians the benefit of the doubt. But it also rankled Jefferson's 42 colleagues in the CBC, who communicated to Pelosi their readiness to go to war with her publicly if she took any further steps to force Jefferson out once he refused her request.

There are two avenues available to Pelosi to pry Jefferson from the committee. She could simply invoke her status as Minority Leader and bring a privileged resolution to the House floor, a death knell for Jefferson unless Republicans for some reason rallied to his defense. But such a move could stir broad resentment among House Democrats, who might interpret it as a precedent for future heavy-handedness.

Pelosi's other option involves building consensus within the Democratic Caucus, first by winning a recommendation from the 50-member Steering and Policy Committee and then by making her case to the full Caucus.

As the Minority Leader, Pelosi has packed Steering and Policy with some of her closest allies, including Reps. George Miller (Calif.) and Rosa DeLauro (Conn.), who serve as the body's co-chairs. The primary function of Steering and Policy is to make recommendations on committee appointments — recommendations that typically, and not coincidentally, jibe with Pelosi's own preferences.

Still, there are nine CBC members on the Steering and Policy Committee, including Reps. John Lewis (Ga.) and Charlie Rangel (N.Y.), who were among the sextet of senior CBC members who warned Pelosi to her face two weeks ago about the dangers of pursuing Jefferson's departure too aggressively.

Pelosi's office was tight-lipped Monday about the looming meeting. Jennifer Crider, Pelosi's press secretary, said the meeting was part of the Democrats' "ongoing message efforts."

Several Democratic aides said they are inclined to believe that Pelosi will do little more than take the temperature on the Jefferson question. And they also said they expect the Democratic message and agenda will, as touted, be discussed.

If Steering and Policy were to endorse Jefferson's removal, the matter would be taken up by the full Caucus, which will next hold a weekly meeting on Wednesday morning. Those close to Pelosi say she did her homework before calling for Jefferson's head and have expressed confidence she would prevail in a vote of all 203 Democrats — even if the CBC's opposition ensures the maneuver wouldn't be entirely tidy.

CBC leaders have told Pelosi they will not resist any reprisals against Jefferson — if and when he's indicted. Until then, they are willing to give her room to posture, as long as she doesn't formally act. Bringing up the subject at a Steering and Policy Committee meeting without asking for a vote would, it appears, preserve this balance.

The latest hint that Jefferson's days on Ways and Means might be drawing to a close is only fueling speculation about his successor.

The most popular theory has Pelosi tapping Rep. Artur Davis (Ala.) to fill a slot that many believe is unofficially earmarked for a CBC member from a Southern state. Given the current tension, Pelosi might find particular urgency in trying to assuage the CBC with a Jefferson replacement pick.

But there also are suggestions that some CBC veterans, who recall that Davis ousted Earl Hilliard, a longtime CBC member, in 2002, might prefer that the spot go to someone else — Elijah Cummings (Md.), for instance, who already has expressed a desire to replace Rep. Benjamin Cardin on Ways and Means when his fellow Marylander leaves the House at the end of the year.

Other names making the rounds include Reps. Joe Crowley (N.Y.), Brian Baird (Wash.), Shelley Berkley (Nev.), Bob Etheridge (N.C.), Ron Kind (Wis.), and Charlie Melancon (La.). One rumored scenario actually has Pelosi putting off any appointment until after the November election. If the Democrats retake the majority, the thinking goes, she would likely have four new Ways and Means seats to dole out, meaning she might not have to say no to as many of her members seeking to sit on the panel.

Ex-Official Testifies He Provided 'Insight And Advice' To Abramoff (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 5 — A former White House budget official acknowledged Monday that he had provided "a lot of insight and advice," including government information not available to the public, to the lobbyist Jack Abramoff in 2002.

But the former aide, David H. Safavian, testified that he had not violated ethics rules in accepting the lobbyist's invitation for a golfing trip to Scotland that summer.

DOJ_NMG_0032054

Mr. Safavian insisted in testimony in federal court here that he had not lied to government investigators when he was asked about the golf trip, although he acknowledged giving them inaccurate information about some contacts with Mr. Abramoff, a former lobbying partner.

Mr. Safavian, who is charged with lying about his relationship with Mr. Abramoff and the circumstances of the golf trip, attributed the inaccuracies to a faulty memory, a claim that brought expressions of disbelief from prosecutors.

Mr. Safavian is the first person to go on trial as a result of the influence-peddling scandal centered on Mr. Abramoff, who has pleaded guilty to trying to corrupt public officials.

In testimony that concluded the defense case, Mr. Safavian acknowledged under cross-examination that he had been helpful to Mr. Abramoff in the summer of 2002 in gathering information about two parcels of government-owned property that the lobbyist was interested in acquiring from the General Services Administration, where Mr. Safavian then worked. He later went to work in the White House budget office as the director of federal procurement policy.

"I gave him a lot of insight and advice," Mr. Safavian testified, acknowledging that he had set up a meeting at the services agency to discuss one property for Mr. Abramoff's wife on Aug. 2, 2002, the day before his departure for Scotland.

But he said he had set up several similar meetings at the agency, a comment that led the trial prosecutor, Peter R. Zeidenberg, to ask in a sarcastic tone, "Were those for lobbyists who were taking you on vacation?'

Mr. Safavian replied in an angry tone, "That had nothing to do with it."

Mr. Safavian's trial is in abeyance for the rest of the week because of scheduling difficulties involving the trial judge, Paul L. Friedman, and as a result of a judicial conference that will largely close the federal court here on Thursday and Friday. The case is scheduled to go to the jury after closing arguments next Monday.

Safavian: Advice To Abramoff Did Not Cross Line (GOVEXEC)

By Jenny Mandel

Government Executive, June 6, 2006

David Safavian, former head of the Office of Management and Budget's procurement policy division, took the stand in his own defense for the second time Monday, describing how he provided assistance to his friend and former colleague Jack Abramoff in ways that approached, but did not cross, lines of propriety.

Safavian faces charges that he lied about his dealings with Abramoff to obtain clearance from the General Services Administration ethics office to go on a golfing trip to Scotland while serving as the chief of staff at that agency, and that he subsequently obstructed two investigations into his participation in the trip.

As the final witness in his own defense, Safavian testified that he had advised Abramoff on efforts to take over two GSA-controlled properties, as was clear from a large number of e-mail messages presented as evidence by Justice Department lawyers earlier in the case. But on Friday, Safavian had testified that while he had not expected some of that assistance to actually help, he had moved his friend's queries forward so Abramoff could get answers from the appropriate GSA decision-makers.

Safavian said he had arranged a meeting and provided information about a large GSA property in White Oak, Md., that Abramoff hoped to lease for a religious school he and his wife founded, despite it being clear that the effort to lease the property would not ultimately succeed. He said he had tried to explain that the religious nature of the school and potentially hazardous condition of the buildings ruled out leasing the property to Abramoff's Eshkol Academy.

"If you knew Jack Abramoff, you'd know he's a man who doesn't take 'no' for an answer," Safavian said to explain why he expended time and effort to provide information about the property and supported an eventual meeting between GSA officials and representatives of the school, including Abramoff's wife. That effort did not constitute "seeking to do business before the GSA," Safavian argued, in part because he felt it had virtually no chance of panning out.

At another point, Safavian attributed differences between his own decision-making and that of a GSA colleague to his having joined the federal government from Capitol Hill. Before entering GSA as chief of staff, Safavian had worked on the Hill as chief of staff for Rep. Chris Cannon, R-Utah, as well as in other staff positions. He also had worked previously as a lobbyist at the firms Preston Gates Ellis LLP and Janus-Merritt Strategies.

Safavian testified that in the process of advising Abramoff regarding the lobbyist's efforts to acquire the Old Post Office building in Washington, D.C., he at one point realized that pushback from GSA colleagues "was a sign for me that I shouldn't be so close with Jack Abramoff."

In a tough line of questioning that continued from Friday into Monday, federal prosecutor Peter Zeidenberg pushed Safavian to explain why he had not more closely examined his own invitation to join the lobbyist on the 2002 golfing trip to Scotland that has since landed several participants in hot water. Zeidenberg questioned why Safavian had accepted Abramoff's figure of $3,100 as his share of the trip, showing photographs of the luxury hotels where the group stayed and the charter airplane they had flown on.

Government lawyers presented credit card and automated teller machine receipts as evidence that Safavian had been spending generously, and said Abramoff's pre-trip estimate of $3,100 could not have been expected to include both scheduled and spontaneous costs. Multiple rounds of golf at $400 each, $100 caddie tips and rounds of expensive Scotch for the group should have led the defendant to question the modest sum he had paid in advance of leaving the United States, Zeidenberg argued.

Safavian answered many of the questions with the response that it had not occurred to him to verify the individual expenses, and that he had no reason to think Abramoff would have under-reported the cost of the trip.

"He knew I didn't want to take a gift," Safavian said. "He also knew I was concerned about appearances [of a conflict of interest]. Why would he sandbag me that way?"

Asked if he was still friends with Abramoff, Safavian said, "We haven't spoken in a long time but yes, I will always consider him my friend."

Following a morning of close questioning on Monday, Safavian was apparently not feeling well. A nurse entered the courtroom at a break for lunch, and when court resumed, the judge indicated that should Safavian feel unwell, proceedings could be stopped for a break.

The defense continued uninterrupted before concluding in the afternoon, however. Due to scheduling conflicts, closing arguments in the case will be heard Monday, June 12, following which the jury will begin its deliberations.

Takes Stand To Counter Harm Of Tapes, 'bag Man' Testimony (MCA)

By Lawrence Buser

Memphis Commercial Appeal, June 6, 2006

June 6, 2006 Former state senator Roscoe Dixon took the stand Monday in his bribery trial, hoping to undo five days of testimony and secret recordings that prosecutors say illustrate a politician on the take.

Dixon, who resumes the stand today, testified for about 45 minutes near the end of the day, telling jurors of his family background, of working and attending college, of 16 years of service in the Army and Tennessee National Guard and his life as a legislator from 1982 to 1994.

"Lobbyists play a very powerful role," said Dixon, who addressed jurors in a personable manner and sometimes added gentle humor to his answers. "They are promoting their interests and protecting their concerns. Everybody wants to get your ear.

"There are dinners and receptions. You can go up there weighing 160 pounds and leave weighing 240. It's hard to pass up all that food."

Dixon is charged in a five-count indictment with conspiracy to commit extortion and bribery for allegedly accepting $9,500 in payoffs from informants and undercover FBI agents running a fictitious company called E-Cycle Management Inc.

The ruse was that E-Cycle needed special legislation to be successful, and that its representatives were willing to pay legislators for their help.

Ten people, including five present or former legislators, were indicted in the case known as the Tennessee Waltz.

Defense attorney Coleman Garrett has argued that Dixon was entrapped and that the agents and informants "tricked" his client into taking payoffs.

Federal prosecutor Tim DiScenza contends Dixon was predisposed to accept bribes and that a preliminary investigation showed he solicited payments in 2003 from lobbyist Tim Willis, who was seeking TennCare status for a children's dental clinic.

Willis, a convicted felon in an unrelated credit card fraud case, was a key government informant in the investigation.

Willis began his cooperation after the FBI began investigating him in a bogus invoice scheme in 2001 at Juvenile Court, where he had a contract as a consultant. He also has admitted lying to a grand jury, but has not been charged with a crime in either case.

Prosecutors presented a somewhat streamlined case that involved 15 witnesses -- including Dixon's self-described "bag man" Barry Myers -- and just a few of the hundreds of hours of audio and video that was secretly recorded.

In other testimony Monday, undercover FBI agent "L.C. McNiel," whose real name was not revealed, identified himself in a surveillance tape counting out $2,000 in cash for Dixon aide Myers on May 14, 2004, at E-Cycle's office Downtown.

On the tape, Myers tells McNiel that Dixon "needs two" and that "Roscoe is solidly on board" in helping promote legislation favorable for E-Cycle.

McNiel testified that Myers made it clear that he was picking up money for Dixon. Prosecutors and witnesses have said Dixon's euphemism for seeking payoffs is "take care of Barry" and "keep Barry happy."

"I want to know what I'm paying for," McNiel says on the tape, adding that he wants people who can bring contracts to the table. "I want to know what I'm getting. ... You don't mind these 50s do you?"

McNiel said that, in a later conversation, he voiced concern about paying Dixon, who was considering leaving his Senate seat for a county government post.

In a recording played in court, Dixon assures McNiel that he will be in an even better position to help deliver business to E-Cycle because of his connections to other politicians.

"We got a team," says Dixon, who makes references to Kathryn Bowers, former congressman Harold Ford Sr., County Mayor A C Wharton and others. "It's a network."

Dixon left his Senate seat in January 2005 to become the $101,856-a-year assistant chief administrative officer under Wharton, a post he resigned after his indictment last May.

On the tape, Dixon tells McNiel that administrators are "always the big dogs on the porch," but that his dream job is that of city mayor.

Roscoe Dixon Appears On Witness Stand (WMC-TV)

WMC-TV, June 6, 2006

On his way out of federal court, former State Senator Roscoe Dixon wouldn't answer questions about his first stint on the witness stand.

Dixon states, "If I talk to y'all the judge will get mad. Do you think it's in your best interest to talk? The judge will get mad."

Dixon's attorney did shed some light on why his client chose to aid in his own defense.

Dixon is accused of taking more than 9-thousand dollars in bribes to push legislation for E-Cycle Management, a bogus company created by the FBI as part of Operation Tennessee Waltz.

Before Dixon took the stand, prosecutors showed jurors this 2004 video they say shows an undercover FBI agent counting out two thousand dollars in cash for bagman Barry Meyers to give to Dixon.

In FBI undercover video used in court, Meyers is heard calling Dixon during the meeting: "(Meyers) - Hey, Roscoe, this is Barry. Give me a call as soon as you get this message. I know you probably still in a meeting so give me a call. Thanks. He'll call me back. He's still in a meeting." (UC) You don't mind these 50's do you? (meyers) I mean, he, he...as long as it's two he's straight."

After court, I tried to ask Dixon about the tape.

When questioned about the video, Dixon is asked by attorneys, "Is there any concern on your part about what's on those tapes?"

Dixon replies, "I can't talk, remember I got a gag order."

Dixon's attorney says his client's defense will come out in court.

Roscoe Dixon Takes The Stand (WPTY-TV)

WPTY-TV, June 6, 2006

New information tonight in the Tennessee Waltz corruption investigation. Former State Senator Roscoe Dixon took the stand on his own behalf late Monday afternoon. Dixon's lawyer Coleman Garrett says his client had no choice but to testify. He says, "He's been accused of committing a crime!"

Dixon is facing bribery and corruption charges. Monday morning, an undercover F.B.I. agent testified he gave Dixon money. He also testified he gave Dixon's friend Barry Myers $2,000 to be given to Dixon.

Prosecutors say the cash was funneled through Dixon's close friend Barry Myers. Former Tennessee State Senator Roscoe Dixon isn't talking to the media because of a judge's order, but video and audio recordings gave jurors a first hand account of what the prosecution says happened. The videos include Dixon taking money from FBI informant Tim Willis. There is also video of Myers and Willis exchanging money.

Tim Willis was the go-between for E-cycle. E-cycle is the name of the fake company set up by the FBI to catch lawmakers taking bribes. Prosecutors say their video and audio tapes prove Dixon is guilty of doing just that. The former Tennessee state senator is expected to tell his side of the story in federal court tomorrow. His trial resumes at 9 a.m.

Waltz Figure Said He Needed Money (KNOXNS/AP)

By Woody Baird, Associated Press

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), June 6, 2006

MEMPHIS — A former state senator charged in an FBI bribery sting complained that his job as a lawmaker paid too little, according to a recording played for a federal jury Monday.

"I need to get in the big league, man," Roscoe Dixon said on a recording played at his bribery and extortion trial.

L.C. McNeil, an FBI agent testifying under his code name, said the recording was made in August 2004 when he was talking with Dixon about the senator's desire to leave the Legislature.

McNeil was pretending to be vice president of E-Cycle Management, a company seeking legislative favors from Tennessee lawmakers. He used the name "McNeil" during the investigation, and Judge Jon McCalla allowed him to continue using it in court.

Dixon was running for clerk of Shelby County General Sessions Court when the audio recording was made, and McNeil said he was worried that if Dixon left the Senate, E-Cycle would lose influence in the Legislature.

Dixon is one of five current or former state lawmakers indicted in a federal investigation, code named Tennessee Waltz, that focused on E-Cycle, the fake company created by the FBI. He is the first lawmaker to go to trial.

The trial began last week, and prosecutors have played several secretly made audio and video recordings of Dixon for the jury.

Dixon, a Democrat, lost the clerks race and stayed in the Senate. He resigned last year, shortly before his indictment, to take a top job with the Shelby County mayor's office.

In the conversation with McNeil, Dixon referred to administrative government jobs with good salaries, large staffs and contract-signing authority as "big league."

He complained that no matter how much per diem pay he drew above base salary, he could not make more than $30,000 a year as a Senator. "Everybody got some semi-hustle," he said of the state Legislature.

On the recording, McNeil expresses concern that Dixon will no longer be able to help E-Cycle if he leaves the Senate.

Dixon says he will still be part of a political "network" in Memphis and can use the court clerk's office to lobby the Legislature.

"I'll have a credit card and I'll have more power and sway over them than I do as senator," he says.

One lawmaker charged in the Tennessee Waltz scandal, former Rep. Chris Newton, R-Cleveland, has pleaded guilty and is serving a one-year prison sentence. The other are awaiting trial.

Three county officials in Chattanooga and Memphis also were charged in the investigation as were two accused "bagmen" who have pleaded guilty to handling payoffs for lawmakers.

FBI Agent Testifies In Bribery Trial (WTVF-TV)

WTVF-TV, June 6, 2006

The public corruption trial of former state Senator Roscoe Dixon was in its fourth day in Memphis on Monday.

Dixon faces bribery charges from an undercover sting, Operation Tennessee Waltz.

Monday, a top FBI agent involved in sting took the stand.

The agent testified that he posed as a vice president of E-Cycle Management, a fake company set up by the FBI.

The agent told the jury he talked to Barry Myers about paying bribes to Dixon. Myers has been described as a "bag man" by federal investigators.

The trial was expected to last several weeks.

Witness: Mayor's Aides Gave Marching Orders (CHIT)

By Dan Mihalopoulos And Rudolph Bush, Tribune Staff Reporters

Chicago Tribune, June 6, 2006

From the time Mayor Richard Daley took office, dozens of city department managers gathered before elections at the plumbers' union hall or other sites to get campaign marching orders from top mayoral aides, a former Daley loyalist testified Monday in the City Hall corruption trial.

Donald Tomczak, a longtime Water Department official and veteran political operative, said he then would summon his top deputies to his office in the Jardine Filtration Plant to tell them which candidates would get help from hundreds of blue-collar city water workers.

After elections, Daley aide Robert Sorich fielded requests for promotions from the political workers and tried to accommodate them, Tomczak told jurors. When Sorich rewarded his effective campaign workers by advancing their careers, Tomczak said, he thanked Sorich.

But Tomczak said he also made sure to complain to Sorich when his campaign troops did not get what they wanted: "Robert, how can I keep this thing together if I can't get these people promoted?"

Tomczak is the latest in a growing line of former Daley administration officials to detail systematic patronage hiring in the federal trial of Sorich and ex-city officials Timothy McCarthy, John Sullivan and Patrick Slattery.

DOJ_NMG_0032058

Prosecutors say the four were involved in a scheme to rig hiring and promotions in favor of applicants endorsed by the mayor's office, including pro-Daley political workers, in violation of a federal court decree restricting patronage.

Although Daley has long insisted that machine politics in Chicago are dead, Tomczak described a Daley campaign organization in which high-ranking city officials doubled as political coordinators. Promotions for water workers were based more on precinct-by-precinct election results than actual job performance, Tomczak said.

Tomczak, 70, provided jurors with a tale of his lifetime journey through Chicago politics and City Hall—from his first public job as a Water Department laborer to his admission last year that city trucking contractors gave him almost $400,000 in bribes.

His 45-year career in local politics began when Tomczak joined the payroll in 1958 as a lowly asphalt helper.

"The minute I got my city job, I was active in politics as an assistant precinct captain for the 11th Ward," he said, referring to the Democratic organization in the Daley family's political power base on the South Side.

Tomczak rose to a high-ranking post in the Water Department in 1982, but he lost the job after Harold Washington became mayor, and his legal efforts to get it back proved unsuccessful. The first deputy commissioner's job was his again, however, when Daley was elected in 1989.

For the next 14 years, Tomczak testified, he was the leader of between 100 and 250 department workers who served in his political army. The troops were divided into three groups—black, white and Latino—because "areas that we worked in were diverse areas. We needed groups to go in and talk to the various people."

The directors of the mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs dictated which politicians would enjoy the campaign support of the political groups led by city officials, Tomczak said. Until they were charged criminally last year, Sorich and McCarthy worked in Intergovernmental Affairs, which Tomczak repeatedly referred to in his testimony as "the patronage office."

From 1989 until he left city government in 2003, Tomczak said his campaign group took orders from Timothy Degnan, Victor Reyes and John Doerrer. Degnan was Daley's first Office of Intergovernmental Affairs director, and his protégé, Reyes, succeeded him in 1995. Reyes gave way in 2000 to Doerrer, who resigned last year.

Degnan, Reyes and Doerrer have not been charged, although prosecutors have referred to Reyes as a "co-schemer" in the alleged hiring fraud scheme.

Directed by that trio, Tomczak said, he deployed water workers to help Al Gore for president, Glenn Poshard for governor, Rahm Emanuel for Congress, Patricia Bailey for Illinois House, Iris Martinez for Illinois Senate and two aldermen, Emma Mitts (37th) and Ted Matlak (32nd).

Tomczak said the only times he directed his workers independently of the mayor's office were when his son, Jeff, ran for Congress and for Will County state's attorney.

He said he met with Sorich after elections to single out particularly good political workers who merited promotions. Tomczak told jurors that Sorich would reply, "Don, we'll see what we can do," and promised to talk to Reyes or Doerrer.

In 2001, when there were openings for district foremen in his department, Tomczak said two men were promoted on the basis of their "great job" in campaigns. But he named four other applicants he said were better qualified and did not get promoted for lack of support from the mayor's office.

As part of his guilty plea last year, Tomczak agreed to cooperate with federal prosecutors. In exchange, he will be sentenced to 4 years in prison instead of receiving a longer term.

Tomczak's comments Monday echoed earlier testimony by Daniel Katalinic, who led a white ethnic political group of Streets and Sanitation workers, and Mary Jo Falcon, who was the political coordinator of Asian city workers in the Sewers Department.

Earlier Monday, an assistant commissioner in the Department of Streets and Sanitation testified that Slattery told her in 2004 that he had no legitimate business reason for hiring a series of laborers in the department.

Catharine Hennessy said Slattery made the statement after she requested a series of applicant ratings forms to answer a local laborer union's grievance.

'Were They Best Men For The Jobs?' 'No' (CHIST)

By NATASHA KORECKI, TIM NOVAK AND STEVE WARMBIR, Staff Reporters

Chicago Sun-Times, June 6, 2006

Political performance trumped qualifications when it came to hiring in the city Water Department, former No. 2 man Donald Tomczak testified Monday at the City Hall hiring trial.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Patrick Collins asked if two soldiers in Tomczak's political army deserved the city positions they were given.

"Were they the best men for the jobs?" Collins asked.

"No," Tomczak said plainly. "They were active in my political group and did a good job."

HIGHLIGHTS

PROSECUTION: Key witness Donald Tomczak says politics -- not qualifications -- won candidates jobs in the city's Water Department.

DEFENSE: Will likely question Tomczak's motives to testify by exploring his deal with federal prosecutors.

UP NEXT: Defense lawyers will have a shot at Tomczak's testimony.

Clout on Wheels

The scandal of the city's Hired Truck Program - a Chicago Sun-Times investigation.

Showing Tomczak a list of all the job candidates, Collins asked who deserved the posts if politics weren't a factor. Tomczak picked out several different names.

Tomczak, 70, who ran one of the largest city-based political armies and is one of the highest-ranking city officials convicted in the scandalous Hired Truck Program, gave an insider's view on how hiring operated in City Hall.

He testified in the trial of Robert Sorich, a former top official in the Mayor's Office of Intergovernmental Affairs, and three others who are accused of letting politics determine hiring. Prosecutors contend that violates the Shakman decree, which is supposed to keep most city jobs free of political influence.

Tomczak said he once sued the city, claiming former Mayor Harold Washington fired him for political reasons. He was rehired and grew a political group to 250 people who were sent out to work on campaigns of Al Gore, Rahm Emanuel and mayoral and aldermanic races.

Tomczak said he'd meet with Sorich after campaigns and make pitches on who deserved city jobs as rewards. He'd leave index cards with names of political workers, he said. Sorich never made guarantees and often said he'd have to consult with his bosses: either Victor Reyes or John Doerrer, Tomczak said.

If Tomczak's people weren't chosen, he'd press Sorich: "How can I keep this thing together?" meaning his political group.

"I'll talk to Victor [Reyes]," he said Sorich reassured him.

Reyes, who also ran the mayor's Hispanic Democratic Organization, has come up repeatedly at trial but not been charged.

Under Tomczak's deal with prosecutors, he'll face four years in prison instead of up to nine years for taking Hired Truck bribes.

Also Monday, Catharine Hennessy, assistant commissioner in Streets and Sanitation, said the city got into a messy situation when a union challenged a batch of hirings. Hennessy said Sorich codefendant Patrick Slattery, who she said briefly handled personnel decisions, couldn't come up with rating forms to show the union.

"Pat, please tell me you had a legitimate business reason for the selections," she said she asked Slattery. Slattery simply said "no," she testified.

Slattery lawyer Patrick Blegen challenged Hennessy on whether his client really gave a one-word response. She stuck with her answer.

Hennessy locked into a tense courtroom exchange with Blegen, often smirking, and battling him on nearly every question.

Hennessy acted as a liaison to the Law Department. She is married to Edward Hennessy, an attorney and partner with the firm Hennessy & Roach. The city has regularly hired the firm to work in cases involving injured city employees. The city paid Hennessy & Roach $646,360 in 2004 and $286,063 through July 2005. There is no indication Hennessy & Roach was involved in Streets and Sanitation cases. The firm is retained by the City Council Committee on Finance headed by Ald. Edward M. Burke (14th).

Report Cites Abuse By Fired UMDNJ Dean (PHI)

By Troy Graham

The Philadelphia Inquirer, June 6, 2006

The allegations that have been swirling around Warren Wallace for weeks finally came to light yesterday, and the details were not pretty.

A federal monitor investigating the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey, where Wallace was a senior dean until he was fired last week, accused him of manipulating the petty-cash system and steering a lucrative no-bid catering and cafeteria contract to a friend.

The monitor's report also said Wallace, a Gloucester County freeholder and chairman of the Delaware River and Bay Authority, had devoted "significant" amounts of university time and resources to his political jobs.

And, finally, the monitor said Wallace had tried this spring to get his daughter into the university's School of Osteopathic Medicine in Stratford, where he was responsible for admissions, even though she did not write the required essays or take the required tests.

The monitor said Wallace's actions were, "at a minimum, unethical."

Gov. Corzine said yesterday that Wallace should step down from the bay authority's board if there was credible evidence against him. Wallace's term expires at the end of the month.

"If he does not step aside, he will not likely be reappointed," Corzine spokesman Anthony Coley said.

Wallace did not return a message left on his cell phone yesterday. His attorney, Carl Poplar, also did not return a call.

State Sen. Stephen Sweeney (D., Gloucester), the Gloucester County freeholder director, spoke in support of Wallace.

"It's a report. And he will have his chance to respond to the report, and I'm going to wait for his response," Sweeney said. "He's told me he did nothing wrong, and I trust Warren and believe him."

In December, U.S. Attorney Christopher J. Christie appointed a federal monitor, former U.S. District Judge Herbert J. Stern, to investigate the university. The appointment came in a deal that deferred prosecution of the school on allegations of Medicare and Medicaid fraud.

Stern has launched more than a dozen investigations, and two other high-ranking deans have resigned, but no new criminal charges have been filed.

The monitor received a tip May 17 that Wallace's secretary was shredding documents, and the FBI quickly raided his office. Wallace was fired from his $166,000-a-year job in anticipation of the monitor's findings.

The monitor said a forensic analysis of Wallace's computer had found nearly 5,000 files dealing with his political jobs, and only 350 dealing with the admissions committee at the school.

Sweeney said Wallace had permission to do other work at the school.

"My understanding was it was just e-mails being sent and he had approval from the administration," he said. "It's a state university, and the bay authority is a state agency."

The report also said Wallace had told three other school employees to submit his travel expenses in their names, telling them he had been ordered to do this so that his travel expenses would appear to be smaller than they were. Some of the expenses were for travel related to his other jobs, the monitor said.

Since 2000, those employees submitted at least $2,500 worth of Wallace's expenses.

The findings also accused Wallace of steering a no-bid food-services contract to his friend Sal Randazzo. Since 2003, the school has paid Randazzo nearly $300,000 for catering nearly 1,000 events. At the same time, Wallace was allowed to eat for free at the cafeteria, Top Doc Cafe.

The monitor said "such a contract should not have been awarded without a public bidding process as required by law and UMDNJ policy."

Spokeswoman Anna Farneski said the university was "reviewing the food-service contract and expense issues outlined in today's report."

The report also said Wallace had arranged for a relative - identified through other sources as his daughter - to be interviewed by members of the admissions committee even though her application was incomplete. Two members gave her the highest possible score, "which is out of the ordinary considering all of the attendant factors," the monitor wrote.

Farneski said Wallace's daughter had withdrawn her application for admission in the fall.

"Dr. Wallace's interference with the admissions process was unethical and unacceptable," she said. "Upon becoming aware of the issue... we immediately relieved him of his admissions duties, and ultimately terminated his employment."

Report Faults Ex-dean (CAMCP)

By Sarah Greenblatt

Camden Courier-Post, June 6, 2006

A former dean at the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey bypassed the university's admissions and financial systems and conducted political business from his campus office, a federal monitor's report said Monday.

Former School of Osteopathic Medicine associate dean Warren Wallace steered a no-bid food-service contract to a friend, used his office for political activities, rigged travel-expense records and helped a relative gain admission to school, according to the report.

Wallace's UMDNJ computer showed seven times more files related to his activities on the Gloucester County freeholder board and the Delaware River & Bay Authority than to his duties as the school's chief admissions administrator, the report said.

But Wallace was fired last Thursday for using his authority over the admissions process to benefit his daughter, according to a UMDNJ spokeswoman.

Neither Wallace nor his attorney returned calls seeking comment on Monday.

Wallace declined to be interviewed by the monitor's office, according to the 15-page report.

The report said members of the school's Admissions Committee said Wallace forced them to interview a relative who had not yet taken the Medical College Aptitude Test or completed application essays.

Committee members told investigators that Wallace's actions damaged the school's reputation, but he defended his behavior in a letter to the panel's chairman, the report said. Wallace's efforts on his daughter's behalf ultimately caused UMDNJ officials to fire him, university spokeswoman Anna Farneski said on Monday.

"Dr. Wallace's interference with the admissions process was unethical and unacceptable," Farneski said. "Upon becoming aware of the issue, one and one-half weeks ago, we immediately relieved him of his admissions duties, and ultimately terminated his employment."

Farneski also said Wallace's daughter recently withdrew her application.

University officials are still reviewing issues tied to Wallace's alleged steering of a food-service contract to a friend and manipulating petty-cash procedures, Farneski said.

The monitor's report -- issued as part of a deferred prosecution agreement between UMDNJ and U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie -- said Wallace helped his friend, Sal Randazzo, secure a food-service and catering contract without submitting a bid.

The owner of Randazzo's Pizza and Pasta in Washington Township and a neighbor who lives on the same block as Wallace, Randazzo received a contract that has provided the restaurateur with more than $290,000 for catering between July 2003 and March 2006, the report said.

The contract was projected to cost the school $50,000 to $65,000 per year, according to a UMDNJ memo attached to the report.

Despite a profit-sharing provision of the contract, the report said, Randazzo has not provided the school with financial records.

A young man who answered the phone at Randazzo's home said he was not there but refused to take a message.

The report also alleged that Wallace directed subordinates to submit vouchers for some of his travel expenses in their own names, allowing him to approve the expenditures and bypass scrutiny by superiors.

UMDNJ employees told investigators that Wallace had said the arrangement was required by former Dean Michael Gallagher, who stepped down in April amid allegations that he billed the university for $200,000 in extravagances and rigged financial records to qualify for a bonus.

Some of Wallace's travel costs were tied to his activities as a freeholder and member of the DRBA, the monitor's report said.

Wallace's political activities accounted for more of the activity on the administrator's UMDNJ computer than his duties at the school, the report said.

A forensic analysis of Wallace's computer showed 119,501 references to the DRBA, freeholder activities, Gloucester County and Washington Township, compared to 16,968 references to the school's admissions committee, which the administrator oversaw.

While portions of the report released to the public did not describe the nature of Wallace's political activities on the Stratford campus, John Inglesino, an attorney in the monitor's office, hinted that Christie may be reviewing the matter.

Calling Wallace's actions "unethical at a minimum," Inglesino declined to say if he broke any laws.

"It's not our role to characterize something as illegal or legal," Inglesino said. "It's our role simply to report the facts."

Michael Drewniak, a spokesman for Christie, declined to comment.

The report also noted that the monitor received a tip on May 17 that a UMDNJ employee in Wallace's office was shredding documents that might be related to the investigation. The shredding operation was halted, the report said, adding that the university has since banned the destruction of documents on the Stratford campus.

Among the investigations still under way is a probe of the role at UMDNJ of state Sen. Wayne Bryant, D-Lawnside, who received a $38,000 contract to serve as a liaison to the school.

Relatives Of Mob-hit Victim Blame Government For His Death (AP)

AP, June 6, 2006

BOSTON -- John McIntyre thought he was going to a house party on Nov. 30, 1984.

Instead, he was chained to a chair, interrogated, strangled, then shot in the head.

McIntyre's family is suing the federal government for $50 million, alleging that McIntyre was killed by fugitive crime boss James "Whitey" Bulger after former FBI Agent John Connolly tipped him that McIntyre was cooperating with authorities in an investigation of Bulger.

As the McIntyre family's wrongful death lawsuit went to trial Monday, attorney Steven Gordon gave chilling details of McIntyre's killing.

Gordon said McIntyre was lured to a house by Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi, leaders of the notorious Winter Hill Gang.

After he arrived carrying a case of beer, McIntyre was handcuffed and chained to a chair, then interrogated by Bulger, who asked him if he was talking to authorities about Bulger's failed plan to ship guns to the Irish Republican Army on a Gloucester fishing boat.

"It did not take much time for John McIntyre to say he was," Gordon said.

Gordon said Bulger tied a boat rope around McIntyre's neck and tried to strangle him, but when that took too long, he decided to shoot him.

Gordon said Bulger asked McIntyre, "Do you want one to the head?"

"The last words spoken on this earth by John McIntyre was a plaintive, 'Yes, please,' " Gordon said.

Then Bulger shot him in the head, Gordon said.

Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi, Bulger's former right hand man, who pleaded guilty to participating in McIntyre's death, is expected to be a key witness for the McIntyre family.

Flemmi, who is serving a life sentence in 10 killings as part of a plea deal that spared him the death penalty, testified in a deposition last year that Connolly told Bulger that McIntyre had begun talking to federal authorities about Bulger's criminal activities.

Flemmi testified only briefly Monday before the trial recessed for the day. He is scheduled to resume his testimony Tuesday.

Connolly was convicted in 2002 on racketeering and other charges for tipping Bulger _ who himself was an FBI informant _ that he was about to be indicted. Bulger fled on the eve of his 1995 indictment and remains a fugitive on the FBI's "Most Wanted" list.

Gordon said the government acknowledged in the criminal case against Connolly that he is the one who revealed McIntyre's identity. Kevin Weeks, Bulger's former enforcer, testifying for the government at Connolly's trial, described McIntyre's killing in gruesome detail and said Bulger learned of McIntyre's identity from Connolly.

"McIntyre's cooperation was a direct threat to Bulger's group and a direct threat to Bulger's relationship with the FBI," said Gordon, who also said he plans to call Weeks as a witness.

But Bridget Bailey Lipscomb, an attorney for the Justice Department, said that there is no direct evidence that Connolly revealed McIntyre's name to Bulger. She said Flemmi, in his deposition, said only that Connolly told Bulger that one of two people who were arrested on the fishing boat was an informant. She also said that Bulger had other law enforcement sources who could have given him McIntyre's identity.

She said that McIntyre, who was acting as an informant for U.S. Customs agents, had declined the agency's offer to place him in the witness protection program.

Lipscomb said the McIntyre case had been unfairly portrayed in the media as part of a wave of negative publicity surrounding the FBI's use of criminal informants.

Bulger and Flemmi were longtime informants who provided the FBI with information on the mafia, which the Bulger gang considered its main rival for criminal rackets in the Boston area, including gambling, drugs and loan-sharking.

Connolly's case and others prompted an uproar and Congressional hearings into the relationship between the FBI and its criminal informants.

Lipscomb said the media had depicted the Boston FBI office as "a bunch of renegade agents" who allowed its informants to commit murder so that it could achieve its goal of dismantling the Mafia.

"We believe that this is a case about fact and fiction," Lipscomb said. "It's fiction that the federal government did not protect John McIntyre and intentionally had him killed."

Connolly, who has not been charged in McIntyre's killing, is now serving a 10-year sentence and is currently awaiting trial in Florida in connection with the 1982 slaying of Miami gambling executive John Callahan.

McIntyre's mother, Emily, who filed the lawsuit, did not attend the trial Monday. Gordon said Emily McIntyre did not want to see Flemmi, who has admitted pulling out McIntyre's teeth after he was killed.

FUGITIVE COUPLE ACCUSED OF SELLING CHILDREN (AP)

AP, June 6, 2006

A fugitive couple accused of trying to sell their children in Mexico spent the weekend in San Diego jails will be extradited to Arizona.

The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children reportedly tipped off federal investigators about the couple. The tip led Mexican authorities to arrest 20-year-old Jessica Karin Heird and 37-year-old Edward Henry Leader in Tijuana on Friday.

Mexican authorities reportedly found the couple's 3-year-old son, but their 18-month-old daughter was still missing. The San Diego Union-Tribune reported that the boy and girl were sold, though there was no word on who paid for the children or what the price was.

Heird was being held on a $12,500 bond.

Leader was being held on no bail and is wanted in Arizona on kidnapping charges. A U.S. Justice Department spokesman says Heird is six months pregnant with the couple's fourth child. He says authorities recovered three of Leader's other children from a different relationship.

Couple Awaits Extradition In Child-Selling Case (KGTV)

KGTV, San Diego, June 6, 2006

A couple who allegedly sold two of their children in Baja California were behind bars Monday and awaiting extradition to Arizona, where the youngsters went missing several years ago, authorities said Monday.

Federal agents arrested Jessica Karin Heird, 20, and Edward Henry Leader, 37, at San Ysidro Port of Entry on Friday night.

Mexican authorities had detained them in Tijuana earlier in the day.

Heird -- who is six months pregnant -- and Leader had been living south of the border for several years and allegedly decided to make money by selling two of their youngest children, Deputy U.S. Marshal Omar Castillo said Monday.

Investigators believe the suspects took cash for their 18-month-old daughter and 3-year-old son. Authorities have since recovered the youngsters, who evidently were not physically harmed during their ordeals, Castillo said.

The intentions of those who bought the children remain unclear. No additional arrests have been announced.

Leader has fathered at least six children, the three youngest with Heird, according to investigators.

His eldest child, a 16-year-old girl, remains missing. She is considered a runaway and likely remains in Mexico, Castillo said.

Police believe Leader tried to force the girl into become a prostitute.

?When the child resisted, he would try to beat her into prostitution. We know he was trying to force her from the e-mails she was sending to her grandparents,? said another official involved in the investigation.

The chain of events began in 2000, when Heird disappeared from her home in Mohave, Ariz., Castillo said. Police thought she was with a man and headed to Mexico.

Heird evidently became involved with Leader in Nevada in 2002, according to federal investigators.

Social workers found her through a child-neglect complaint lodged in Las Vegas, and she was returned to her mother, who eventually gained custody of the children.

Some time later, Heird took the children out, purportedly for a walk, and never returned, Castillo said. She and the children apparently met up with Leader somewhere in Mohave, and then headed to Mexico.

When Heird turned 18, Arizona authorities issued a warrant for her arrest on suspicion of kidnapping her children.

Recently, the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children received information that Heird and Leader had been spotted in Baja, and U.S. Marshals personnel in San Diego were asked to help. Heird's mother will regain custody of two of her daughter's children, while Leader's will be placed with a guardian, Tyler said.

?When she took the kids, it was a shock. I didn?t know what to do,? said Angelika Heird.

Heird remained in Las Colinas Detention Facility in Santee this afternoon on a fugitive warrant. Her bail was set at $12,500. Leader was being held without bail in county jail in downtown San Diego.

'Mafia Cops' Get Life In Prison (NSDY)

By Anthony M. Destefano, Newsday Staff Writer

Long Island Newsday, June 6, 2006

The "Mafia Cops" took eight lives and yesterday, they learned theirs would be lost to prison.

Saying their crimes were the worst he ever saw, a Brooklyn federal judge hit two ex-Police Department detectives with life terms in prison and million-dollar fines for their roles as mob hit men.

"It is hard to visualize a more heinous offense," said Judge Jack B. Weinstein as he announced in a packed courtroom the heavy sentences for Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa for their roles in eight gangland murders during a bloody period that stretched from the mid-1980s into the early 1990s.

"These are probably the most heinous crimes ever tried in this courthouse," Weinstein said.

"These two men stand before you unrepentant and remorseless and perhaps by a higher power unforgivable," said lead prosecutor, Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert Henoch. "Police are supposed to protect people; we don't have death squads here -- at least we aren't supposed to."

Delay in serving sentences

But in another twist in a case that has been filled with complex legal issues, Weinstein delayed imposition of the sentences until hearings are held later this month on critical post-trial motions for either acquittal or new trials. Both defendants will remain jailed but have asked Weinstein to overturn the April guilty verdicts, in part because the statute of limitations on the federal racketeering charges had expired.

Weinstein is also going to hold a hearing on Eppolito's and Caracappa's claims that their high-profile lawyers, Bruce Cutler and Edward Hayes, respectively, gave them ineffective representation. The lawyers have denied that claim. But no matter how Weinstein decides those issues, the case will be litigated for years.

"I didn't do any of these crimes at all," said Eppolito in a short, rambling statement. "I was one hell of a cop. I tried my best in my cases."

Eppolito asked the victims' family members to visit him in prison so he could prove his innocence to them, drawing audible scoffs from the relatives.

But as Eppolito spoke he was interrupted by a shouting Barry Gibbs, whose murder conviction was overturned last year because of allegations that Eppolito coerced a witness to testify falsely.

"You remember me, Mister Eppolito, you remember me!" shouted out Gibbs.

"No, I don't," replied a startled Eppolito.

As federal marshals hustled Gibbs out of the courtroom, he kept screaming.

Neither Eppolito, 57, nor Caracappa, 64, who didn't address the court, showed any emotion as family members of the victims addressed the court and told how the murders impacted their lives. The defendants sat glumly and looked on intently as the relatives spoke.

Eppolito's son, Louis Jr., was the only relative of the defendants to appear in court.

Robbed of childhood

Addressing the court, one victim's daughter, 30-year-old Michal Greenwald said, "You took away our Daddy and by doing that you took away our childhood. You took away our mother. You stole our innocence. You filled our nights with nightmares and our days with torture."

Eppolito and Caracappa were convicted of not only playing roles in the murder of jewelry merchant Israel Greenwald but also seven other victims, including reputed Gambino crime family member Edward Lino, James Hydell and Otto Heidel. All were killed, prosecutors said, at the behest of the Luchese crime family, which used Eppolito and Caracappa as law enforcement moles and contract killers.

Widowed Leah Greenwald, 51, of Fresh Meadows, looked at both defendants as she asked for a maximum sentence.

"You must pay severely for what you have done, for you did not just kill one person, you killed a family," she said.

An angry Daniello Lino, 27, daughter of the slain Edward Lino, seemed to spit out her words as she stared at Eppolito and Caracappa.

"You two are an embarrassment to the New York City Police Department, and furthermore are one of the largest blemishes in the department's history," she said.

For 2 Ex-Detectives, Life Terms And Tales Of Grief (NYT)

By Alan Feuer

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

Calling their crimes the "most heinous" he had ever seen in court, a federal judge issued — but did not officially impose — life in prison sentences yesterday for two retired New York detectives convicted in April of taking part in at least eight murders for the mob.

The sentencing of the men, Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa, drew to a conditional close a stunning case of police corruption that began 20 years ago when they stopped a jeweler on the highway, helped to kill him and later left his body buried under concrete in an auto-body shop.

The judge, Jack B. Weinstein, issued the harshest penalty he could, but held up its imposition until he conducts a hearing later this month to determine if the men had shoddy lawyers, as they contend, and deserve a new trial.

There was little reaction from either man in Federal District Court in Brooklyn and both returned to jail, where Mr. Caracappa's face has grown skeletal and Mr. Eppolito has grown a white goatee and gotten somewhat slimmer.

By law, the friends and family of a victim can address the court at sentencing, and before the penalty was read, there were brutally emotional — and achingly personal — accounts from the survivors.

One of them was Michal Weinstein, daughter of the jeweler, Israel Greenwald, who on Feb. 10, 1986, disappeared after giving young Michal a hug as she waited for a bus. She was 10 years old then, and as she spoke from the stand, addressing both defendants by name, it was with a caged fury that only now, after 20 years, had found release.

"You took away our daddy," she said, "and by doing that you took away our childhood. You took away our mother. You stole our innocence. You filled our nights with nightmares and our days with torture."

She posed a list of questions to the men: Did they know what it was like to be asked about your father and not have an answer? To be treated with fear and pity? To watch from the window as your mother's car is repossessed? To leave the only home you ever knew and loved because you could not afford the mortgage? To take charity from the very charities your father once gave to? To visit a friend who had lost a loved one and be envious? Because they had a grave?

"To be envious of a grave," she said.

It seemed impossible after such a speech for another syllable to be spoken, but three more family members of victims took the stand and then, sheepishly, Mr. Eppolito rose to speak.

He began contritely, saying that he understood the families' pain and that, in 22 years as a detective, he had often had to deliver news about a death. He had knocked on doors, he said, had spoken to grieving widows — "I know the feelings."

He then invited the families of his victims — the Greenwalds, the Hydells, the Linos — to visit him in jail, where he promised he could prove to them he was an innocent man.

It was at this point that without warning and certainly without permission, a large man wearing a seashell necklace suddenly stood up.

"Mr. Eppolito!" he yelled from the gallery. "Do you remember me?"

Apparently baffled, Mr. Eppolito said, "No."

"I'm the guy you put away for 19 years! I'm Barry Gibbs! You don't remember me? You don't remember what you did to me? To my family?"

The marshals quickly led the man outside, as the courtroom burst into applause.

Mr. Gibbs went to prison 19 years ago for murder, but was released in September when a judge in Brooklyn found that Mr. Eppolito had intimidated the only eyewitness in the case into lying on the stand. Mr. Gibbs's startling appearance put something of a kink in Mr. Eppolito's speech, which he amended on the spot, repeating that he did not know the man.

Later, after Judge Weinstein issued the sentence (which, aside from life in prison, included a $1 million fine and a $400 special court fee), there was discussion of the next hearing, scheduled for June 23. At that time, it is likely that the defendants' former lawyers, Bruce Cutler and Edward Hayes, will take the stand to be questioned on their legal work at trial.

As has happened often in the case, the various players spilled outside the courthouse to discuss things with the news media.

Mr. Gibbs, tanned and healthy, said that Mr. Eppolito had taken his "constitutional rights and put them in the street."

He found a strange bedfellow in Anna Lino, wife of Edward Lino, whom Mr. Eppolito and Mr. Caracappa were found to have murdered 16 years ago.

"Nineteen years," she said. "Don't you think he has a right to have an outburst?"

Wild Day In Brooklyn Ends With Mafia Cops Sentence Pending (AP)

By LARRY McSHANE, ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, June 6, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) - A federal judge tore into two decorated ex-NYPD detectives Monday for their brutal killing spree while on the payroll of a mob underboss and told the pair he would sentence them to life in prison - but not until the "Mafia Cops" can argue their lawyers were incompetent.

In a dramatic day inside a Brooklyn courtroom, U.S. District Court Judge Jack B. Weinstein said the sentences were pending until a June 23 hearing at which Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa will argue they received inadequate legal representation at their racketeering trial. His decision to put off imposing the sentences came minutes after he had announced the prison terms to a packed courtroom.

The unusual legal twist capped an emotional day in court where five family members took the witness stand to testify how the murders linked to the two detectives had destroyed their lives.

"You did not kill one person," said Michal Greenwald Weinstein, whose father was the pair's first victim. "You killed a family."

DOJ_NMG_0032066

Another man, wrongly jailed for 19 years in a case investigated by Eppolito, was thrown out of court after launching into a rant against him.

Eppolito, speaking for the first time in court, insisted he was innocent of any crimes and encouraged the family members who called for his incarceration to visit him in jail. "I can hold my head up high," said Eppolito, sporting a freshly-sprouted snow-white goatee. "I never did any of these things."

And this all came before Weinstein's near-sentencing.

"This is probably the most heinous series of crimes ever tried in this courthouse," the judge said before announcing the delay. Eppolito and Caracappa will press forward with their request for a new trial based on claims that their attorneys failed to put on a competent defense.

Bruce Cutler, who represented Eppolito, was out of his office and unavailable for comment Monday. Hayes was in Los Angeles, and did not return a call left at his Manhattan office. The high-priced, well-known attorneys - longtime friends who greeted one another in court with a kiss - attracted a great deal of attention before the trial began.

Both defendants have been jailed since their April 6 convictions on racketeering charges that included murder, kidnapping, drug dealing and obstruction of justice.

Eppolito, 57, whose father was a member of the Gambino crime family, and Caracappa, 64, were respected detectives who worked for Luchese underboss Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso between 1986 and 1990. The eight murders were committed while they were simultaneously on the payrolls of the New York Police Department and Casso.

The sentencing delay was anticlimactic compared to the courtroom theatrics that preceded it. Barry Gibbs, who spent almost 20 years in jail after a wrongful conviction in a case where Eppolito was lead investigator, stood up in the middle of Eppolito's speech to attack the ex-detective before federal marshals led him out of the courtroom.

"Remember what you did to me? To me? You framed me!" he screamed as the crowd burst into cheers.

Eppolito and Caracappa received $4,000 a month from Casso, who also used them to get information from inside law enforcement. Their pay went up for the murders: They earned $65,000 for one killing.

Caracappa, who retired in 1992, helped establish the police department's unit for Mafia murder investigations. Eppolito was a much-praised street officer despite whispers that some of his arrests came via tips from mobsters.

Eppolito also played a bit part in the mob movie "GoodFellas." After retiring in 1990, he unsuccessfully tried his hand at Hollywood scriptwriting.

In his autobiography, "Mafia Cop," he portrayed himself as an honest officer from a crooked family. The pair, both highly decorated, spent a combined 44 years on the force and eventually retired to homes on the same block in Las Vegas.

The racketeering convictions also could be overturned due to the statute of limitations. The defense argues that there was no ongoing criminal enterprise while the detectives were living in Las Vegas, making a racketeering charge legally untenable.

'Mafia Cops' To Get Life In Prison (LAT)

By Ellen Barry, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, June 6, 2006

Judge delays sentencing of former detectives who were convicted of being hitmen for the mob.

NEW YORK — Calling their crimes "the most heinous … ever tried in this courthouse," a U.S. district judge Monday promised to sentence former New York police detectives Louis Eppolito and Stephen Caracappa to life in prison for moonlighting as mafia hitmen.

Like every other phase of the "Mafia Cops" trial, the hearing featured its share of theatrics. When Eppolito began to address the courtroom for the first time, a spectator screamed: "Do you remember me, Mr. Eppolito? Do you remember what you did to me? To me? You framed me!" Other spectators cheered him on as he was escorted from the courtroom.

Notably absent were Bruce Cutler and Eddie Hayes, the flamboyant defense lawyers who took center stage at the trial from its first day, when they greeted one another with a jovial kiss. Eppolito and Caracappa have accused the famous lawyers of incompetence; their request for a mistrial will be heard June 23.

Until that matter is settled, Judge Jack Weinstein cannot sentence the retired detectives, who were convicted April 6 of participating in eight murders, among other crimes. Weinstein said he intended to sentence the two to life in prison, impose a $1-million fine and seize their assets.

That came as satisfying news to Danielle Lino, 27, the daughter of a Gambino captain named Eddie Lino, whom Eppolito and Caracappa were convicted of killing.

"It is our sincere hope that you will spend your remaining years rotting in prison," she said, glaring at the detectives. "We hope you will burn in hell."

DOJ_NMG_0032067

The two men were arrested last year in Las Vegas, where they had retired after serving a combined 44 years on the police force. Eppolito, who is fat and garrulous, left New York to pursue show-business aspirations and found a few acting jobs, such as Fat Andy in "Goodfellas." His friend Caracappa moved to a house on the same block.

A series of underworld figures testified that Eppolito and Caracappa worked as informants and hitmen for Anthony "Gaspipe" Casso, an underboss for the Luchese family. Burton Kaplan testified that Casso paid the two $4,000 a month, plus lump sums for murders. For pulling over Eddie Lino's car at a traffic stop and shooting him in the head, he said, they were paid $65,000.

Hayes and Cutler delivered memorable opening and closing statements but called few witnesses. Cutler's entire defense lasted 13 minutes. Eppolito has replaced him with a new lawyer, Joseph Bondy, who said Cutler should have identified other potential perpetrators and allowed Eppolito to take the stand. Caracappa's new lawyer, Daniel Nobel, filed a similar complaint Monday morning.

Attorneys for the pair argued that the verdict should be thrown out because, except for one charge, the crimes did not fall within the statute of limitations for racketeering.

Eppolito seemed eager to finally address the courtroom Monday, speaking without notes. He said he was handicapped in life by his father, a Gambino soldier nicknamed "Fat the Gangster." Although he turned his back on the mafia, he said, it made no difference.

"I was already crucified with the name Eppolito before I got any opportunity," he said. "This is coming down on me because of who I am, who I was, not because of what I did. I can hold my head up high. I have never done any of this."

Family members who spoke included the wife and daughter of Israel Greenwald, a diamond merchant who, in 1986, was shot in a Brooklyn parking garage and entombed in concrete.

Michal Greenwald, who was 9 when her father disappeared, described the losses that followed: watching, from the window, while the car was repossessed; switching schools when her scholarships were revoked; listening to a burglar break into the house because they could no longer afford an alarm system.

"We loved our daddy and having him disappear into thin air was a torture I would not wish on my worst enemy," she said. "Do you know what it's like to visit a friend who lost a loved one and be envious of them because they have a grave? Envious of a grave?"

Outside the courthouse, as the hearing ended, waited Barry Gibbs, the man who shouted at Eppolito in the courtroom.

In 2005, Gibbs was released from prison after 19 years when his murder conviction was overturned by DNA evidence. Gibbs said Eppolito — the lead investigator in the case that led to his arrest — pressured a witness into fingering him for the crime.

He wanted to celebrate with the families of the pair's victims. Asked whether he had a message for Eppolito, he said: "Every day in jail is like a million years. It's not a day; it's a million years."

Alito Opinion Draws Rebuke From Scalia (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 6, 2006

Just four months after joining the Supreme Court, Samuel Alito Jr. on Monday joined the club of jurists who have been targets of Justice Antonin Scalia's wrath.

Alito wrote Zedner v. United States for a unanimous Court on Monday, siding with a criminal defendant in a dispute over interpretation of the Speedy Trial Act. But Scalia, while joining the decision, wrote a concurrence criticizing Alito for citing the legislative history of the statute, which Scalia believes is irrelevant.

"Because the use of legislative history is illegitimate and ill advised in the interpretation of any statute -- and especially a statute that is clear on its face -- I do not join this portion of the Court's opinion," Scalia wrote.

The side spat is a small but significant sign of Alito's independence from Scalia, whom many presumed would be a consistent conservative ally and friend.

In the drafting process, Alito could easily have mollified Scalia by deleting the paragraph that invoked legislative history. In interpreting acts of Congress, Scalia has vocally criticized reliance on legislative history -- congressional floor statements, committee reports, and the like -- in his 20 years on the Court, preferring instead to go strictly by the words of the statute. But the fact that Alito left the paragraph in, and Scalia felt moved to object to it, revealed at least some daylight between the two.

Alito's use of legislative history places him closer to the camp of moderate-liberal Justice Stephen Breyer, who last year warned in his book "Active Liberty" of "the danger that lurks where judges rely too heavily on text."

Monday's ruling favored Jacob Zedner, indicted in 1996 on seven charges of bank fraud. Both he and the prosecution sought delays in the trial, raising red flags because of requirements of the Speedy Trial Act that a trial begin 70 days after a defendant is charged. Responding to a request from the judge, Zedner signed a form waiving his rights "for all time" under the law.

After four years of procedural delays, Zedner moved to dismiss the indictment, claiming the prosecution had violated the Speedy Trial Act. The motion was denied, the trial proceeded, and he was found guilty. The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled against Zedner, finding that because he had contributed to the delay in the trial, he could not object to it.

At issue before the Supreme Court was the standard for analyzing when a defendant has legitimately waived his rights under the law.

Alito wrote that the Speedy Trial Act was "designed with the public interest firmly in mind ... That public interest cannot be served, the Act recognizes, if defendants may opt out of the Act entirely." As a result, the Court ruled, a defendant cannot waive rights under the act for all time. Zedner's case was sent back to trial court for dismissal, but the Court said it was up to the trial judge to decide if it should be dismissed with or without "prejudice." If dismissed "with prejudice," the prosecution would be over, but if it is done "without prejudice," prosecutors would be able to try Zedner again.

Alito's offending paragraph cites several instances in the House and Senate reports accompanying passage of the law in 1974 that emphasized the public interest in speedy trials.

Scalia wrote: "It may seem that there is no harm in using committee reports and other such sources when they are merely in accord with the plain meaning of the Act. But this sort of intellectual piling-on has addictive consequences." Among other things, Scalia said it could lead to the belief that a single senator's statement about the meaning of a law represents the views of the entire Congress. "There is no basis either in law or reality for this naive belief," Scalia said.

Supreme Court Will Consider Retroactivity Of 'Blakely' (AP)

The Associated Press

AP, June 6, 2006

The Supreme Court said Monday it will decide whether inmates can reopen challenges to prison sentences based on a Court ruling two years ago that limited judicial discretion in sentencing.

Justices will hear arguments this fall from Lonnie Burton, who is serving nearly 47 years in prison in Washington state for rape, robbery and burglary.

Burton's lawyers told justices that the judge increased Burton's sentence by about 21 years, declaring that he deserved a harsher sentence than the sentencing scheme provided for there.

The case two years ago was also from Washington state. Justices on a 5-4 vote overturned the sentence of a Washington state man for kidnapping his estranged wife. A judge, acting alone, had determined that Ralph Blakely acted with "deliberate cruelty" and deserved a longer prison term.

Justices did not say then how the decision would affect old cases. Justice Antonin Scalia authored that opinion, for an odd right-left lineup of justices.

Burton had an appeal pending when the Court resolved Blakely's case. He had been convicted in 1994 of raping a 15-year-old boy he followed home from school.

The case is Burton v. Waddington, 05-9222.

Cocaine User Convicted Of Killing Girlfriend With Ax Set To Be Executed In Texas (FINDLAW/AP)

By Michael Graczyk, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 6, 2006

(AP) - HUNTSVILLE, Texas-A man who killed his girlfriend with an ax while he was high on crack cocaine is to be executed by lethal injection Tuesday, the 11th person to be put to death in Texas this year.

Timothy Titsworth, 34, is the first of three scheduled to die this month in the nation's most active capital punishment state. The U.S. Supreme Court refused to review Titworth's case in January.

Evidence showed Titsworth, who dropped out of school before he reached high school and worked as a roofer, was high on crack cocaine at the time of the July 23, 1992, attack.

"I didn't think that I had a problem and didn't accept the help and treatment provided to me," Titsworth, who had walked out of at least two drug treatment programs, wrote on an anti-death penalty Web site. "With my fear, ignorance and denial of the truth that so many others have seen, I ended up here: on Texas death row."

Before the killing, Titsworth had avoided a five-year prison term for auto theft by attending a boot camp for two months, an option available to him as a first-time felony offender. He was released on probation.

Three months later, he was arrested and charged with capital murder for the slaying of his girlfriend, who died at the mobile home they shared in Amarillo, in north Texas. Christine Sossaman, 26, had been hit about 16 times with a dull two-bladed ax as she slept.

According to court records, a friend of Sossaman testified the victim told her the day before she was killed she intended to ask Titsworth to leave because she believed her boyfriend had been stealing from her. Evidence showed after the attack, Titsworth took her car along with items from the trailer home that he sold to buy more crack cocaine, then returned repeatedly to the murder scene to take more property to sell to purchase more drugs.

He was arrested driving Sossaman's car while on his way to what a companion said was yet another visit to the crime scene to collect more items to sell. By then, however, Sossaman's mother, worried when she couldn't reach her daughter by phone, had discovered the body and alerted police.

"He was just a crackhead," Randall County District Attorney James Farren said. "He got caught with her property in his possession. In addition, he confessed."

In his confession, Titsworth told authorities the two had argued, Sossaman went to bed and he went out to buy crack and a pill he believed was LSD. He told detectives that while high on the drugs, he went to the mobile home where Sossaman was sleeping, got the ax from a closet and blacked out, although he said he did remember hitting the victim four or five times.

Evidence showed the woman lived from 20 minutes to two hours after she was beaten to her head, neck and upper body. A chest wound was so severe her ribs were driven into her lungs, a pathologist testified.

While being held at the Randall County Jail and awaiting trial, Titsworth was among four inmates who escaped by crawling through ductwork. He was captured about 12 hours later.

At his 1993 trial, Titsworth's lawyers argued he shouldn't be convicted of capital murder because evidence showed the slaying was committed while he was under the influence of drugs and that he didn't intend to steal her property. Jurors didn't buy the argument, returning a guilty verdict after deliberating for about an hour.

Titsworth declined to speak with reporters in the weeks preceding his scheduled execution.

"I'm on death row and have fought a hard battle within the appellate courts, only to reach the final stage ... a better man, a stronger soul," he wrote on a Web site that seeks prison pen pals.

Scheduled to die next - on June 20 - is Lamont Reese, 28, who authorities say is a former street gang member convicted of gunning down three people outside a Fort Worth convenience store in 1999.

There have been more than 1,000 executions in the United States since a moratorium on the death penalty was overturned in 1976.

Pair Charged With Fraud In Homeless Hit-And-Run Cases (LAT)

By Cara Mia Dimassa

The Los Angeles Times, June 6, 2006

Two women in their 70s were arraigned today on nine counts of fraud in connection with multimillion-dollar life insurance policies they took out on two homeless men who were later killed in hit-and-run accidents.

The women, Olga Rutterschmidt and Helen Golay, pleaded not guilty to the charges, which include mail fraud and aiding and abetting a crime in connection with life insurance statements.

Authorities have said that the women are suspects in the 2005 death of Kenneth McDavid and the 1999 death of Paul Vados. The women allegedly took out 19 life insurance policies on the men and eventually cashed in more than $2.2 million in claims after the transients died in hit-and-run pedestrian accidents in Los Angeles.

No charges have been filed in the men's deaths.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Paul L. Abrams ordered a July 25 trial date for Rutterschmidt and Golay, who remain in federal custody.

The two women did not speak to each other while waiting in a glass-curtained area for defendants, and barely looked at each other during the proceedings.

Golay, dressed in an orange jumpsuit, her blond hair teased dramatically upward, spoke softly when Abrams asked her if she understood her rights, her voice barely audible in the federal courtroom.

Her attorney, Roger John Diamond, asked Abrams whether his client could be moved from San Bernardino, where is she is being housed, to a more central location. Authorities made the decision last month to keep the women in separate facilities.

DOJ_NMG_0032070

Diamond also questioned why his client was the one of the duo to be housed farther away. "We have no idea why we have to go to San Bernardino every day," he said.

Abrams denied the request, saying another judge had ordered the women to be held at different facilities. "For whatever reason he did it, I have no reason to second-guess it," he said.

Rutterschmidt, in a pale green jumpsuit, a dark green windbreaker pulled down around her waist, was represented by deputy federal public defender Kim Savo. After the hearing, Savo told reporters that her client's case has been sensationalized by the media.

"No one should be talking about this case in the press, including the government," she said.

"Right now, it's a mail fraud case, and frankly, federal mail fraud cases are about as boring as they get," Savo said.

Also in court were Golay's daughter Kecia Golay and Stella Vados, daughter of Paul Vados. Kecia Golay refused to speak with reporters after the hearing.

But Vados told reporters that "seeing those two women up there was very upsetting."

Her attorney, Gloria Allred, said that Stella Vados hopes to learn everything she can about the women's relationship with her father.

Witnessing Guilt, Ignoring Innocence? (NYT)

By David Feige

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

THE police lineup — in which the anxious eyewitness casts an accusing gaze on a string of sullen men (or women) on the other side of one-way glass — is as much a staple of actual law enforcement as it is of "C.S.I." and "Law & Order." It is also highly flawed. Yet because of a poorly designed study of lineups in Illinois, much-needed improvements to the process may not be forthcoming.

For some time now, scientists, criminologists and defense lawyers have advocated ending the tradition of having the witness view potential suspects all at once and going instead to a sequential method, in which the witness views suspects (or photographs of them) one at a time. Better still is the "double-blind" sequential test, in which the law-enforcement official administering the lineup does not know who is the suspect and who are "fillers."

A pilot project in Minneapolis and a generation of peer-reviewed laboratory experiments have concluded that the sequential method has a smaller error rate than old-fashioned simultaneous lineups. New Jersey now uses sequential lineups, and legislatures or commissions in California, North Carolina, Virginia and Wisconsin have endorsed them.

In April, however, Illinois officials released a study showing the new method was less reliable than the traditional one, based on results in three police districts. According to the study, witnesses using the sequential method picked out an innocent person — someone brought in as a filler — 9 percent of the time, compared with a 3 percent rate for simultaneous lineups (both figures are oddly below the typical error rate in such studies of 20 percent or more).

While these results have heartened police officials and prosecutors who have resisted changing to sequential tests, the study was so rife with methodological errors and biased analysis that it crossed the line between science and advocacy.

It's hard to understate the power of eyewitness testimony in criminal cases. In thousands of cases every year, testimony of a single eyewitness, uncorroborated by forensic or any other evidence, is used to sustain serious felony charges, including robbery and murder. For years, district attorneys have resisted calls to reform lineups, arguing that because double-blind sequential protocols had never been tested on "real" victims outside the laboratory, they shouldn't be adopted in the field. The Illinois project, properly conducted, would have provided an outstanding opportunity to deal with this concern.

The one thing the Illinois experiment did prove was that adoption of double-blind sequential protocols is fairly simple. It also gave more evidence that sequential lineups result in fewer overall identifications: witnesses made ID's in 53 percent of such lineups, versus 62 percent for old-fashioned simultaneous ones. Whether this is an improvement is open to debate.

But the idea that the sequential lineups were less accurate was based on a false premise: that any time the actual suspect was chosen, the result was "accurate." Doing justice in criminal cases is not a matter of identifying the suspect; it's a matter of identifying the actual perpetrator — who may or may not be the suspect. And while the police are often confident in their judgments, the constant stream of exonerations based on DNA testing and other evidence has starkly demonstrated the gulf between their confidence and scientific accuracy.

Significantly, the Illinois study had no way to control for actual guilt. Indeed, because many of the identified suspects are still wending their way through the system, scientists cannot even assess whether the criminal justice process determined that they were guilty. Nor, apparently, did the researchers have access to the case files, making it impossible for them to determine whether there was any forensic or corroborating evidence at all to support the validity of any particular identification.

Thus to assert that the instances in which the witness singled out the suspect were in fact correct identifications of a criminal is akin to the Alice in Wonderland notion of "sentence first — verdict afterwards."

Another problem with the Illinois pilot project was that it wasn't a true blind study: it allowed police officers who knew the actual suspect's identity to be in the room with the eyewitnesses in the simultaneous lineups, but not in the sequential ones.

And nobody with experience in the justice system would deny that there are plenty of ways, some subtle and some not, for an officer to telegraph to a witness which person in the lineup is the actual suspect. Consequently, comparing an unblinded simultaneous sample to a blinded sequential one is like comparing apples to dolphins.

And then there is the fact that the supposed superiority of simultaneous lineups was detectable in the study's cases in Chicago but not in the nearby Joliet police district. Could it be that big city officers were pushing witnesses toward identifications in circumstances in which their smaller-town brethren are more circumspect?

As with so many aspects of the Illinois pilot study, there is no way to know the truth. But that will not stop police officials and district attorneys from using its pseudo-scientific results as a basis on which to resist the mounting calls for change.

Prosecutors often tell us defense lawyers that they, too, want the fairest possible trials. But when it comes to identifications, it seems they want precisely what the current flawed lineups give them: suspect identifications.

Cybercrime Spurs College Courses In Digital Forensics (USAT)

By Jon Swartz

USA Today, June 6, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — One of the hottest new courses on U.S. college campuses is a direct result of cybercrime.

Classes in digital forensics — the collection, examination and presentation of digitally stored evidence in criminal and civil investigations — are cropping up as fast as the hackers and viruses that spawn them.

About 100 colleges and universities offer undergraduate and graduate courses in digital forensics, with a few offering majors. There are programs at Purdue University, Johns Hopkins University, the University of Tulsa, Carnegie Mellon University and the University of Central Florida. Five years ago, there were only a handful.

“I teach students to be like (TV supersleuth) MacGyver,” says Sujeet Shenoi, a computer science professor at the University of Tulsa.

Traditional students, police officers, government employees and aspiring security consultants are taking the courses as more crooks stash ill-gotten data and goods on PCs, PDAs, cellphones, network servers, iPods and even Xboxes.

Students learn where to find digital evidence and handle it without contaminating it. Once preserved, students are shown how to examine evidence and present it clearly during court testimony. “If you revert to geek speak, you can lose a judge, jury and prosecutor,” says Mark Pollitt, a digital forensics professor at Johns Hopkins University who retired in 2003 after 20 years as an FBI agent.

Digital forensics is considered a crucial weapon in law enforcement's escalating war against computer-related crimes. The science is used in criminal investigations; civil cases such as employment lawsuits where personnel records and e-mail correspondence are sought; and by companies faced with cyberattacks. Plus, there are evolving state and federal laws that define how evidence is handled in civil cases.

The evidence is particularly important in the seizure of data for child pornography cases, which comprise a majority of criminal investigations in the USA, says Marcus Rogers, an associate professor who heads the computer forensics program at Purdue University's College of Technology.

The FBI handled more than 9,500 computer forensics cases in fiscal year 2005, which ended in September, compared with about 3,600 in fiscal 2000, according to an FBI briefing.

The crush of cases has domestic intelligence agencies such as the National Security Agency and the CIA, local law-enforcement officials and companies clamoring for experts in finding and preserving digital evidence, security experts says. “There is a thirst in government agencies for (cyberinvestigators),” Pollitt says. There appear to be no shortage of suitors. Since he enrolled in Purdue's master's program last fall, Blair Gillam says he has been approached by recruiters representing government agencies and the private sector.

Taken By Mom, Sought By Dad, Left In A Life Of Uncertainty (WP)

By Sue Anne Pressley Montes

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0032072

Thinking back on it now, Carl Dodd realizes he expected too much, but who could blame him? He had waited 13 years to see his daughter again. He wanted to hug her and take her home with him.

But the teenager who greeted him at the police department in April was distant, doubtful. She asked him pointed questions: Why had her mother been arrested? Why were so many reporters around? Sunglasses partially hid her eyes, and when Dodd asked her to take them off so he could really see her, she refused. She made it clear she intended to stay with her grandmother in Wilmington, Del.

The reunion may have ended Dodd's determined search for his daughter, Marilyn Byrd, who disappeared with her mother from Southeast Washington when she was 4. But it was just the beginning of the long road back to a relationship with his only child, now a young woman of 17.

For people who spent their childhoods hiding out with a distraught parent, taking on new identities, the hardest part comes when the child is recovered and so-called normal life resumes. That is when they finally can afford to get angry about being used as a pawn in a nasty battle between the two people they loved the most.

Few understand Marilyn Byrd's conflicting emotions better than three people who spoke recently about their lingering bitterness over childhoods on the lam:

Â· Rebekah Ford, 28, a Wisconsin resident, still shudders as she recalls the most shocking moment of her childhood. It was the day the FBI came to her elementary school and showed her a flattened milk carton with her picture on it. Until then, she did not know that she was a missing child and that her name was not Heather Ann Brown.

Â· Sam Potash of Philadelphia, who just turned 19, can finally speak publicly about the 8 1/2 months he spent on the run with his father when he was 10. He got used to pretending his name was Ben Davis and repeating the lie that his mother -- who was desperately searching for him -- was dead.

Â· One of Liss Hart-Haviv's most vivid memories is trying to comfort her sobbing mother in a phone booth outside a California women's shelter after they had fled from her father. She was 10 and felt so old and alone. She even had a different name. "They called roll call at school, [and] the first thing I did every morning was lie," said Hart-Haviv, now 38 and living in Kalama, Wash.

Three years ago, Hart-Haviv started Take Root, the first national organization for adults who went through such experiences as children. The cases continue to grow: More than 200,000 children are taken each year by a parent or other family member, according to the Justice Department.

Often, the outcome for families is tragic, with feelings damaged beyond repair. "Many of our members end up losing both parents," Hart-Haviv said.

Even their memories feel like mockery.

"We spend a portion of our lives on the run from a parent, then we spend the rest of our lives on the run from our childhood," she said.

Hart-Haviv was 10 when her mother told her that her father was so volatile that they had to run away from their New York City home. "I was a daddy's girl," she said. "I never once thought of him as dangerous until Mom told me on my way out of town."

Life in hiding was lonesome, she said. Her mother worked all the time to support them. "So I raised myself," Hart-Haviv said. "She would come home at the end of the day, leave a microwave dinner for me and go to bed."

Meanwhile, her father was "obsessively" searching for her, she said. A drinking habit worsened, and he developed mental problems. By the time he found her two years later through medical records, too much had changed.

"I was scared of him," she said. "I saw my mother live in extreme fear. We were in hiding. We were afraid of being followed and our phones being tapped and people wondering who we were."

She and her father never fully reconciled. They did not have time; his health failed, and he later died. "I was his entire world," she said. "But he was looking for a little girl I just wasn't anymore. And there was no one to tell us this was understandable."

Twenty-five years later, she calls her relationship with her mother "a work in progress."

"I'm trying to get to the point of forgiveness," she said.Becoming 'Ben'

Today, Sam Potash is a tall, healthy-looking 19-year-old with a friendly manner -- and a matter-of-fact attitude about the nightmares and emotional problems he suffered after he was recovered. He recently completed his freshman year at Temple University and talks about becoming a social worker to help youths in the same predicament.

"It doesn't feel like it really happened to me anymore," he said in an interview at his mother's Philadelphia home. "It feels like a story."

His story began in July 1997 when his father, who was supposed to drop 10-year-old Sam off at a camp in New Jersey, kept driving. He drove across Canada and on to California and Texas, spending money wildly on gadgets and toys and telling Sam they were going to have a great time. Later, the boy would learn the source of the giddy display of generosity: His father had emptied Sam's $40,000 college-savings fund. After the money ran out in less than a year, Sam's father telephoned a cousin, who notified authorities.

When Abby Potash flew to Dallas to retrieve her son, she was struck by how big he had become; he had gained 30 pounds. "I never went outside," Sam says. He was so accustomed to calling himself "Ben" that, on the flight home, he told the airline attendant that that was his name. Later, he would tell his mother that he never contacted her because he was afraid of being arrested. His father, who lives in another state and phones Sam once in a while, served 16 months in jail.

Counseling was little help as Sam tried to put his life back together. He did not think the therapist could relate to what he had been through. For a long time, he was inexplicably mad at his mother, as if he wanted to make true all the negative things his father had said about her.

"He kept trying to push me to the wall," Abby Potash said. "When he first came home, I was afraid to discipline him."

Sam said he got the most comfort from talking to people who had been through a similar experience. He compares it to surviving cancer, and he is still trying to sort out his emotions.

"After seven years of struggling to find out who I am, I realize I can't," he wrote at the end of his college application essay. "All I know is, for the first time in my life, I can respond with the confident answer of at least a name: I am Sam."Finding a Way to Heal

There is hope of a happy ending. Rebekah Ford once thought that impossible, back when she found out she was not an only child, that she had a father who loved her after all.

Ford had known, deep down, that something was terribly off about her isolated life with her mother. But the truth struck her as "so unreal." The face of the 4-year-old on the milk carton was hers, but she, then 12, did not recognize herself. Her mother was under arrest, her father would be taking her home to a Chicago suburb, she had three older siblings. "I cried and cried. I was so confused," she said.

Looking back on it now, she said, her father set the standard for how to behave in such uncharted waters. He kept things light, asking her what sports she liked, telling her, "You're going to love it at our house," when she replied. Through her hurt, she liked him instantly, she said, but he was a stranger.

"We just talked," she said. "I was this awkward 12-year-old with glasses and a ponytail. I told him I wanted some L.A. Gears when I got home. . . . We talked about everything and anything, not, 'Do you know why your mom took you?' He approached things very nonchalantly, very casually."

It has taken much longer to reconnect with the mother who whisked her away. "There were times I had anger I didn't know what to do with," she said. "I was primarily angry at her. I was angry at the whole situation."

Her father made Rebekah keep in touch with her mother, but it was not until recently, when the grown-up Ford spoke on the subject of parental abduction at a Nashville convention, that her mother telephoned her with the message she had hoped to hear.

"She said, 'I'm really proud of you and what you're doing, and I'm really sorry,' " Ford said. "I think she is sorry, but she feels justified at the same time. I think she wishes it hadn't happened."Reconnecting, Slowly

For now, Carl Dodd is taking baby steps.

He and his wife, Paula, returned home to Fort Washington without his daughter after their disappointing meeting. "I guess I could have made her come by force," Dodd said, "but I didn't want her to come down here and be miserable."

He mailed her a belated birthday card with money inside. He knew it could not make up for the fact that it was her 17th birthday the day U.S. marshals finally found her and took her mother, Mary Jane Byrd, to jail. But Dodd wanted to mark the event somehow, to show his daughter he remembered.

Charged with a felony, Byrd was released from a D.C. halfway house last week, a move that indicates how tangled and sensitive this issue is. Although Dodd was awarded full custody of Marilyn a few months after she disappeared, the judge allowed Byrd to return to Delaware to live with the daughter she is accused of abducting until her trial this year. Dodd said the development would not change his game plan of taking things slowly.

Recently, he mailed Marilyn a cellphone and asked her in a note to let him know when she had received it. When she called to thank him, he considered it a small but important victory.

Now they talk on the phone once or twice a week, no big-deal topics, nothing much more than pleasantries. She is seeing a counselor, but they do not talk about that.

"The conversations are getting better," he said. "They're still like, 'Hi, how you doin'?' 'Fine.' And, 'Call me if you need anything.' But she says a couple of more words each time."

He is thinking about another face-to-face meeting. But he knows he might have to wait a little longer. "I'm still being patient," he said.

CIVIL LAW:

No Relief For Reporters Seeking To Shield Sources (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - Four journalists have lost their bid to reverse a judge's order to either disclose their confidential sources or face $500 per day in fines.

The US Supreme Court on Monday declined to take up the reporters' cases to examine whether a generally recognized "reporters' privilege" against revealing sources should extend to a civil lawsuit brought by former nuclear-weapons-lab scientist Wen Ho Lee.

The action marks the second time in a year that the justices have let stand a judicial order seeking to force members of the media to renege on professional pledges of confidentiality made to government officials to obtain information for their news reporting.

The high-court action comes days after five media organizations agreed to pay $750,000 as part of a $1.6 million settlement of Mr. Lee's Privacy Act case. To some media analysts, the settlement sets a dangerous precedent of media companies paying to protect their reporters' pledges to keep confidential sources anonymous.

"It is going to make it much more difficult for reporters to cover stories about issues that might end up in federal court," says Lucy Dalglish of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press. Recent developments, she adds, highlight the need for a federal reporters' shield law.

In June 2005, the Supreme Court declined to hear an appeal by New York Times reporter Judith Miller and Time correspondent Matt Cooper. Ms. Miller spent 85 days in jail before agreeing to testify to a grand jury investigating who leaked CIA employee Valerie Plame's identity.

The action Monday at the high court arises from a civil suit filed by Lee, a former computer scientist at Los Alamos National Laboratory. In news reports in 1999, Lee was identified by unnamed officials as a potential target of a government investigation into Chinese efforts to obtain US nuclear secrets. No espionage charges were ever filed. Lee was charged with mishandling classified information and eventually agreed to plead guilty to one count.

But the matter didn't end there. Lee sued, claiming that officials at the Justice and Energy Departments and at the FBI violated his privacy rights by revealing private details of his life from government files to members of the press. Lee's lawyers questioned 20 officials - and called upon journalists to disclose who told them the private details they reported. The journalists refused to reveal their sources, and a federal judge found them in contempt of court.

The journalists were from The New York Times, the Los Angeles Times, the Associated Press, and CNN.

A US appeals court panel upheld the ruling. While reporters enjoy a privilege against forced disclosure of their sources in some circumstances, it said, Lee's suit required their cooperation to uncover the source of the alleged wrongdoing.

Free-press advocates saw the appeals court ruling as a setback.

"This decision has far-reaching implications for the ability of journalists to inform the public about the operations of its government and misconduct in the private sector," wrote Washington lawyer Lee Levine, in a legal brief urging the high court to take up the reporters' case.

Supreme Court Turns Down Reporter Appeals In Lee Case (WSJ/AP)

By Associated Press

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Supreme Court rejected an appeal from news organizations fighting to protect confidential sources, refusing to consider the case of four reporters in legal trouble over their stories about former nuclear weapons scientist Wen Ho Lee.

The court's action, released Monday, was taken without comment. Late last week, Mr. Lee, who had sued the government for violating his rights under the Privacy Act, settled the lawsuit. He will receive $1.6 million from the government and five news organizations.

Journalists had been in civil contempt of court for refusing to disclose who leaked them information about an espionage investigation of Mr. Lee. The four reporters are H. Josef Hebert of the Associated Press, James Risen of the New York Times, Bob Drogin of the Los Angeles Times and Pierre Thomas, formerly of CNN and now working for ABC News.

The $750,000 payment by the news agencies is the first of its kind in recent memory, and perhaps ever, legal and media experts said. The companies bluntly said they agreed to the sum to forestall jail sentences for their reporters, even larger payments in the form of fines and the prospect of revealing confidential sources.

Justices could have dismissed the appeal based on the out-of-court settlement. Instead, they flatly rejected the appeals, which had been filed on behalf of the reporters during the legal wrangling with Mr. Lee.

Justice Stephen Breyer did not participate.

The cases are Drogin v. Lee and Thomas v. Lee.

In Wen Ho Lee Case, A Blow To Journalists After The Fact (WP)

By Charles Lane

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

Adding a coda to the legal battle between Wen Ho Lee and the media, the Supreme Court announced yesterday that it would not hear the appeals of reporters facing court orders to testify in Lee's lawsuit against the U.S. government.

The court spoke even though the case was over. Lee's lawsuit was settled on Friday, with the government and five media organizations supplying more than $1.6 million to Lee and his attorneys.

The reporters no longer face contempt-of-court penalties for not naming their confidential sources, and their attorneys had been expected to file papers with the court asking it to dismiss the matter as moot.

But the justices had met to consider the appeals last Thursday. They knew by then that settlement talks were underway and postponed a decision to allow time for negotiations.

Indeed, a day before the court's conference, a court aide contacted Lee's attorney, Brian A. Sun, to check on the progress of settlement talks. Sun said that agreement was very close, according to lawyers knowledgeable about the case. Sun declined to comment. The court was informed of the settlement on Friday.

The court's action leaves intact a ruling by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, which found that the reporters had no legal right to shield the names of their sources.

Yesterday's order is not a ruling on the legal issues in the case, but it does make it clear that the court saw no reason to review the D.C. Circuit's decision. Permitting the case to fade away at the request of the reporters who brought it would have left that point unmade.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer did not participate in the case, for reasons that, as is customary when justices recuse themselves, he did not detail.

Media Sources Need A Shield (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, June 6, 2006

FIVE NEWS ORGANIZATIONS — including the Los Angeles Times — agreed last week to pay a total of $750,000 to Wen Ho Lee, a former nuclear scientist who was arrested in 1999 and jailed for nine months as part of an espionage investigation at the Los Alamos National Laboratory in New Mexico.

The payments, part of a negotiated settlement of Lee's lawsuit accusing the U.S. government of leaking information to the media from his personnel files, mean that reporters for The Times and the other news organizations won't be punished for declining to identify confidential sources.

Some free-press advocates expressed concern that the payments would encourage the subjects of other stories based on confidential sources to seek similar payments.

But that slippery slope can be avoided if Congress follows the example of two-thirds of the states (including California) and enacts a "shield law" providing limited but real protection to journalists' confidential sources.

The Senate and the House are considering different versions of the Free Flow of Information Act. Both bills would require that journalists be questioned about confidential sources only after investigators or other parties have exhausted attempts to obtain the information elsewhere — a codification of current Justice Department guidelines.

Equally important, both bills also would allow judges to weigh the reporter's privilege against the importance of the government's interest in breaching confidentiality. The Senate bill eloquently emphasizes that two public interests must be balanced: "the public interest in compelling disclosure and the public interest in news gathering and maintaining a free flow of information to citizens."

Where the bills differ is in the definition of those who could assert the confidentiality privilege.

The Senate bill, supported by Judiciary Committee Chairman Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), defines a journalist as someone who "for financial gain or livelihood" reports, writes or takes photographs for a newspaper, book publisher, radio or television network or "Internet news service."

DOJ_NMG_0032076

The House bill extends the privilege to anyone who "publishes a newspaper, book, magazine or other periodical in print or electronic form" — a formulation that is friendlier to bloggers and student journalists but is too sweeping for some members of Congress.

We favor this broader approach, but not to the point of blocking legislation that could bring federal protections at least in line with those offered by California and states with similar laws.

The California law, which is part of the state Constitution, protects "a publisher, editor, reporter or other person connected with or employed upon a newspaper, magazine or other periodical publication, or by a press association or wire service, or any person who has been so connected or employed." (Recently a state appeals court extended the law's protection to online news services as well.)

The day may come when Congress or the states will provide greater legal protection for bloggers and "nonprofessional" journalists. For now, the priority is to make federal law at least as protective of traditional journalists' confidential sources as the laws of most of the states

Justices Limit Companies' Use Of Racketeering Lawsuits (AP)

By Toni Locy, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) The Supreme Court on Monday limited the use of civil anti-racketeering laws by companies seeking damages for allegedly illegal acts by their competitors.

In two separate cases, the high court tackled the growing controversy over the increased use of civil provisions of a federal law that was designed to root out organized crime from legitimate businesses.

By an 8-1 vote, justices reversed an appeals court decision that had allowed Ideal Steel Supply Corp., a New York steel mill product supplier, to sue its chief competitor, National Steel Supply Inc., owned by Joseph and Vincent Anza.

The high court also dismissed a case it had heard arguments on in April involving Mohawk Industries Inc., a Georgia floor-covering company sued by a group of its workers for allegedly suppressing wages by hiring illegal workers.

Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, writing for the majority in the steel company case, said the victim of racketeering must suffer ``direct'' injury from illegal acts.

Ideal Steel Supply alleged that National Steel Supply defrauded New York state tax authorities by offering lower prices minus taxes to customers who paid in cash.

But Kennedy said the direct victim of the fraud was not Ideal Steel Supply but New York state.

In the other case, justices backed out of deciding the Mohawk Industries appeal, in which they heard arguments in April.

At that time, several justices voiced skepticism over whether the floor-covering company can be sued under anti-racketeering laws for allegedly using recruiters to find and hire illegal immigrants.

The Bush administration had sided with the workers, urging justices to allow the lawsuit to go forward.

Both cases were sent back to the appeals courts to resolve minor issues.

The high court's action is significant because it probably will affect both criminal and civil uses of the anti-racketeering law, particularly by the Justice Department. Federal prosecutors have long used the law to seek money damages from crooked unions and pension funds.

In a dissent in the steel company case, Justice Clarence Thomas said the high court's decision goes too far and is likely to have unintended consequences.

Thomas said he agreed with the majority's goal of limiting the use of the civil provisions of the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act of 1970.

But Thomas said the high court's decision also will block ``honest businessmen'' from seeking redress in the courts when a competitor plays unfairly.

Often, he said, there are multiple victims in a racketeering scheme and it would be unfair for courts to say that only some of them have a right to file a lawsuit.

As a result, Thomas said, the majority decision is at odds with Congress' intent in passing the civil anti-racketeering provisions of the law.

The cases are Anza v. Ideal Steel Supply, 04-433, and Mohawk Industries v. Williams, 05-465.

Justice Department Monitors Elections In Seven Calif. Counties (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0032077

AP, June 6, 2006

Washington, D.C. (AP) -- The U.S. Department of Justice said Monday that it will monitor Tuesday's primary election in seven California counties to make sure officials adequately serve voters who don't speak English.

Alameda, Orange, San Benito, San Diego, San Mateo, Santa Clara and Ventura counties all are required to provide election information, ballots and voting assistance information in one or more minority languages under the 1965 federal Voting Rights Act.

In San Diego County, for instance, officials settled a federal lawsuit in 2004 by agreeing to provide voting materials in Spanish, Tagalog and Vietnamese, along with poll workers who can translate in those languages.

Alameda County is using paper ballots in Tuesday's primary because its 4,000 Diebold Election Systems touchscreen machines failed to meet federal and state standards. That is expected to cause delays in reporting the election outcome because the county does not have enough optical scanners to count the ballots at all polling places.

Alameda could help determine the outcome of tight Democratic races, including the nominee for governor, because it is home to 5.7 percent of the state's registered Democrats.

In each of the seven counties, observers directed by lawyers from the department's Civil Rights Division will watch and record voting activities at polling places. The department also will monitor elections in Alabama, New Jersey, New Mexico and South Dakota, all of which have primary elections on Tuesday.

Last year the department monitored 47 elections in 14 states. It fielded a record nearly 2,000 observers in 2004 to monitor 163 elections in 29 states.

Congress and California both increased voting standards and monitoring after problems in Florida during 2000 delayed the outcome of the presidential election.

Justice Department To Monitor Hale County Elections (AP)

AP, June 6, 2006

The federal government will monitor polling place activities during primary elections in Hale County, Ala., on Tuesday to ensure compliance with the Voting Rights Act, the Justice Department announced Monday.

Hale County is one of 18 counties in Alabama, California, New Jersey, New Mexico and South Dakota to be monitored during Tuesday's voting.

Federal observers will watch and record activities during voting hours at polling locations to ensure that the rights of voters to participate in the election is not denied on the basis of their race. The department sends hundreds of observers each year to monitor elections across the country.

Debate On Gay-marriage Ban Splits Senate, Public (USAT)

By Andrea Stone

USA Today, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate began debate Monday on a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage, as President Bush told supporters at the White House that marriage should not “be redefined by activist judges.”

Advocates on both sides say there's virtually no chance the Senate will muster the 67 votes needed to approve the amendment when the Senate votes Wednesday. Backers could get just 48 votes on a preliminary vote when the Senate debated it in 2004.

With five months to go before Republicans try to hold on to their majority in congressional elections this November, however, the goal may not be so much to win as to raise this and other issues that energize conservative Republicans.

The Senate is also scheduled to take up a bill to repeal the estate tax and a constitutional amendment to ban desecration of the American flag. Like the gay-marriage ban, both have been debated and rejected before.

Democrats attacked the decision by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, R-Tenn., to spend time on these issues. “The reason for this debate is to divide our society,” said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev. “It is this administration's way of avoiding the tough, real problems.”

“The Senate needs to act now,” Frist said recently. “The American people deserve a full debate … before marriage is redefined for everyone.”

Debating issues such as gay marriage appeals to core voters Republicans will need this fall, says Jennifer Duffy, an analyst at the non-partisan Cook Political Report. “It plays into their fear” that if more Democrats are elected, issues like this will fare even worse, she says.

A Gallup Poll last month found the public divided over whether to change the Constitution to ban gay marriage: 50% favor an amendment, and 47% oppose it.

DOJ_NMG_0032078

The White House also is split. Vice President Cheney, whose daughter Mary is gay, says the issue should be left up to the states.

A federal amendment would reverse a 2003 Massachusetts court ruling that legalized gay marriage and head off similar decisions by judges in other states. It also would halt legal challenges to amendments in 19 states that bar same-sex marriage in their constitutions. Last year, a federal judge overturned Nebraska's amendment, which was approved by 70% of voters in 2004.

“Marriage is under attack,” said Sen. Wayne Allard, R-Colo., the federal amendment's chief sponsor. “As a legislature, I don't think we should stand back and surrender this issue to the courts.”

A constitutional amendment must be approved by two-thirds of both the House and Senate and then ratified by 38 of 50 states to become law. Allard said he won't get the 67 votes to approve it in the Senate, but he predicted a “significant milestone”: a majority approval for the first time. Allard and the Human Rights Campaign, a gay advocacy group, expect a 52-48 vote. Almost all Senate Democrats oppose the measure, as do several moderate Republicans.

Amendment supporters say that the issue cuts across party lines and that Democratic African-American ministers and inner-city Hispanic activists favor a ban. But some in Bush's own party are dissatisfied with his commitment to the issue.

“He needs to twist some arms” to get the needed votes, says Paul Weyrich of the conservative Free Congress Foundation. “There's no evidence he's doing that.”

Senate Debates Measure To Ban Gay Marriage (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds And James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Senate opened debate Monday on a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage, an issue Republican strategists hope will help drive conservative voters to the polls during fall congressional elections.

At the White House, President Bush tried to rally support for the amendment, even though its backers said it was expected to fall well short of the 67 votes needed for passage.

"Marriage is the most fundamental institution of civilization, and it should not be redefined by activist judges," Bush told supporters. It was the second time in three days that the president spoke in favor of the amendment, a topic he had barely touched since he energized conservative loyalists with his support for the measure during the 2004 presidential campaign.

In a 10-minute address interrupted 11 times by applause, the president repeatedly referred to courts and judges — calling them "activist" and "over-reaching." If a court overturns the federal Defense of Marriage Act, Bush said, "every state would have to recognize marriage as redefined by judges in, say, Massachusetts or local officials in San Francisco, no matter what their own state laws or their state constitutions say."

The 1996 law says that states are not required to recognize same-sex marriages contracted in other states. But supporters of the constitutional amendment say the law faces challenges in several states, making the amendment necessary. They say the country's social foundation is threatened by moves in Massachusetts and elsewhere to expand the definition of marriage to include same-sex couples.

Opponents say that marriage laws are the purview of the states, not the federal government. They complain that the amendment would formalize discrimination against a social group.

On the Senate floor, supporters of the amendment echoed Bush's arguments.

"We're here today at the threshold of the democratic process — that is, a constitutional amendment — because marriage is under attack," said Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.), the amendment's sponsor. "I believe that because the institution of marriage is too precious to surrender to the whims of a handful of unelected activist judges, now is the time to send to the states a constitutional amendment that protects traditional marriage and prevents judges from rewriting our traditional marriage laws."

A procedural vote on the measure is slated for Wednesday. Democrats accuse Republicans of scheduling the debate to help organize voter turnout in November, when Republicans appear to face the toughest election challenge since they won a majority in Congress in 1994.

"For me it is clear the reason for this debate is to divide our society, to pit one against another," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.). "This is another one of the president's efforts to frighten, to distort, to distract and to confuse America. It is this administration's way of avoiding the tough, real problems that American citizens are confronted with each and every day."

White House Press Secretary Tony Snow acknowledged there was a "political dimension" to Bush's speech, because the measure was before the Senate, but said in response to a question, "I don't think it's posturing."

As for making same-sex marriage a priority at a time when issues such as the war in Iraq have hurt Bush's poll numbers, Snow said the president could "deal with more than one issue at a time."

DOJ_NMG_0032079

Bush spoke at the Eisenhower Executive Office Building, next door to the White House. Some of those invited had been told the session would take place in the White House Rose Garden, a location that would have elevated the status of the meeting, but without explanation the venue was shifted.

Bush's position on the marriage amendment is at odds with Vice President Dick Cheney's, whose daughter Mary is a lesbian. Cheney has said Americans should be more accommodating of relationships that differ from traditional marriage.

Bush Rallies Gay Marriage Opponents (AP)

By Laurie Kellman

The Associated Press, June 5, 2006

Cheered by conservative supporters, President Bush gave a push Monday to a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage as the Senate opened debate on an emotional, election-year measure that has little chance of passing.

"Our policies should aim to strengthen families, not undermine them," Bush said in a speech. "And changing the definition of marriage would undermine the family structure."

All Senate Democrats, except Ben Nelson of Nebraska, oppose the amendment, and critics say Bush's efforts are primarily aimed at energizing conservative voters for the November elections. Together with moderate Republicans, the Democrats are expected to block a yes-or-no vote, killing the measure for the year.

"This proposed constitutional amendment is being used to satisfy the most extreme right-wing supporters and politicians," said Sen. Patrick Leahy (news, bio, voting record), D-Vt. "The Constitution is too important to be used for such a partisan political purpose."

Sen. Wayne Allard (news, bio, voting record), R-Colo., who sponsored the measure, acknowledged that politics played a part in the timing of the debate, but for a different reason: to force senators to take a stand and answer for their votes on the campaign trail.

"We ought to have a vote on the amendment every year," Allard said.

The amendment would prohibit states from recognizing same-sex marriages. To become law, it would need two-thirds support in the Senate and House, and then would have to be ratified by at least 38 state legislatures.

The White House played down the significance of the 10-minute presidential event, saying Bush was simply speaking out on an issue being debated on Capitol Hill. Press secretary Tony Snow said the president was not personally lobbying senators to pass the amendment.

Bush also pressed for it in his radio address on Saturday.

"I'm not sure this is a big driver among voters," Snow said.

Bush said a constitutional amendment is needed because laws that state legislatures have passed defining marriage as being between a man and a woman are being overturned by a few judges.

"When judges insist on imposing their arbitrary will on the people, the only alternative left to the people is an amendment to the Constitution — the only law a court cannot overturn," the president said.

Bush also rebuffed critics who argue that the amendment conflicts with the GOP's opposition to government interference and the importance of states' rights.

"A constitutional amendment would not take this issue away from the states, as some have argued," Bush said. "It would take the issue away from the courts and put it directly before the American people."

First lady Laura Bush said recently that while Americans want to debate the issue, "I don't think it should be used as a campaign tool."

Vice President Dick Cheney, whose daughter, Mary, is a lesbian, splits with Bush on the issue. Cheney said he thinks Americans should do everything they can to accommodate any type of relationship, and that there should not necessarily be a federal policy in this area.

Human Rights Campaign President Joe Solmonese said Bush was favoring an amendment that would give Americans license to discriminate against homosexuals.

"The fact that he's out of step with the first lady and the powerful vice president tells me who he's answering to today," Solmonese said.

More than half of Americans, 58 percent, said in an ABC News poll released Monday that same-sex marriages should be illegal. But only four in 10 said they support amending the Constitution to ban gay marriage, while a majority said states should make their own laws on gay marriage.

With Bush taking center stage on the issue, advocates on both sides of the issue rushed to comment.

DOJ_NMG_0032080

On the left, Caroline Fredrickson, director of the ACLU legislative office in Washington, said lawmakers rightly rejected the amendment in 2004 and should do so again. "Discrimination has no place in America, and certainly not in our founding document," she said.

On the right, Matt Daniels, president of the Alliance for Marriage, argued that same-sex marriage advocates are trying to circumvent the democratic process and redefine marriage through the courts. "Marriage is the social glue that unites the two halves of the human race to share in the enterprise of raising the next generation," Daniels said.

Bush Reiterates Support For Amendment Banning Gay Marriage (KRT)

By William Douglas

Knight Ridder, June 5, 2006

WASHINGTON - For the second time in three days, President Bush implored the Senate to pass a constitutional amendment banning gay marriage, saying Monday that the issue needs to be wrestled away from "overreaching judges" and placed in the hands of the American people.

Critics on both sides of the debate accused the president of playing politics with the socially sensitive issue by seeking to rouse social conservatives to support Republicans in this congressional election year even if the cause has no realistic hope of enactment. Bush's talk came as the Senate continued debate on a measure that isn't likely to win the two-thirds majority vote in both the Senate and House of Representatives that the Constitution requires.

"Marriage is the most fundamental institution of civilization and it should not be redefined by activist judges," Bush said following a meeting with amendment supporters in the White House. "Our policies should aim to strengthen families, not undermine them. And our changing the definition of marriage would undermine the family structure."

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said the White House is using the gay marriage issue to try to divert attention from the war in Iraq, high gasoline prices and other issues that aren't going the administration's way.

"This is another one of the president's efforts to frighten, to distort, to distract and to confuse America," Reid said. "It is this administration's way of avoiding the tough, real problems that American citizens are confronted with each and every day."

The Log Cabin Republicans, a Republican gay and lesbian organization, called the amendment a "politically motivated" effort to "write discrimination into the U.S. Constitution."

"The president's call for `tolerance and civility' while advocating discrimination rings hollow," Log Cabin President Patrick Guerriero said in a written statement.

Bush told conservative religious leaders, educators and social activists that he's supporting the Marriage Protection Amendment in the Senate because traditional marriage - between a man and a woman - is under fire.

"This national question requires a national solution," he said. "An amendment to the Constitution is necessary because activist courts have left our nation with no other choice. When activist judges insist on imposing their arbitrary will on the people, the only alternative left to the people is an amendment to the Constitution, the only law a court cannot overturn."

The Senate measure states: "Marriage in the United States shall consist only of the union of a man and a woman. Neither this Constitution, nor the constitution of any state, shall be construed to require that marriage or legal incidents thereof be conferred upon any union other than the union of a man and a woman."

Sponsors of the amendment say it gives room for state legislatures to approve civil unions for same-sex couples.

Bush's unequivocal support of the act impressed some in his audience who have questioned his commitment to conservative causes.

"I was very pleased with what the president said," said James Dobson, founder of Focus on the Family, a conservative Christian organization. "I would prefer the amendment prohibit civil unions, but we will take what he can get."

Paul Weyrich, chairman of the conservative Free Congress Research and Education Foundation, was less impressed.

"He is not serious about the amendment," Weyrich said. "He's reluctantly gotten back in the fight, but he doesn't like it. The rhetoric is fine, but to get anywhere he's got to twist arms and he's not doing it. You know the U.S. Senate - they won't do anything unless extraordinary pressure is put on them."

The amendment faces daunting odds in the Senate. Only one of the 44 Senate Democrats - Sen. Ben Nelson of Nebraska - has expressed support for the measure. Support among the Senate's handful of moderates among 55 Republicans is scant. The Senate's lone independent, James Jeffords of Vermont, tends to vote with Democrats.

The Constitution requires approval by two-thirds of both the House and Senate to forward a constitutional amendment to the states, and three-quarters of state legislatures also must approve it to change the nation's fundamental legal charter.

Bush said the Senate proposal reflects the will of Americans who "have spoken clearly on this issue" through state referendums and the 1996 passage of the Defense of Marriage Act, which then-President Clinton signed.

DOJ_NMG_0032081

But a recent Gallup Poll shows that issues such as same-sex marriage are a low priority for most Americans at this time. In the poll, conducted last month, 42 percent of Americans said Iraq should be the top priority for the president and Congress, while only 1 percent said ethics/moral, religious/family decline issues should top their agenda.

(EDITORS: The survey mentioned in the last graf was conducted May 22-24 with 1,003 adult respondents ages 18 and older. The margin of error is plus or minus 3 percentage points.

Bush Promotes Amendment To Define Marriage, Ban Same-Sex Unions (BLOOM)

By Richard Keil

Bloomberg, June 6, 2006

June 5 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush, facing record low job-approval ratings, renewed his support for a constitutional ban on same-sex marriages as he and his Republican Party seek to rally supporters ahead of the November congressional elections.

``You are here because you strongly support a constitutional amendment that defines marriage as between a man and a woman,'' Bush told a group of activists and supporters today at the White House. ``I am proud to stand by you.''

Speaking just before the Republican-controlled Senate opened debate on the issue, Bush said amending the U.S. Constitution would prevent ``activist judges'' from redefining the institution of marriage by striking down state laws limiting state-sanctioned unions to heterosexual couples.

The president was addressing for the second time in three days an issue that had dropped on his agenda since the 2004 election. While White House Press Secretary Tony Snow said Bush was simply following a common practice of commenting on legislative matters pending before Congress, Bush's Democratic opponents said the timing has more to do with politics.

Senate Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada said in an e- mail to supporters that Republican Senate leaders should be addressing gasoline prices, health care costs and the Iraq war.

``But there's an ugly truth: it's election season and down- in-the-polls Republicans are turning to their same old playbook - fear and division,'' Reid wrote. Senate Majority Leader ``Bill Frist, in an attempt to appease extreme right wing elements of the Republican Party, has promised that the Senate will vote on the Federal Marriage Act.''

Shoring Up Support

Republicans are reviving the same-sex marriage ban as part of an effort to ``shore up their base'' before the congressional elections, said L. Michael Seidman, a Georgetown University law professor. As written, the Senate's amendment proposal wouldn't overturn state laws like one in Massachusetts that broadened the definition of marriage.

Snow said the timing was a product of the Senate's legislative schedule, set by Frist and other Republican leaders without input from Bush.

While Bush's views on gay marriage haven't changed, he and his party have paid greater attention to the issue during election years.

On Feb. 24, 2004, as his re-election campaign was getting underway, Bush called for a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage, a position also taken by his 2004 opponent, Democratic Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts.

Senate Support

Shortly after winning re-election, Bush told The Washington Post in a January 16, 2005, interview that while he still supported the amendment, he would not lobby heavily for its passage because he believed that until a federal court overturned the Defense of Marriage Act, there would not be enough votes to ensure its passage in the Senate.

There is some evidence that the issue helped Bush in 2004; even though the amendment died in Congress during the run-up to the election, 11 states had measures related to the same-sex marriage ban on their ballots. Bush won nine of those states, including Ohio, which ensured he would serve a second term.

So far, voters in 19 states have approved amendments to their state constitutions that define marriage as being between a man and a woman.

The initiatives were approved by ``decisive majorities,'' Bush said today. ``The American people have spoken clearly on this issue.''

Amending the Constitution requires approval of a 2/3 majority in the House and Senate. The amendment must then be ratified by 3/4 of the states.

``The question is, whether there are the votes in the U.S. Senate to push forward,'' Snow said.

Another is how hard Bush will press lawmakers. On past legislative priorities, such as the $1.85 trillion in tax cuts passed during his first term and immigration legislation now under consideration, Bush has telephoned lawmakers or invited them to the White House for personal lobbying.

DOJ_NMG_0032082

``I'm not aware of any planned phone calls," Snow said. ``Too much is being made of this."

Bush's job approval rating was at a record-low 33 percent in an ABC News/Washington Post poll published May 16, with 65 percent of the 1,103 respondents disapproving of the way Bush is handling his job. That was matched by public disapproval of the way Congress is doing its job.

Debate Begins On Gay Marriage (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz And Charles Babington

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

President Bush renewed his call yesterday for Congress to approve a constitutional amendment defining marriage as the union between a man and a woman, saying such a step is necessary to keep courts from undermining traditional marriage.

As the Senate began debate on the amendment barring same-sex marriage, the president summoned supporters to the White House to hear his plea that marriage "not be redefined by activist judges." The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court has legalized same-sex marriage, and courts in other states have nullified voter-approved referendums that would ban it.

The president's comments cheered conservative activists, coming after a long period of relative quiet from him on an issue many analysts believe was critical to his reelection victories in Ohio and other states in 2004.

But Bush's latest foray on this emotional terrain dismayed Democrats and gay rights advocates, who accused the president of using a wedge issue to regain political momentum after setbacks from Iraq and Hurricane Katrina. They said Bush's political motives were transparent, given that even backers acknowledge the amendment has virtually no chance of being approved in the current Congress.

Aides have portrayed the president as a somewhat reluctant warrior in a battle forced on him by judges who have struck down laws against same-sex marriage in Maryland, New York and other states. The White House itself has been unusually divided on the issue, with Vice President Cheney making it clear that he disagrees with the president and first lady Laura Bush saying the issue should not be made a political tool.

"He does not want to be wrongly seen as driving this debate," said Matt Daniels, president of the Alliance for Marriage, a leading advocate of the constitutional amendment and part of a small group of activists who met privately with Bush before his speech.

Daniels and other conservatives professed themselves content with the president's statement, despite complaints from some of their allies that Bush should be doing more. "I was very pleased with what the president said -- I don't think he could say it much stronger than he did," said James C. Dobson, chairman and founder of Focus on the Family, a prominent conservative voice.

Minutes after Bush's remarks on marriage, the Senate opened debate on the proposed amendment. Democratic leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) rebuked Republicans for devoting time to the issue rather than addressing high gasoline prices, the national debt and other matters.

"For me, it is clear the reason for this debate is to divide our society, to pit one against another," Reid said. "This is another one of the president's efforts to frighten, to distort, to distract and to confuse America."

The politics of same-sex marriage are complex: Polls suggest the country remains solidly opposed, but the public is more ambivalent about a constitutional amendment. The issue galvanized conservative voters in 2004, but pollsters believe the issue simultaneously weakens Bush's efforts to rebuild ties to moderate voters, who have abandoned him in recent months and have helped drive down his approval ratings.

Republican leaders appear to be betting that a new thrust against same-sex marriage could help the party in this year's midterm elections, especially in such states as Pennsylvania, Montana, Missouri and Ohio, where Senate GOP incumbents face stiff challenges.

But Bush appeared mindful of the minefield he was navigating yesterday. He appeared at a room in the Eisenhower Executive Office Building rather than the more symbolic Rose Garden, where activists were first told he would make his statement. The debate over the amendment, he said, should be conducted with "tolerance and respect and dignity."

Bush also took pains to note the limitations of the proposed amendment, which reads, in its entirety: "Marriage in the United States shall consist only of the union of a man and a woman. Neither this Constitution, nor the constitution of any State, shall be construed to require that marriage or the legal incidents thereof be conferred upon any union other than the union of a man and a woman."

That language, he said, leaves the states free to define other legal arrangements for gay couples -- such as civil unions, proponents of the amendment said. Bush also framed the issue as one being created by courts, an approach that could appeal to conservatives concerned about what they consider judicial excesses though not necessarily same-sex marriage.

DOJ_NMG_0032083

Joe Solmonese, president of the Human Rights Campaign, the leading gay rights lobby, rejected that explanation. "When I hear this whole thing talked about in terms of activist judges, to me it says [they] have got to find another way to talk about discrimination," he said.

With Democrats largely opposed, congressional leaders say neither the House nor the Senate has the two-thirds majority in favor that would be necessary to send the amendment to the states for ratification.

Still, Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.) defended the effort. "Marriage is under attack," he said at a news conference. "The Constitution will be amended whether we pass this amendment or not. The only question is whether it will be amended through the amendment process or by unelected activist judges."

But another Republican -- Senate Judiciary Chairman Arlen Specter (Pa.) -- spoke against the amendment, calling it "a solution in search of a problem." Like Reid and some other senators, Specter said he opposes same-sex marriage but feels states can handle the issue.

With Gay Marriage Ban, Conservatives Keep Score (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 5 — President Bush's push for the constitutional ban on same-sex marriage that is being debated in the Senate this week comes as many Republicans and religious conservatives are beginning a campaign to help lawmakers who support it during this year's elections — and to punish those who do not.

Though people on both sides of the debate say they do not expect the amendment to come anywhere near winning approval this week, both sides say they expect it, and an anticipated version in the House, to be used as a conservative litmus test in elections this fall.

"It is true what this vote will do will be to help the voters identify who is and is not supportive of the family," Dr. James C. Dobson, founder of Focus on the Family, said in an interview on Monday. "And I think those that are not are going to have to answer for it."

Dr. Dobson's group is already running advertisements against senators who do not plan to support the amendment, including one against Senator Ken Salazar, Democrat of Colorado, that says, "Why doesn't Senator Salazar believe every child needs a mother and a father?"

Republican Party officials in several states have released statements attacking Democrats who are not expected to vote for the amendment. And another conservative group, the Family Research Council, is planning to ask lawmakers to take "a marriage protection pledge" and then tell voters who signs it and who does not.

Dr. Dobson and other proponents of the ban got a boost on Monday afternoon, when Mr. Bush called on the Senate to approve the measure. "The constitutional amendment that the Senate will consider this week would fully protect marriage from being redefined," Mr. Bush told a room of religious leaders and advocates.

His speech came as the Senate began to debate the proposed amendment, which would define marriage as being between a man and a woman and would prohibit judges from requiring states to grant same-sex couples the legal benefits of marriage.

It was the second time in three days that Mr. Bush made an address supporting the measure. His speeches were part of an effort by the White House to re-energize culturally conservative voters who have long supported Mr. Bush and his Congressional allies, but who are expressing frustration that their issues have not been pushed strongly enough since 2004.

Pollsters have cited demoralization as a major reason for the low opinion ratings for the president and his party this election year, when Republicans are trying to keep control of the Senate and the House.

Republican officials are hoping that the marriage debate will help them as it did in 2004, when 13 state ballot initiatives banning same-sex marriage or civil unions were credited with drawing many conservative voters to the polls and propelling Mr. Bush and Congressional Republicans to victory.

Democrats have called the Republican push for the amendment a diversionary tactic that will not work this year, when voters are focused on other matters like rising gas prices and the war in Iraq. And some pollsters say the issue may not resonate as it did in 2004.

"People are so disillusioned with Iraq and $50 tanks of gas that I don't think it's as much of an attention grabber," said Andrew Kohut, president of the Pew Research Center.

But Republican officials note that up to eight states may have ballot measures to ban same-sex marriage, including Alabama, South Dakota, Virginia and Tennessee, where a court decision on a referendum is pending.

DOJ_NMG_0032084

Chris Devaney, executive director of the Tennessee Republican Party, said a ballot measure would help drive turnout for whoever wins the Republican Senate primary in August. "People voting for this are generally more conservative," he said. "It will definitely have an effect."

The Democrat seeking the open Senate seat, Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., supports the amendment being debated this week.

Elsewhere, some moderate Republicans, including Senators Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania and Olympia J. Snowe and Susan Collins of Maine, have not supported the amendment and are also coming under fire from conservative groups.

The Senate debate on Monday showed just how contentious the issue could become.

"Our nation would be better served if we refrained from divisiveness that is wielded like a weapon in order to score political and emotional points before an election," said Senator Patrick J. Leahy of Vermont, the senior Democrat on the Judiciary Committee.

Republicans argued that the state of marriage and the American family was exactly the sort of fundamental issue that Congress should take up. "It is not bigotry to define marriage as a union of a man and a woman," said Senator Sam Brownback, Republican of Kansas.

GOP Targets Gay Marriage (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - Gay marriage is back in the political spotlight, as the Senate begins debate on a constitutional amendment banning it and President Bush speaks out on behalf of the measure.

But from the outset, the outcome is nearly certain: There are probably not enough votes in the Senate to build the two-thirds majority needed to pass a constitutional amendment, members of both parties agree. And so, as debate began Monday, analysts were hard put to see any other motive than political for putting the issue forward now.

"It's connected to the fall elections and the situation in the Republican Party," says James Guth, a political scientist at Furman University in Greenville, S.C. "There's no way around that."

With Mr. Bush struggling to win back support of fellow Republicans who have grown discouraged, the president has been under increasing pressure to advocate forcefully on an issue that religious conservatives consider of utmost importance, especially with state court cases under way that could lead to legalization of same-sex marriage. Congress faces even larger political stakes: low public approval ratings, and, unlike Bush, danger of low voter turnout this fall in the midterm elections among social conservatives that could hurt Republicans seeking to maintain their majority.

At the same time, the GOP's efforts at creating a "big tent" image will be put to the test. Some of the most vulnerable members of Congress - many of them moderate Republicans from the Northeast - could be hurt by the debate, as it highlights a point of view less resonant in that part of the country than in others.

The debate could also reverberate further into the future, into the 2008 presidential contest. Sen. John McCain of Arizona, a likely GOP contender, opposes a constitutional amendment defining marriage as between a man and a woman, arguing that the issue should be left up to the states. He has long faced hostility from social conservative leaders over this and other positions, and his recent efforts at reconciliation with this activist wing of the party could be set back by the debate.

Sen. Bill Frist (R) of Tennessee, who is retiring from the Senate at the end of the current term, also may run for president, and so his advocacy for the Marriage Protection Amendment is also seen through the lens of his own possible ambitions. Senator Frist has also scheduled a vote this week on a constitutional amendment banning flag-burning, another measure seen as highly political.

For Bush, after a flurry of action this week on gay marriage, the question could be, what next? If the amendment fails in the Senate, as presumed, he will face continuing pressure to push for this and other measures important to religious conservatives. During his presidency, his pattern usually has been to hold positions consistent with those of religious conservatives, but not to advocate for them as fiercely as religious leaders would like. On constitutional amendments, the president plays no formal role - his signature is not required - so any power he may wield would come through the bully pulpit.

The amendment consists of two sentences: "Marriage in the United States shall consist only of the union of a man and a woman. Neither this Constitution, nor the constitution of any State, shall be construed to require that marriage or the legal incidents thereof be conferred upon any union other than the union of a man and a woman."

Speaking to a bipartisan group of amendment supporters at the White House on Monday afternoon, Bush repeatedly castigated what he called "activist judges" for thwarting the will of the people on same-sex marriage. "Marriage is the most fundamental institution of civilization, and it should not be redefined by activist judges," Bush said.

But not all religious conservatives are happy with the amendment's wording. One opponent, the Rev. Louis Sheldon of the Traditional Values Coalition, says the amendment amounts to a "hollow gesture" when it comes to protecting marriage and argues that the second sentence, in particular, would in fact allow civil unions and other forms of "counterfeit marriage" in the states.

"Saturday the president said in his [weekly radio] message that this Marriage Protection Amendment does fully protect marriage. It doesn't," says Mr. Sheldon. "So why would you want to break your back and spend millions of dollars in 38 states passing it, even if it did pass the Congress, if it gives the states the right to do the thing that has totally brought all this to a head, civil unions and domestic partners?"

Sheldon represents a minority view among social conservatives, however, and for now, Bush and supporters of the current language are pressing ahead. But even if the measure dies for now in the Senate, the issue will remain alive at the state level. At least six states will have measures on the ballot this year, most of them banning gay marriage, and activists in other states are working on fulfilling requirements for similar measures. In New York, the state's highest court is considering an appeal that could end up legalizing gay marriage there.

Unlike public opinion on other hot-button social issues, such as abortion, Americans' views of gay marriage have been evolving. In March 1996, 27 percent of Americans believed homosexual marriage should be recognized by the law as valid, according to the Gallup Poll. Today that number is 39 percent. Amendment history

Most recent amendment: 1992, the 27th, limiting congressional pay raises.

Last two serious attempts:

· The Equal Rights Amendment, proposed in 1972. It read in part: "Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex." It cleared both chambers of Congress and at one time was ratified by 35 states - short of what was needed.

· The District of Columbia Voting Rights Amendment, proposed in 1978. It would have granted Washington, D.C., the full voting rights in Congress of a state. It expired unratified in 1985.

Republicans Reignite Hot-Button Issues (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck And Brody Mullins

The Wall Street Journal, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Senate Republicans are pushing ahead with votes this week to repeal the estate tax and to ban gay marriage. Neither measure is likely to pass. But party strategists say both issues could help Republicans maintain control of Congress, by rallying demoralized social and economic conservatives, and by forcing divisions between liberal and conservative Democrats.

First up is a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage, which the Senate is expected to consider tomorrow. President Bush, who has been largely silent on the issue since pushing it during his 2004 re-election campaign, urged passage yesterday in a speech near the White House to religious leaders and other backers of the measure.

Supporters concede they are unlikely to get the 60 votes necessary to cut off debate, much less the two-thirds vote needed to clear the Senate. But they hope the bill can help some embattled candidates at the polls.

One is Ohio Republican Sen. Mike DeWine. A gay-marriage ban on the 2004 ballot in the Buckeye State is widely credited with drawing evangelicals to the polls and helping Mr. Bush narrowly carry that state. But Mr. De-Wine opposed that measure, citing objections to language that he said would invite lawsuits. That is one reason he appears to have trouble rallying social conservatives. This year, Mr. DeWine is a sponsor of the Senate amendment, which doesn't include the language he objected to previously.

In Pennsylvania, where Republican Sen. Rick Santorum is in a close contest to keep his seat, Republicans have highlighted his support of the gay-marriage amendment to help separate him from Democrat Bob Casey Jr. Mr. Casey has blurred his differences with the incumbent on social issues, since he is one of the few prominent Democrats who, like Mr. Santorum, opposes abortion. Mr. Casey said in an April debate that he opposes gay marriage but wouldn't support a constitutional ban, according to the Philadelphia Inquirer.

Republicans "are playing to that smaller group, that group of conservative, Republican, religious people," says John Green, a political-science professor at the University of Akron in Ohio and a senior fellow at the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life. "In a close election, those people could make a very big difference. If it wasn't a close election, I don't think you'd see it being much of an issue."

Definition of Marriage

The measure would define marriage as a union of a man and woman and declare that constitutions at the state and federal levels shouldn't be interpreted as requiring that marital status be available to gay couples. The drive for a federal ban gained momentum when the Massachusetts Supreme Court ruled in 2003 that the state's constitution did forbid restricting same-sex marriages.

"This flushes out senators who try to have it both ways," says Tom Minnery, senior vice president of government and public policy at Focus on the Family, which in a recent ad campaign has turned up pressure on Senate Democrats and moderate Republicans to vote for the amendment. "If they don't vote for this amendment, they don't support traditional marriage. It comes down to that."

Indeed, while Democratic leaders oppose the measure, at least one senator facing re-election in a Republican-leaning "red state" is breaking with the party over the issue. Nebraska's Ben Nelson is dropping his opposition and says he will now support the constitutional amendment. He says he changed his mind after a federal judge last year overturned a state-level ban.

Mr. Nelson also plans to split with the majority of fellow Democrats when the Senate takes up estate-tax repeal, likely on Thursday. He won't be the only Democrat on the ballot in a state carried by President Bush making that choice. Bill Nelson of Florida also plans to vote to repeal the tax. Republicans say they may be able to pick up support from two other Democrats running for re-election: Washington's Maria Cantwell and North Dakota's Kent Conrad.

Like the gay-marriage amendment, the estate-tax measure is likely to draw support from a majority of senators, but also to fall short of the 60 votes required to shut off a Democratic filibuster.

Estate-tax repeal could be salvaged by an election-year compromise between a Republican facing a re-election fight in a state that appears to be trending Democratic, and a Democrat in a heavily Republican state.

Republican Sen. Jon Kyl of Arizona has opened talks with Montana Democrat Sen. Max Baucus, the top Democrat on the Senate Finance Committee. New York Democrat Sen. Charles Schumer, who is chairman of the Senate Democrats' campaign arm, is also part of the discussions. Aides say they hope to reach a deal in the next couple of days.

Rather than repeal the tax, the senators are working on legislation that would exempt all but the super-wealthy from paying taxes on their estates at death by exempting as much as $10 million of estates from the tax. The senators are also talking about lowering the tax rates that individuals pay on the value of their estates when they die.

Republicans rolled back the estate tax in President Bush's 2001 tax bill. The tax is being lowered each year from the 55% rate of 2001 until it is abolished in 2010. The rollback expires the following year, returning to 55% in 2011.

A Vote Before Elections

House Republicans vote each congressional session to wipe out the tax. But the Senate has fallen short of the 60 votes needed to follow suit. If senators reach a compromise, Republican leaders in the House are likely to bring it to a final vote before the elections.

But it is unclear if Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist would allow a compromise to come to a vote on the Senate floor. The possible 2008 presidential contender has positioned himself as a champion of abolishing the tax. Giving his blessing to the compromise could hurt his chances with the party's base in primaries two years from now.

Beyond the marriage and tax measures, Republicans in Congress and the White House are looking for other issues to lure conservatives to the polls. The Senate also is likely to debate, perhaps as soon as this month, an anti-flag-burning amendment and might consider a prohibition on transferring a minor across state lines to get an abortion unless her parents give permission.

Republicans need a boost from within their party if they are to maintain their majorities in the House and Senate. As of April, just 27% of conservatives approved of Congress, compared with 53% in January 2005, according to a Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll. That is even lower than Mr. Bush's approval rating among conservatives, which was 60% in April compared with 71% in January 2005.

Bush Pushes Hill On Marriage Measure (WT)

By Stephen Dinan And Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, June 6, 2006

President Bush yesterday told Congress to pass an amendment defining marriage in the U.S. Constitution and send it to the states for ratification, saying that's the only way to decide the issue through the democratic process rather than the courts.

"Take this issue out of the hands of overreaching judges and put it back where it belongs -- in the hands of the American people," he told dozens of leaders from religious and pro-family groups in a speech yesterday.

He said an amendment is the most democratic solution because it requires two-thirds approval in the House and Senate and ratification by legislatures in three-fourths of the states.

The president is staking out a position while trying to avoid being seen as driving the issue for political purposes, and in his 10-minute speech, he blamed "activist judges" and "activist courts" four times for forcing the issue.

DOJ_NMG_0032087

But politics is exactly what Democrats said was going on as the Senate took up the Marriage Protection Amendment yesterday, following through on a promise by Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican.

"They intend to stir up an election-year fight and use it as a campaign tool and a political strategy," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat. "Right now, we should be addressing America's top priorities, including ways to make America safer or the war in Iraq, or the rising gas prices."

The amendment is not expected to pass -- or for that matter even to garner the 60 votes needed to overcome a Democratic filibuster. A vote is scheduled for tomorrow.

Both Republicans and Democrats are using the debate to try to score political points with supporters.

The National Republican Senatorial Committee (NRSC) used the Senate's marriage-amendment debate to criticize the Democratic challenger to Sen. Rick Santorum, a Pennsylvania Republican facing a tough re-election battle.

They chided Democrat Bob Casey Jr. for not speaking at a Saturday meeting in Pittsburgh of the Stonewall Democrats, a homosexual rights group that supports him. Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean did speak to the group.

"The fact that Casey Jr. is having Howard Dean stand in for him speaks volumes about his political courage," said NRSC spokesman Dan Ronayne. "When given a chance to stand up for something, Casey Jr. comes up empty again."

From the other side, the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee sent out an e-mail to supporters yesterday from Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, blasting Republicans.

"It's election season and down-in-the-polls Republicans are turning to their same old playbook -- fear and division," wrote Mr. Reid, Nevada Democrat. "We need a president and a Congress that doesn't play divisive politics."

The amendment being debated in the Senate reads: "Marriage in the United States shall consist only of the union of a man and a woman. Neither this Constitution, nor the constitution of any State, shall be construed to require that marriage or the legal incidents thereof be conferred upon any union other than the union of a man and a woman."

Mr. Bush said it would create a national definition of marriage but would leave to state legislatures the issue of civil unions or other legal benefit arrangements for unmarried partners.

He called marriage "the most enduring and important human institution" and said changing the definition would undermine it.

Before speaking in an auditorium in the Eisenhower Executive Office Building, the president met in the White House Roosevelt Room for more than a half-hour with a small group of leaders.

Matt Daniels, president of the Alliance for Marriage, which helped craft the Senate language, attended the meeting and said the president and leaders present all agreed marriage should be a unifying issue, not a divisive one.

Mr. Daniels said he told the president that he was raised on welfare by a single mother in Spanish Harlem in New York. He said Mr. Bush marveled at that, saying, "That's a long way from where I grew up."

Mr. Daniels said he responded that the issue of marriage "bridges the gap of where you come from and where I come from."

Conservative leaders said they were happy with Mr. Bush's emphatic endorsement of the amendment.

"It left no room for misinterpretation," said Tony Perkins, president of the Family Research Council.

One key question for conservatives is how much effort the president will put into working senators on the issue.

Both Mr. Perkins and James Dobson, founder of Focus on the Family, said they expected the White House to make phone calls to senators on the issue as a way of showing their commitment, but the White House did not rule that in or out.

White House press secretary Tony Snow cautioned against reading too much into Mr. Bush's efforts both yesterday and Saturday, when he devoted his weekly radio address to the issue.

"I don't know [that] this counts as lobbying. The president has issued a radio address restating his position, and he is meeting with some supporters of the amendment," he said.

Base Assumptions (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

This month's offensive by President Bush and his allies in Congress against gay marriage and flag burning proves one thing: The Republican Party thinks its base of social conservatives is a nest of dummies who have no memories and respond like bulls whenever red flags are waved in their faces.

The people who should be angry this week are not liberals or gays or lesbians, but the president's most loyal supporters. After using the gay-marriage issue shamelessly in the 2004 campaign, Bush and Republican leaders left opponents of gay marriage out in the cold as they concentrated on the party's real priorities: privatizing Social Security and cutting taxes on rich people.

When Bush was at his position of maximum strength after the 2004 election, did he use his political energy on behalf of a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage? Not at all. In an interview with The Post on Jan. 14, 2005, he dismissed the question, arguing that since many senators felt that the Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA) was already an effective bar to the spread of gay marital unions, there was no point in fighting for a constitutional change.

"Senators have made it clear that so long as DOMA is deemed constitutional, nothing will happen," Bush said then. "I'd take their admonition seriously."

On Jan. 24, 2005, Republican Senate leaders announced their top 10 legislative priorities. The marriage amendment was nowhere to be seen.

At the time, social conservatives knew they were getting rolled. In mid-January, a group of them expressed their dismay in a letter to Karl Rove, Bush's top political adviser.

"We couldn't help but notice the contrast between how the president is approaching the difficult issue of Social Security privatization . . . and the marriage issue," they wrote. "Is he prepared to spend significant political capital on privatization but reluctant to devote the same energy to preserving traditional marriage? If so it would create outrage with countless voters who stood with him just a few weeks ago."

The marriage amendment is unlikely to pass (and it shouldn't, since marriage is an issue for the states to decide). What's changed is that the president and his friends in the Senate fear that their disillusioned base will stay home on Election Day. So they are about to engage in an exercise that George "Nothing Will Happen" Bush once acknowledged to be meaningless.

The constitutional amendment to ban flag burning is also about electoral politics. As a Senate Republican leader said happily, a vote against the amendment "would make a good 30-second spot." An official of the National Republican Congressional Committee said that "if Democrats choose to vote against a Constitutional amendment" banning flag desecration, "I think they'll pay a price."

Both quotations appeared in a New York Times story that ran 16 years ago -- from Bob Dole, the Republican leader, and Ed Rollins, the GOP official. Does wedge politics have to be so boringly predictable?

At least Scott Reed, Dole's 1996 campaign manager, has a sense of humor about all this. He told Knight Ridder's James Kuhnhenn last week: "If you're a gay who likes to burn flags, it's going to be a long year."

Ah, but there is one issue in the Republican Senate's June Pandering Trifecta that the party really cares about: the repeal of the inheritance tax on large fortunes. The Republicans go hot and cold on the social conservatives, but they're always solicitous of the really, really privileged.

Current law would keep the estate tax falling (eventually to zero) until the end of 2010, so there is no urgency to act now. Or is there? The Los Angeles Times quoted Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) this weekend as acknowledging that the position of the estate tax abolitionists is "eroding" and "could be dramatically negatively impacted this fall and after the next presidential election."

So the real question is whether moderate Democrats and Republicans choose to hand the friends of the truly wealthy a victory at the very moment the tide is starting to turn toward fiscal sanity. The one thing worse than opportunistically using wedge issues is cravenly selling out the nation's financial future to appease the powerful.

Social conservatives, who are a lot smarter than their leaders think, should watch the Senate closely this month. My bet is that their so-called champions will fight much harder on behalf of the interests of the affluent than for the "values" that conservative politicians proclaim with such pious urgency whenever they're in danger of losing an election.

Distracter In Chief (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, June 6, 2006

What uncharted realm lies beyond brazen cynicism? A wasteland of utter shamelessness, perhaps? A vast Sahara of desperation, where principle goes to die? Someday George W. Bush and the Republican right will be able to tell us all about this barren terra incognita, assuming they ever find their way home.

The Decider's decision to whip up a phony crisis over same-sex marriage -- Values under attack! Run for your lives! -- is such a transparent ploy that even conservatives are scratching their heads, wondering if this is the best Karl Rove could come up with. Bush might as well open his next presidential address by giving himself a new title: The Distracter.

Let's check in on what's happening in the real world:

Iraq has become a charnel house for the victims of escalating sectarian slaughter. On Saturday, a car bomb killed 28 people in Shiite-dominated Basra, and hours later gunmen killed nine Sunni worshipers in a mosque. On Sunday, on a road near Baghdad, assassins pulled travelers out of their minivans, sorted them by faith, killed nearly two dozen Shiites and let the Sunnis go. Yesterday, men wearing police uniforms grabbed at least 56 people from bus stations and travel agencies in Baghdad and took them away -- no one knows why, no one knows where.

DOJ_NMG_0032089

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's new government remains toothless and ineffectual, despite his pledge to end the sectarian violence. On Sunday, he failed yet again to reach agreement on who will run the only two ministries that matter -- the ones in charge of the army and the police. The butcher Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the most prominent figure in the armed Sunni insurgency and the most hunted man in Iraq, remains at large and periodically manages to issue messages inspiring his followers to continue their jihad. (Just like his hero, Osama bin Laden.) Yet the president spent his weekend radio address pushing "a constitutional amendment that defines marriage in the United States as the union of a man and woman."

Immigration, the last artificial crisis, at least is a genuine issue. But the president and his allies did such a job of rabble-rousing that the best outcome, at this point, is probably for Congress to deadlock and end up doing nothing. The National Guard is headed for the frontier, apparently under orders not to do much of anything. Immigrants are still marching north, employers are still hiring them and self-appointed sentries are still patrolling the border, where something really bad is bound to happen sooner or later.

Yet the issue of "profound importance" the president urgently wants to highlight is "protecting the institution of marriage."

The diplomatic maneuvering over Iran's nuclear program, which looks like the next crisis, is at a critical point. Defiant words from Iranian leaders on Sunday rattled the world's financial markets yesterday and sent oil prices soaring -- threatening even the modest relief most analysts had predicted from $3-a-gallon prices at the gas pump. Just in time for summer vacation.

The president, however, would rather we all reflect on the fact that "marriage is the most enduring and important human institution." Not satisfied that he had gotten his message across in his Saturday radio address, Bush gave another speech in support of a marriage amendment yesterday.

It's almost surreal. For one thing, the president has no role in amending the Constitution. Proposed amendments must be passed in both the House and Senate by two-thirds majorities, and then they must win approval from the legislatures of three-fourths of the states. The president doesn't have to sign it. He doesn't even have to read it.

People who are close to the president are always telling us what an essentially decent man he is, without a bigoted bone in his body. But that doesn't square with all this demagoguery in support of a measure whose only effect would be to write discrimination against gay men and lesbians into the United States Constitution.

Bigotry, pure and simple.

But of course the president knows that there's essentially no chance an amendment to ban gay marriage will make it out of the Senate -- that in fact it might not even get out of the House. All he can possibly accomplish is to energize activists on the religious right, who otherwise might be tempted to sit out the November midterm elections.

It's risky to raise expectations you have no intention of fulfilling, but maybe enough of the Republican base can be fooled by this charade to make a difference in the fall.

Meanwhile it keeps us from talking about things that are real, and that really matter.

Justices To Look At Race-based School Policy (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court agreed Monday to decide whether public elementary and high schools can use race in determining where students go to school.

The move means that the court will re-enter the debate over affirmative action during the 2006-07 term with two cases that could affect districts that seek diversity in schools.

The cases from Seattle and Louisville will be the first of their kind taken up by the court led by new Chief Justice John Roberts. They also will be the first disputes over race-based policies to be heard since the retirement of Sandra Day O'Connor, a moderate justice whose support of some forms of affirmative action became the court's standard. In 2003, O'Connor cast the decisive vote in a 5-4 ruling that allowed minority preferences in higher education to increase diversity.

Justice Samuel Alito, whose record is generally more conservative than O'Connor's, succeeded her in January. Three months earlier, Roberts succeeded fellow conservative William Rehnquist as chief. Alito and Roberts opposed some types of affirmative action when they were lawyers in the Reagan administration.

The Seattle and Louisville cases test whether the Constitution's guarantee of equality allows schools to use race as a factor in admissions. In both disputes, lower courts backed the school plans, and parents of white students appealed.

“The scope of a ruling would be widespread,” says Francisco Negrn, general counsel of the National School Boards Association. He says many public school districts have policies to boost diversity.

The Seattle and Louisville area districts say considering race in assignments can have social benefits and offset racially polarized housing patterns. The Pacific Legal Foundation counters that such affirmative action policies place “racial identification” above individual rights.

DOJ_NMG_0032090

Seattle allows students to choose their high school. Officials aim for each school to have about 40% white students and 60% racial minorities. When there are more applicants than openings at a particular school, students with a sibling there get priority. Officials use race as a “tiebreaker” to decide who is admitted.

In the Louisville area, most Jefferson County schools have tried to keep most schools' black enrollment at 15%-50%. A challenge was brought by a white student who could not go to the school across the street from his home.

The cases are Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1 and Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education.

Court To Weigh Race As Factor In School Rolls (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, June 5 — The Supreme Court agreed on Monday to rule on what measures, if any, public school systems may use to maintain racial balance in individual schools.

The eventual decision on whether they can take race into account could affect hundreds of school systems in all areas of the country. The court accepted challenges to plans in Louisville, Ky., where the schools were once racially segregated by law, and in Seattle, where segregation was never official but was widespread because of residential patterns.

Federal appeals courts upheld these plans, both of which offer students a choice of schools while taking race into account in deciding which transfer applications to accept. Variations of this approach are common, and have been under legal attack around the country.

The Supreme Court's decision to add the cases to the calendar for its next term, a step that by all appearances was controversial within the court and unexpected outside it, plunged the new Roberts court into one of the country's deepest constitutional debates.

The action came three years after the court upheld a racially conscious admissions plan at the University of Michigan Law School. Writing for the majority in that 5-to-4 decision, Grutter v. Bollinger, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor suggested that, at least in higher education, affirmative action might be necessary for another 25 years.

The new cases do not ask the court to revisit that decision, and the justices are unlikely to do so. But the implications are far-reaching nonetheless. The eventual decision, roughly a year from now, could not only set the court's path in this area but could also shape the climate in which government policies with respect to race will be debated.

One difference between the Michigan decision and the new cases is that while the University of Michigan sought to use affirmative action to achieve a measure of racial balance, the school districts are trying to maintain such a balance.

In December, with Justice O'Connor still on the court, the justices refused to hear a challenge to a racially conscious student assignment plan in the public schools of Lynn, Mass. That plan, which a federal appeals court had upheld, is basically indistinguishable from the plans at issue in the new cases: Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District, No. 05-908, and Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education, No. 05-915.

What has changed is the Supreme Court itself, with the retirement in January of Justice O'Connor and her replacement by Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. One lawyer involved in the challenges to the Seattle and Louisville plans, Sharon L. Browne of the Pacific Legal Foundation, a conservative public-interest law firm, expressed the view that this change made the difference.

"I think the writing's on the wall, or at least I hope it is," Ms. Browne said in an interview Monday.

The plans under review in the new cases differ in details that are unlikely to prove constitutionally significant. The Jefferson County, Ky., school board adopted the Louisville plan in 2001, shortly after the school system was declared desegregated and was released from 25 years of federal court supervision.

The "managed choice" plan applies to all schools, kindergarten through 12th grade. In a district that is one-third nonwhite, every school is required to seek a black student enrollment of at least 15 percent and no more than 50 percent.

The Louisville case was taken to the Supreme Court by Crystal D. Meredith, a white parent whose son, Joshua McDonald, did not receive a requested transfer to attend kindergarten in a school that was trying to maintain a sufficient number of black students.

The plan in Seattle, which has struggled for decades to deal with the effects on its school system of segregated housing patterns, applies only to the city's 10 high schools. The policy is one of "open choice," subject to various "tiebreakers," one of which is race. Other factors include geographic proximity and whether a student has a sibling at the desired school, both of which count in favor of an application.

Under the "integration tiebreaker," high schools that deviate by more than 15 percent from the systemwide balance, which is 60 percent nonwhite, must take account of an applicant's race in order not to deviate further.

DOJ_NMG_0032091

A group of parents organized as a nonprofit corporation called Parents Involved in Community Schools to fight the plan, and filed the Supreme Court appeal after losing by a vote of 7 to 4 in the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit.

Both appeals reached the court in January and evidently provoked a vigorous internal debate among the justices, who considered the Seattle case six times and the Louisville case seven times before issuing the one-line order accepting both. Prolonged review of this sort is unusual.

Briefs are now likely to pour into the court in advance of a November argument; the University of Michigan case drew more than 100 briefs. But one of the more influential analyses may prove to be a brief concurring opinion in the Seattle case by Judge Alex Kozinski, the Ninth Circuit judge whose views carry great weight among legal conservatives.

Describing the Seattle plan as one "that gives the American melting pot a healthy stir without benefiting or burdening any particular group," Judge Kozinski addressed the Supreme Court justices directly, on the assumption that they would soon be reviewing the decision.

"There is much to be said for returning primacy on matters of educational policy to local officials," he said.

These were among the other developments at the court.

Speedy Trial

The court ruled unanimously that a federal defendant's rights under the Speedy Trial Act of 1974 were violated when, while seeking more time to prepare his defense to counterfeiting charges, he signed a statement presented by the trial judge in which he waived any future right to a speedy trial.

With certain exceptions, the federal law requires criminal trials to begin within 70 days after a defendant is charged. The trial for this defendant, Jacob Zedner, did not begin for seven years. Mr. Zedner eventually tried to assert his rights under the law and sought dismissal of the indictment, but two lower federal courts in New York enforced his waiver. He was convicted by a jury and sentenced to five years in prison.

In an opinion by Justice Alito, the Supreme Court ordered the indictment dismissed. The statute does not permit such a waiver, Justice Alito said, noting that the public as a whole, and not only an individual defendant, has an interest in the speedy administration of justice.

The significance of this decision, Zedner v. United States, No. 05-5992, is likely to transcend the particular case. Justice Antonin Scalia refused to sign the paragraph of the opinion in which Justice Alito cited the legislative history of the Speedy Trial Act as further evidence for his interpretation of the statute.

"The use of legislative history is illegitimate and ill advised in the interpretation of any statute," Justice Scalia's concurring opinion declared in what has become a familiar theme from him.

The fact that Justice Alito's paragraph of legislative history remained in the majority opinion, and that Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. signed the opinion without comment, indicates that Justice Scalia remains isolated in his view.

Sentencing

The court agreed to decide whether to give retroactive application to a 2004 decision that sharply limited judges' discretion to impose sentences above the thresholds set by sentencing guidelines systems.

The question is whether that decision, Blakely v. Washington, established a "new rule," in which case it is not retroactive, or whether it was a straightforward application of an earlier sentencing ruling, Apprendi v. New Jersey. The deeper issue in the new case, Burton v. Waddington, No. 05-9222, is how to tell a "new rule" from one that is not, a question that comes up with some frequency in habeas corpus cases.

Supreme Court To Hear Schools Race Case (AP)

By Gina Holland, Associated Press Writer

AP, June 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court agreed Monday to decide whether skin color can be considered in assigning children to public schools, reopening the issue of affirmative action. The announcement puts a contentious social topic on the national landscape in an election year, and tests the conservatism of President Bush's two new justices.

The outcome could mark a new chapter for a court that famously banned racial segregation in public schools in Brown v. Board of Education in 1954.

Since then, race questions have been hugely divisive, both for the court and the public.

Three years ago, more than 5,000 people demonstrated outside as the justices considered whether public universities could select students based at least in part on race. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor broke a tie to allow it in a limited way.

The court's new interest is in public schools, far more sweeping than universities. And O'Connor is gone, replaced by conservative Justice Samuel Alito.

DOJ_NMG_0032092

The justices will hear appeals this fall from a Seattle parents group and a Kentucky mom, who argue that race factors improperly penalize white students.

Doug Kmiec, a Pepperdine University law professor and former Reagan administration lawyer, said the case will affect students everywhere. "This is not quite at the level of Brown v. Board, but it will be argued in the style of that case," Kmiec said.

Justices will look at the modern-era classroom, no longer under court desegregation orders but in some places still using remnants of those policies.

At its heart, the court will consider whether school leaders can promote racial diversity without violating the Constitution's guarantee against discrimination.

The court's announcement that it will take up the cases this fall provides the first sign of an aggressiveness by the court under new Chief Justice John Roberts. The court rejected a similar case in December when moderate O'Connor was still on the bench. The outcome will most likely turn on her successor, Alito.

Both Roberts, 51, and Alito, 56, worked as Justice Department lawyers during the Reagan administration to limit affirmative action.

Alito was asked during his Senate confirmation hearings in January about the 2003 case. Without stating his views on affirmative action, he said he taught a college seminar on civil liberties to a diverse class. "Having these people in the class with diverse backgrounds and outlooks on the issues that we were discussing made an enormous contribution to the class," he said.

The court's announcement followed six weeks of internal deliberations over whether to hear the appeals, an unusually long time.

"This is a very dramatic move. I expect it will create a big national discussion," said Gary Orfield, who heads the Harvard University Civil Rights Project and supports affirmative action.

A ruling against the schools "would be pretty devastating to suburban communities, small towns that have successfully maintained desegregation for a couple of generations," he said. "The same communities that were forced to desegregate would be forced to re-segregate."

In one of the cases, an appeals court had upheld Seattle's system, which lets students pick among high schools and then relies on tiebreakers, including race, to decide who gets into schools that have more applicants than openings. Seattle put the system on hold during the legal fight.

The Supreme Court also will also consider a policy in Kentucky, also upheld by lower courts. That case is somewhat different, because the metropolitan Louisville, Ky., school district had long been under a federal court decree to end segregation in its schools. After the decree ended, the district in 2001 began using a plan that includes race guidelines.

The Kentucky parent, Crystal Meredith, asks the court to overturn its 2003 affirmative action rulings. Her son's district still requires most schools to maintain a black enrollment of 15 percent and prevent it from going above 50 percent.

"It's a quota arrangement," said her lawyer, Ted Gordon. "The blatant segregation we once had is long gone."

The cases are Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District, 05-908, and Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education, 05-915.

High Court To Hear Public School Affirmative Action Cases (LAW)

By Tony Mauro, Legal Times

Legal Times, June 6, 2006

The Supreme Court on Monday agreed to use cases from Seattle and Louisville, Ky., to re-enter the contentious debate over affirmative action.

Three years after the Court upheld race-conscious admission policies in higher education in the Grutter v. Bollinger decision, the new cases will test whether that precedent carries over into the different setting of public elementary and high schools.

"This is the occasion to see how far Grutter can go," said John Payton, a partner at WilmerHale, part of the legal team that won Grutter, which upheld admission policies at the University of Michigan Law School.

Adding uncertainty to the new review of race-conscious public-education policies is the fact that Justice Samuel Alito Jr. has replaced Sandra Day O'Connor, who was a crucial vote in favor of affirmative action and the author of the Grutter ruling. During Alito's confirmation hearings, some civil rights groups concluded from his record that Alito would be a strong opponent of affirmative action programs.

"This will be a major test for the Roberts Court," said Pepperdine University School of Law professor Douglas Kmiec, who argues that Grutter should not be extended to pre-college public schools.

"We are excited about the possibility that the Court may limit Grutter to its facts or even overrule it," said Sharon Browne, principal attorney at the Pacific Legal Foundation, which has filed briefs opposing race-conscious programs in both cases before the Court. "In elementary and secondary schools it makes no sense for school districts to assign students to schools by race."

The cases granted review on Monday, Parents Involved in Community Schools v. Seattle School District No. 1 and Meredith v. Jefferson County Board of Education, will be argued together this fall, possibly injecting the affirmative action debate into the election season. In both cases, white parents challenged programs that used race as a factor in school placements in ways that they say disadvantaged white students.

In Seattle, where students have broad choice as to which high school they will attend, race is a "tiebreaker" factor in deciding which students will be assigned to a high school that is oversubscribed and racially imbalanced. The 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, in an en banc ruling citing Grutter, upheld the program last October.

The other case involves schools in Louisville and the surrounding area, a district that was under a federal court desegregation decree from 1975 to 2000. After the order was lifted, a new plan was adopted that allowed for a wider range of student choices but required all schools to seek a black student enrollment of between 15 percent and 50 percent of the student body. In June 2004, Judge John Heyburn II of the Western District of Kentucky upheld the program in general, though he disapproved of some of the racial categorizing involved.

Citing Grutter, the judge found that "the benefits of racial tolerance and understanding are equally as important and laudable in public elementary and secondary education as in higher education." The 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld the decision last July.
